PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE EIGHTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1804.

MONDAY, November 5, 1804.

The second session of the Eighth Congress, conformably to the act passed at the last session, entitled "An act altering the time for the next meeting of Congress," commenced this day; and the Senate assembled at the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

AARON BURR, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

SIMEON OLCOTT and WILLIAM PLUMER, from New Hampshire.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, from Massachusetts.

URIAH TRACY, from Connecticut.

CHRISTOPHER ELLERY, from Rhode Island.

STEPHEN R. BRADLEY and ISRAEL SMITH, from Vermont.

JOHN CONDIT, from New Jersey.

SAMUEL WHITE, from Delaware.

SAMUEL SMITH, from Maryland.

ABRAHAM BALDWIN, from Georgia; and

THOMAS WORTHINGTON, from Ohio.

WILLIAM B. GILES, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the Commonwealth of Virginia, in place of Abraham B. Venable, resigned, took his seat, and his credentials were read.

The VICE PRESIDENT gave notice that he had received a letter from WILLIAM HILL WELLS, a Senator from the State of Delaware, resigning his seat in the Senate.

The number of Senators present not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, November 6.

JESSE FRANKLIN, from the State of North Carolina, GEORGE LOGAN, from the State of Pennsylvania, and TIMOTHY PICKERING, from the State of Massachusetts, severally attended.

ANDREW MOORE, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the Commonwealth of Virginia, in place of Wilson C. Nicholas, resigned, took his seat, and his credentials were read.

The PRESIDENT administered the oath to Mr. GILES and Mr. MOORE, as the law prescribes.

Ordered, That the PRESIDENT be requested to notify the Executive of the State of Delaware of the resignation of Mr. Wells.

No quorum being present, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 7.

ROBERT WRIGHT, from the State of Maryland, attended.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled and ready to proceed to business. The House of Representatives have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as the Senate may appoint, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them. The House of Representatives have also passed a resolution that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly; in which several resolutions they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled; and concurred therein, and Messrs. SAMUEL SMITH and BALDWIN were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of two Chaplains to Congress during the present session, and having agreed thereto, proceeded to the choice of a Chaplain on their part; and the Rev. Mr. McCORMICK was duly elected.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, agreeably to the resolution of this day, and that the President of the United States had informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses tomorrow at 12 o'clock.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied during the present session with three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers.

Resolved, That James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one additional assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for that purpose during the session, and for twenty days after.

THURSDAY, November 8.

JONATHAN DAYTON, from the State of New Jersey, and JAMES HILLHOUSE, from the State of Connecticut, severally attended.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

To a people, fellow-citizens, who sincerely desire the happiness and prosperity of other nations, to those who justly calculate that their own well-being is advanced by that of the nations with which they have intercourse, it will be a satisfaction to observe, that the war which was lighted up in Europe a little before our last meeting, has not yet extended its flames to other nations, nor been marked by the calamities which sometimes stain the footsteps of war. The irregularities, too, on the ocean, which generally harass the commerce of neutral nations, have, in distant parts, disturbed ours less than on former occasions. But, in the American seas, they have been greater from peculiar causes; and even within our harbors and jurisdiction, infringements on the authority of the laws have been committed, which have called for serious attention. The friendly conduct of the Governments from whose officers and subjects these acts have proceeded, in other respects, and in places more under their observation and control, gives us confidence, that our representations on this subject will have been properly regarded.

While noticing the irregularities committed on the ocean by others, those on our own part should not be omitted, nor left unprovided for. Complaints have been received that persons residing within the United States have taken on themselves to arm merchant vessels, and to force a commerce into certain ports and countries in defiance of the laws of those countries. That individuals should undertake to wage private war, independently of the authority of their country, cannot be permitted in a well ordered society. Its tendency to produce aggression on the laws and rights of other nations, and to endanger the peace of our own, is so obvious that I doubt not you will adopt measures for restraining it effectually in future.

Soon after the passage of the act of the last session authorizing the establishment of a district and port of entry on the waters of the Mobile, we learned that its object was misunderstood on the part of Spain. Candid explanations were immediately given, and assurances that, reserving our claims in that quarter as a subject of discussion and arrangement with Spain, no act was meditated in the meantime inconsistent with the peace and friendship existing between the two nations; and that conformably to these intentions would be the execution of the law. That Government, however, thought proper to suspend the ratification of the Convention of 1802. But the explanations which would reach them soon after, and still more the confirmation of them by the tenor of the instrument establishing the port and district, may reasonably be expected to replace them in the dispositions and views of the whole subject which originally dictated the Convention.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the objections which had been urged by that Government against the validity of our title to the country of Louisiana have been withdrawn; its exact limits, however, remaining still to be settled between us; and to this is to be added, that, having prepared and delivered the stock created in execution of the Convention of Paris, of April 30, 1803, in consideration of the cession of that country, we have received from the Government of France an acknowledgment in due form of the fulfilment of that stipulation.

With the nations of Europe, in general, our friendship and intercourse are undisturbed, and from the Governments of the belligerent Powers especially, we continue to receive those friendly manifestations which are justly due to an honest neutrality, and to such good offices consistent with that as we have opportunities of rendering.

The activity and success of the small force employed in the Mediterranean in the early part of the present year, the reinforcements sent into that sea, and the energy of the officers having command in the several vessels, will, I trust, by the sufferings of war, reduce the barbarians of Tripoli to the desire of peace on proper terms. Great injury, however, ensues to ourselves as well as to others interested, from the distance to which prizes must be brought for adjudication, and from the impracticability of bringing hither such as are not seaworthy.

The Bey of Tunis having made requisitions unauthorized by our treaty, their rejection has produced from him some expressions of discontent. But to those who expect us to calculate whether a compliance with unjust demands will not cost us less than a war, we must leave as a question of calculation for them; also, whether to retire from unjust demands will not cost them less than a war. We can do to each other very sensible injuries by war; but the mutual advantages of peace make that the best interest of both.

Peace and intercourse with the other Powers on the same coast continue on the footing on which they are established by treaty.

In pursuance of the act providing for the temporary government of Louisiana, the necessary officers for the Territory of Orleans were appointed in due time, to commence the exercise of their functions on the first day of October. The distance, however, of some of them, and indispensable previous arrangements, may have retarded its commencement in some of its parts; the form of government thus provided having been considered but as temporary, and open to such future improvements as further information of the circumstances of our brethren there might suggest, it will of course be subject to your consideration.

In the district of Louisiana it has been thought best to adopt the division into subordinate districts, which had been established under its former government. These being five in number, a commanding officer has been appointed to each, according to the provisions of the law, and so soon as they can be at their stations, that district will also be in its due state of organization. In the meantime their places are supplied by the officers before commanding there; and the functions of the Governor and Judges of Indiana having commenced, the government, we presume, is proceeding in its new form. The lead mines in that district offer so rich a supply of that metal as to merit attention. The report now communicated will inform you of their state, and of the necessity of immediate inquiry into their occupation and titles.

With the Indian tribes established within our newly acquired limits, I have deemed it necessary to open conferences for the purpose of establishing a good understanding and neighborly relations between us. So far as we have yet learned, we have reason to believe that their dispositions are generally favorable and friendly, and, with these dispositions on their part, we have in our own hands means which cannot fail us for preserving their peace and friendship. By pursuing an uniform course of justice towards them, by aiding them in all the improvements which may better their condition, and especially by establishing a commerce on terms which shall be advantageous to them, and only not losing to us; and so regulated as that no incendiaries of our own, or any other nation, may be permitted to disturb the natural effects of our just and friendly offices, we may render ourselves so necessary to their comfort and prosperity that the protection of our citizens from their disorderly members will become their interest and their voluntary care. Instead, therefore, of an augmentation of military force proportioned to our extension of frontier, I propose a moderate enlargement of the capital employed in that commerce, as a more effectual, economical, and humane instrument for preserving peace and good neighborhood with them.

On this side the Mississippi an important relinquishment of native title has been received from the Delawares. That tribe, desiring to extinguish in their people the spirit of hunting, and to convert superfluous lands into the means of improving what they retain, has ceded to us all the country between the Wabash and Ohio, south of and including the road from the Rapids towards Vincennes; for which they are to receive annuities in animals and implements for agriculture, and in other necessities. This acquisition is important, not only for its extent and fertility, but as fronting three hundred miles on the Ohio, and nearly half that on the Wabash, the produce of the settled country descending those rivers will no longer pass in view of the Indian frontier, but in a small portion; and, with the cession heretofore made by the Kaskaskias, nearly consolidates our possessions north of the Ohio, in a very respectable breadth, from Lake Erie to the Mississippi. The Piankeshaws having some claim to the country ceded by the Delawares, it has been thought best to quiet that by fair purchase also. So soon as the treaties on this subject shall have received their Constitutional sanctions they shall be laid before both Houses.

The act of Congress of February 28, 1803, for building and employing a number of gun-boats, is now in a course of execution to the extent there provided for. The obstacle to naval enterprise which vessels of this construction offer for our seaport towns; their utility towards supporting, within our waters, the authority of the laws; the promptness with which they will be manned by the seamen and militia of the place in the moment they are wanting; the facility of their assembling from different parts of the coast to any point where they are required in greater force than ordinary; the economy of their maintenance and preservation from decay when not in actual service; and the competence of our finances to this defensive provision, without any new burden, are considerations which will have due weight with Congress in deciding on the expediency of adding to their number from year to year, as experience shall test their utility, until all our important harbors, by these and auxiliary means, shall be secured against insult and opposition to the laws.

No circumstance has arisen since your last session which calls for any augmentation of our regular military force. Should any improvement occur in the militia system, that will be always seasonable.

Accounts of the receipts and expenditures of the last year, with estimates for the ensuing one, will, as usual, be laid before you.

The state of our finances continues to fulfil our expectations. Eleven millions and an half of dollars, received in the course of the year ending the 30th of September last, have enabled us, after meeting all the ordinary expenses of the year, to pay upwards of three million six hundred thousand dollars of the public debt, exclusive of interest. This payment, with those of the two preceding years, has extinguished upwards of twelve millions of the principal, and a greater sum of interest within that period; and, by a proportionate diminution of interest, renders already sensible the effect of the growing sum yearly applicable to the discharge of the principal.

It is also ascertained that the revenue accrued during the last year exceeds that of the preceding, and the probable receipts of the ensuing year may safely be relied on as sufficient, with the sum already in the Treasury, to meet all the current demands of the year, to discharge upwards of three millions and a half of the engagements incurred under the British and French Conventions, and to advance in the further redemption of the funded debt as rapidly as had been contemplated. These, fellow-citizens, are the principal matters which I have thought it necessary, at this time, to communicate for your consideration and attention. Some others will be laid before you in the course of the session; but, in the discharge of the great duties confided to you by our country, you will take a broader view of the field of legislation. Whether the great interests of agriculture, manufactures, commerce, or navigation, can, within the pale of your Constitutional powers, be aided in any of their relations; whether laws are provided in all cases where they are wanting; whether those provided are exactly what they should be; whether any abuses take place in their administration, or in that of the public revenues; whether the organization of the public agents, or of the public force, is perfect in all its parts: In fine, whether anything can be done to advance the general good, are questions within the limits of your functions, which will necessarily occupy your attention. In these and all other matters which you in your wisdom may propose for the good of our country, you may count with assurance on my hearty co-operation and faithful execution.

TH. JEFFERSON.

A Bill further providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to establish within the Territory of Orleans, a government in all respects similar (except as is herein otherwise provided) to that now exercised in the Mississippi Territory, and shall, in the recess of the Senate, but to be nominated at their next meeting, for their advice and consent, appoint all the officers necessary therein, in conformity with the ordinance of Congress, made on the 20th day of July 1787, and that from and after the establishment of the said government, the inhabitants of the Territory of Orleans shall be entitled to and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and advantages, secured by the said ordinance, and now enjoyed by the people of the Mississippi Territory.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the said ordinance of Congress as relates to the organization of a General Assembly, and prescribes the power thereof, shall, from and after the — day of — next, be in force in the said Territory of Orleans; and in order to carry the same into operation, the Governor of the said Territory shall cause to be elected twenty-five representatives, for which purpose he shall lay off the said Territory into convenient election districts, on or before the — day of — next, and give due notice thereof throughout the same and first appoint the most convenient place, within each of the said districts, for holding the elections; and shall nominate a proper officer or officers to preside at and conduct the same, and to return to him the names of the persons who may have been duly elected. All subsequent elections shall be regulated by the Legislature; and the number of representatives shall be determined, and the apportionment made in the manner prescribed by the said ordinance.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the representatives to be chosen as aforesaid, shall be convened by the Governor, in the city of Orleans, on the — day of — next. The General Assembly shall meet at least once in every year, and each meeting shall be on the — Monday in — annually, unless they shall by law appoint a different day. Neither House, during the session, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two branches are sitting.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the laws in force in the said Territory, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with the provisions thereof, shall continue in force, until altered, modified, or repealed by the Legislature.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the second paragraph of the said ordinance, which regulates the descent and distribution of estates; and also the sixth article of compact which is annexed to and makes part of said ordinance, are hereby declared not to extend to, but are excluded from all operation within the said Territory of Orleans.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted; That the Governor, Secretary, and Judges, to be appointed by virtue of this act, shall be severally allowed the same compensation which is now allowed to the Governor, Secretary, and Judges, of the Territory of Orleans. And all the additional officers authorized by this act shall respectively receive the same compensations for their services, as are by law established for similar offices in the Mississippi Territory, to be paid quarterly out of the revenues of import and tonnage, accruing within the said Territory of Orleans.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be ascertained by an actual census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the Territory of Orleans, taken by proper authority, that the number of inhabitants included therein shall amount to at least — thousand souls, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons, the inhabitants of the said Territory, upon application to Congress for that purpose, and upon producing satisfactory proof that the number of souls included therein, ascertained as aforesaid does actually amount to at least — thousand, shall thereupon be authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States, in all respects whatever, conformably to the provisions of the third article of the Treaty concluded at Paris, on the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic: Provided, That the constitution so to be established, shall be republican, and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, nor inconsistent with the ordinance of the late Congress, passed the 13th day of July 1787, so far as the same is made applicable to the Territorial government hereby authorized to be established: Provided, however, That Congress shall be at liberty, at any time prior to the admission of the inhabitants of the said Territory to the rights of a separate State, to alter the boundaries thereof as they may judge proper: except only, that no alteration shall be made which shall procrastinate the period for the admission of the inhabitants thereof to the rights of a State Government, according to the provision of this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act, entitled, "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof," as is repugnant with this act, shall, from and after the — day of — next, be repealed.

And, on motion, it was agreed to postpone the further consideration of this bill.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

The Secretary of State has lately received a note from the Danish Chargé des Affaires, claiming, in the name of his Government, restitution, in the case of the brigantine Henrick, communicated to Congress at a former session, in which note were transmitted sundry documents, chiefly relating to the value and neutral character of the vessel, and to the question whether the judicial proceedings were instituted and conducted without the concurrence of the Captain of the Henrick. As these documents appear to form a necessary appendage to those already before Congress, and throw additional light on the subject, I transmit copies of them herewith.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 5, 1805.

The Message and documents therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating, that the measures which have been authorized by the board, subsequent to the 4th of February, 1804, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the said board, dated the 4th day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to; and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill brought up for concurrence was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Senate considered the resolution mentioned in the message, and disagreed thereto.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

In the message to Congress at the opening of the present session, I informed them that treaties had been entered into with the Delaware and Piankeshaw Indians, for the purchase of their right to certain lands on the Ohio. I have since received another, entered into with the Sacs and Foxes, for a portion of the country on both sides of the river Mississippi. These treaties having been advised and consented to by the Senate have accordingly been ratified, but, as they involve conditions which require Legislative provision, they are now submitted to both branches for consideration.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 13, 1805.

The Message was read, and, together with the treaties therein referred to, ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution that they will attend in the Chamber of the Senate this day at noon, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and have appointed tellers to act jointly with the teller who may be appointed on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States as they shall be declared.

The resolution mentioned in the message was read, and, on motion,

Ordered, That Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, be a teller of the votes for the President and Vice President of the United States on the part of the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate are now ready to meet them in the Senate Chamber, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

About twelve o'clock the Senators took their seats; and immediately after the SPEAKER and members of the House of Representatives entered; the SPEAKER and Clerk occupying seats on the floor on the right side of the PRESIDENT of the Senate, and the members of the House being seated in front.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, teller on the part of the Senate, and Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, and Mr. ROGER GRISWOLD, tellers on the part of the House, took seats at a table placed in front of the Chair, in the area between the Senate and House.

The Secretary of the Senate read the resolutions of the two Houses, previously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. BURR) stated that, pursuant to law, there had been transmitted to him several packets, which, from the endorsements upon them, appeared to be the votes of the Electors of a President and Vice President; that the returns forwarded by the mail, as well as the duplicates sent by special messengers, had been received by him in due time. You will now proceed gentlemen, said he, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct; adding that, perceiving no cause for preference in the order of opening the returns, he would pursue a geographical arrangement, beginning with the Northern States.

The PRESIDENT then proceeded to break the seals of the respective returns, handing each return, and its accompanying duplicate, as the seals of each were broken, to the tellers through the Secretary; Mr. S. SMITH reading aloud the returns, and the attestations of the appointment of the Electors, and Mr. J. CLAY and Mr. R. GRISWOLD comparing them with the duplicate return lying before them.

According to which enumeration, the following appeared to be the result:

STATES.	President.		V. Pres'dt.
	Th. Jefferson.	C. C. Pinckney.	Geo. Clinton.	Rufus King.
New Hampshire	7	-	7

SENATE.

out any objection having been made to receiving any of the votes, Mr. S. SMITH, on behalf of the tellers, communicated to the PRESIDENT the foregoing result, which was read from the Chair; when, the VICE PRESIDENT said, upon this report it becomes my duty to declare, agreeably to the Constitution, that THOMAS JEFFERSON is elected President of the United States, for the term of four years from the third day of March next, and that GEORGE CLINTON is elected Vice President of the United States, for the term of four years from the third day of March next.

[Previous to the above proceedings, a short debate arose in the Senate on the keeping the doors open or shut during the counting of the votes. Mr. WRIGHT submitted a motion for their being kept open, which, after some opposition, was agreed to.]

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate will be in their public Chamber at half past two o'clock, to proceed further on the trial of the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.

On motion that a committee be appointed to direct the forms in which the records of the pending impeachment shall be made up from time to time, it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have come to a resolution that a committee be appointed on their part, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, further measures ought to be adopted for the accommodation of the President of the United States for the term commencing on the fourth day of March next, and have appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 8th instant, the bill further providing for the government of the district of Louisiana, reported it with amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, February 14.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire and report whether any, and what, further measures ought to be adopted for the accommodation of the President of the United States, for the term commencing on the fourth day of March next; and, having agreed thereto,

Ordered, That Messrs. BALDWIN and FRANKLIN be the committee on their part.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported to the bill further providing for the government of the district of Louisiana; and the further consideration was postponed.

The Senate took into consideration a motion made on the 8th instant, for an alteration of the rule precluding debate while sitting as a Court of Impeachments, which was amended as follows:

Resolved, That, in the course of the trial, upon a question being referred to the decision of the Senate, in case it be required by a majority of the members present, the Senate shall return to their Chamber; whereupon, the question to be decided shall be stated by the President, and each member shall be at liberty to state the reasons of his opinion, but shall not be allowed to speak more than once. After the members have delivered their opinions, the Senate shall return to their judicial Chamber; where the question shall be determined by ayes and noes."

And, on the question to agree to this resolution, it passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Giles, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of New York, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Gaillard, Howland, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Mitchell, Moore, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Sumter, Worthington, and Wright.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to GEORGE CLINTON, Esq., of New York, Vice President elect of the United States, notification of his election to that office; and that the President of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following, viz:

"Be it known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened at the City of Washington, on the second Wednesday in February, in the year of our Lord, 1805, the undersigned Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for a President and Vice President of the United States; whereupon, it appeared that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, had a majority of the votes of the Electors as President, and George Clinton, of New York, had a majority of the votes of the Electors as Vice President; by all which it appears that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, has been duly elected President, and George Clinton of New York, has been duly elected Vice President of the United States, agreeably to the Constitution.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 14th day of February, 1805."

And that the PRESIDENT of the Senate do cause the certificate aforesaid to be laid before the President of the United States, with this resolution.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1805, was read the third time and further amended.

Resolved, That this bill do pass as amended.

The motion made on the thirteenth, respecting the forms of the record of the pending impeachment was resumed and adopted, and Messrs. BRADLEY, BRECKENRIDGE, and GILES, were appointed.

FRIDAY, February 15.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States and to notify to him his re-election, and have appointed a committee on their part.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill further providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans was read the third time; and a motion was made to strike out the first section of the bill, for the purpose of inserting an amendment; and a division was called for. The further consideration of the bill was postponed.

SATURDAY, February 16.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States to notify him of his re-election; and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. BALDWIN, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee on their part.

A motion was made,

"That a call of the Senate take place every morning at the hour to which the Senate is adjourned, and that absent members be not permitted to take their seats until a satisfactory excuse be made, or the opinion of the Senate be had thereon."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act making an appropriation for the payment of witnesses summoned on the part of the United States, in support of the impeachment of Samuel Chase," in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments yesterday proposed to the bill further providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans, which was amended as follows:

Strike out of the first section of the bill all that follows the enacting clause, and insert:

"That, for the purpose of enabling the people of Louisiana to enjoy the right of self-government, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause the territory ceded by the Republic of France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April, 1803, to be laid off on or before the — day of — into convenient election districts, having reference to population and location, and not exceeding the number of — districts; and to appoint the most convenient time thereafter, as well as place, within each of said districts, for holding an election; and to appoint in each district a proper person or persons, inhabitants of the same, respectively to preside at and to conduct the election which is hereinafter described; of all which he shall cause due notice to be given throughout each district. And on the day and at the place thus appointed, the people of every district who are hereinafter described as qualified voters, shall meet and elect for their districts, respectively, one person, to meet in Convention for the purpose of forming a constitution of government for the people of said Territory. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint time and place for the meeting of said Convention, of which he shall cause due notice to be given before the choice of the members thereof."

Strike out the residue of said bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a majority of the members chosen pursuant to this act, to meet in Convention as aforesaid, shall constitute a quorum to do business; and the Convention, when organized, may form one or two governments within said Territory; as to them shall appear most conducive to the general welfare of the people thereof; and if they form two governments they shall define the boundaries of each."

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all free white male persons, who have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and who are, at the time of the election, bona fide inhabitants of the district where they shall offer to vote, and who have been so during the period of — next before, shall be entitled to vote at the elections authorized by this act. And the person or persons presiding at the respective elections are hereby authorized to determine whether the votes shall be taken viva voce, or by ballot, and upon all questions respecting the qualifications of voters."

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, when the Convention aforesaid shall have formed a government or governments for the people of said Territory, they shall appoint a time for commencement of the operations thereof, but the time of said commencement shall be at a period so distant as to afford sufficient time to transmit the result of their deliberations to the seat of Government of the United States, and for Congress to act upon the same, if in session, or at their next session thereafter, and likewise afford time for Congress to give notice to the people of Louisiana of their determination thereon."

"And the said Convention shall, immediately upon their forming a government or governments, as aforesaid, transmit a copy thereof, duly authenticated, to the President of the United States, and, likewise, a certificate of the time they shall have fixed upon for the commencement of operations, as aforesaid; and the President shall cause the same to be laid before Congress immediately, if in session, or at the opening of the next session thereafter, that Congress may be enabled to approve or disapprove of the government or governments so formed, and further to provide for any exigencies which the nature of the case may require. And if Congress shall approve of said government or governments, so formed as aforesaid, such government or governments shall be valid, to all intents and purposes."

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and regulations now in force in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, or either of them, shall continue in force, unless altered, modified, or repealed; by the respective authorities enacting the same; or, until altered, modified, or repealed, by the local Legislatures which may be established in virtue of this act."

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of laying off said Territory into election districts, and of giving the several notifications directed by this act. For which services the President of the United States is hereby authorized to direct the payment of such sums as to him shall appear reasonable."

BURR'S ADDRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT took an affectionate leave of the Senate, in substance as follows:

"Mr. BURR began by saying that he had intended to pass the day with them, but the increase of a slight indisposition (sore throat) had determined him then to take leave of them. He touched lightly on some of the rules and orders of the House, and recommended, in one or two points, alterations, of which he briefly explained the reasons and principles.

"He said he was sensible he must at times have wounded the feelings of individual members. He had ever avoided entering into explanations at the time, because a moment of irritation was not a moment for explanation; because his position (being in the chair) rendered it impossible to enter into explanations without obvious danger of consequences which might hazard the dignity of the Senate, or prove disagreeable and injurious in more than one point of view; that he had, therefore, preferred to leave to their reflections his justification; that, on his part, he had no injuries to complain of; if any had been done or attempted, he was ignorant of the authors; and if he had ever heard, he had forgotten, for, he thanked God, he had no memory for injuries.

"He doubted not but that they had found occasion to observe, that to be prompt was not therefore to be precipitate; and that to act without delay was not always to act without reflection; that error was often to be preferred to indecision; that his errors, whatever they might have been, were those of rule and principle, and not of caprice; that it could not be deemed arrogance in him to say that, in his official conduct, he had known no party, no cause, no friend; that if, in the opinion of any, the discipline which had been established approached to rigor, they would at least admit that it was uniform and indiscriminate.

"He further remarked, that the ignorant and unthinking affected to treat as unnecessary and fastidious a rigid attention to rules and decorum; but he thought nothing trivial which touched, however remotely, the dignity of that body; and he appealed to their experience for the justice of this sentiment, and urged them in language the most impressive, and in a manner the most commanding, to avoid the smallest relaxation of the habits which he had endeavored to inculcate and establish.

"But he challenged their attention to considerations more momentous than any which regarded merely their personal honor and character—the preservation of law, of liberty, and the Constitution. This House, said he, is a sanctuary; a citadel of law, of order, and of liberty; and it is here—it is here, in this exalted refuge; here, if anywhere, will resistance be made to the storms of political phrensy and the silent arts of corruption; and if the Constitution be destined ever to perish by the sacrilegious hands of the demagogue or the usurper, which God avert, its expiring agonies will be witnessed on this floor.

"He then adverted to those affecting sentiments which attended a final separation—a dissolution, perhaps forever, of those associations which he hoped had been mutually satisfactory. He consoled himself, however, and them, with the reflection, that, though they separated, they would be engaged in the common cause of disseminating principles of freedom and social order. He should always regard the proceedings of that body with interest and with solicitude. He should feel for their honor and the national honor so intimately connected with it, and took his leave with expressions of personal respect, and with prayers, and wishes," &c.

Whereupon, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President, pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and the honorable JOSEPH ANDERSON was elected.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that, the VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate have elected the honorable JOSEPH ANDERSON President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the same to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to AARON BURR, in testimony of the impartiality, dignity, and ability, with which he has presided over their deliberations; and of their entire approbation of his conduct in discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned him as President of the Senate.

Ordered, That Messrs SMITH, of Maryland, and WHITTE, be a committee to communicate to him this resolution.

BRADLEY, and SMITH, of Maryland, were appointed managers at the same on their part.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 28th February last, on the subject and,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House, at the next meeting of Congress, such laws of Great Britain as impose any higher or greater duties on the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise, to the United States, than are imposed on similar goods, wares, and merchandise, when exported to the nations of Europe; and also to report the amount, in sterling money, of the exports to the United States, from Great Britain and Ireland, for the years 1802, 1803, 1804, on which such duties are charged.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 28th February, that a statement be exhibited of the amount of certain imported articles; and,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the House, at the next meeting of Congress, a statement, showing the value (agreeably to the prime cost) in sterling money, of Irish linens, and all other manufactures of linen, of sail duck, nails, hats, looking-glasses, plated and glass wares, ribands, silks of all kinds, printed linen and cotton, and the quality of British salt and rum, imported into the United States from Great Britain and her dependencies, during the years 1802, 1803, and 1804; and, also, the value of linens imported into the United States from all other foreign nations.

SUNDAY, March 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, and for other purposes of Indian trade and intercourse," in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate. They disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the payment of witnesses summoned on the part of the United States, in support of the impeachment of Samuel Chase."

The bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction," was read the third time as amended.

On motion, to strike out the first section of the bill, as follows:

"Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives, of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whensoever any treason, felony, misdemeanor of treason, or of felony, misdemeanor, breach of peace, or of the revenue laws of the United States, shall hereafter be committed, within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the case shall be cognizable, by, or under their authority, if the person committing the same shall be on board any foreign armed vessel, in any other port or harbor of the United States, or in the waters within their jurisdiction, it shall be the duty of any judge or justice of any court of the United States, upon satisfactory proof thereof to him made, to issue his warrant, specifying the nature of the offence, and directed to a marshal, commanding him to take the body of the offender and bring him before the said judge or justice, to be dealt with according to law. And if the said marshal shall deem the ordinary posse comitatus insufficient to insure the execution of the said warrant, he shall apply to the said judge or justice, who shall immediately issue his order directed to any officer having command of militia, or any other having command of regular troops, or of armed vessels of the United States, in the vicinity, requiring him to aid the said marshal with all the force under his command, or such part as may be necessary in executing the warrant aforesaid. And the said marshal, conforming himself in all things to the instructions which he shall receive from the President of the United States, or from any other person authorized by the President, shall first demand the surrender of the person charged with the offence; and, if delivery be not made, or if the marshal be obstructed from making the demand, he shall use all the means in his power, by force and arms, to arrest the offender, and all others who are with him giving him aid and countenance in evading the arrest, and he shall convey the said offender and all others arrested as aforesaid, and deliver them to the civil authority, to be dealt with according to law. If death ensue to the person ordered to be arrested, or to any of those giving him aid and countenance, it shall be justified, but, if to the marshal, or any of those supporting him in his discharge of duty, the persons engaged in resisting the civil authority shall be punished as in cases of felonious homicide."

It passed in the negative—yeas 2, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Logan and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bradley, Brown, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Hillhouse, Howland, Jackson, Maclay, Mitchell, Moore, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Sumter, and White.

And on the question, Shall this bill pass? It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Giles, Hillhouse, Howland, Jackson, Maclay, Mitchell, Moore, Olcott, Pickering, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Sumter, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Logan, and Plumer.

So it was, Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Patton and others;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend jurisdiction; in certain cases, to the State and Territorial Courts," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate.

A message was received from the House of Representatives informing the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to revive and make permanent the act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, passed the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and in addition to the same," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They agree to the "Resolution expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Commodore Edward Preble, the officers, seamen, and marines, of his squadron," with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. BRADLEY from the managers appointed on the part of the Senate to confer on the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war," reported that they could come to no agreement with the managers appointed on the part of the House of Representatives. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do adhere to their disagreement to the amendments insisted on by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported that they had waited on the VICE PRESIDENT, agreeably to the resolution of yesterday to which he made the following reply.

To the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: Next to the satisfaction derived from the consciousness of having discharged my duty, is that which arises from the favorable opinion of those who have been the constant witnesses of my official conduct; and the value of this flattering mark of their esteem is greatly enhanced by the promptitude and unanimity with which it is offered.

I pray you to accept my respectful acknowledgments, and the assurance of my inviolable attachment to the interests and dignity of the Senate.

MARCH 3, 1805.

A. BURR.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives on the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the payment of witnesses summoned on the part of the United States in support of the impeachment of Samuel Chase," and

Resolved, That they do insist on their said amendments, ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. GILES and BRADLEY be the managers on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for a light-house on Watch Hill Point, in the State of Rhode Island; in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, and for other purposes of Indian trade and intercourse," was read three several times, by unanimous consent, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act to provide for a light-house on Watch Hill Point, in the State of Rhode Island," was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and

On the question, shall this bill be read the third time by unanimous consent; it was objected to, so the bill was lost.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive and make permanent the 'Act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses,' passed the third day of January, 1798, and in addition to the same;" was read the first and second time by unanimous consent; and

On the question, shall this bill be read the third time by unanimous consent; it was objected to, so the bill was lost.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Patton and others," was read three several times by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the "Resolution expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Commodore Edward Preble, the officers, seamen, and marines, of his squadron;" and agreed thereto, with an amendment to their amendments.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend jurisdiction in certain cases to the State and Territorial Courts;" and agreed thereto.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the conference requested by the Senate on the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the payment of witnesses summoned on the part of the United States in support of the impeachment of Samuel Chase," and have appointed managers on their part.

Mr. GILES, from the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer on the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the payment of witnesses summoned on the part of the United States, in support of the impeachment of Samuel Chase," reported. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do adhere to their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House adhere to their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the payment of witnesses summoned on the part of the United States in support of the impeachment of Samuel Chase."

On motion,

Resolved, That Messrs. ADAMS, and SMITH, of Maryland, be a committee on the part of the Senate, with such as the House of Representatives may join, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith, and desire the appointment of a committee on their part.

Mr. ADAMS, from the committee, reported that they had waited upon the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

The Secretary was then directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn. Whereupon, the Senate adjourned.

MARCH 4, 1805.

INAUGURAL SPEECH.

On Monday, at 12 o'clock, THOMAS JEFFERSON, President of the United States, took the oath of office, and delivered the following Inaugural Speech, in the Senate Chamber, in the presence of the members of the two Houses, and a large concourse of citizens:

PROCEEDING, fellow-citizens, to that qualification which the Constitution requires before my entrance on the charge conferred on me, it is my duty to express the deep sense I entertain of this new proof of confidence from my fellow-citizens at large, and the zeal with which it inspires me so to conduct myself as may best satisfy their just expectations.

On taking this station, on a former occasion, I declared the principles on which I believed it my duty to administer the affairs of our commonwealth. My conscience tells me I have, on every occasion, acted up to that declaration, according to its obvious import, and to the understanding of every candid mind.

In the transaction of your foreign affairs, we have endeavored to cultivate the friendship of all nations, and especially of those with which we have the most important relations. We have done them justice on all occasions; favor, where favor was lawful, and cherished mutual interests and intercourse on fair and equal terms. We are firmly convinced, and we act on that conviction, that with nations, as with individuals, our interests, soundly calculated, will ever be found inseparable from our moral duties; and history bears witness to the fact, that a just nation is trusted on its word, when recourse is had to armaments and wars to bridle others.

At home, fellow-citizens, you best know whether we have done well or ill. The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These, covering our land with officers, and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation, which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching, successively, every article of property and produce. If, among these taxes, some minor ones fell, which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them; and because, if they had any merit, the State authorities might adopt them instead of others less approved.

The remaining revenue, on the consumption of foreign articles, is paid chiefly by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts. Being collected on our seaboard and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and the pride of an American to ask, what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States? These contributions enable us to support the current expenses of the Government; to fulfil contracts with foreign nations; to extinguish the native right of soil within our limits; to extend those limits; and to apply such a surplus to our public debts, as places, at a short day, their final redemption; and that redemption, once effected, the revenue thereby liberated may, by a just repartition of it among the States, and a corresponding amendment of the Constitution, be applied, in time of peace, to rivers, canals, roads, arts, manufactures, education, and other great objects, within each State. In time of war, if injustice by ourselves, or others, must sometimes produce war, increased, as the same revenue will be, by increased population and consumption, and aided by other resources reserved for that crisis, it may meet, within the year, all the expenses of the year, without encroaching on the rights of future generations, by burdening them with the debts of the past. War will then be but a suspension of useful works; and a return to a state of peace, a return to the progress of improvement.

I have said, fellow-citizens, that the income reserved had enabled us to extend our limits; but that extension may possibly pay for itself before we are called on; and, in the mean time, may keep down the accruing interest: in all events, it will replace the advances we shall have made. I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some, from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger its union. But who can limit the extent to which the federative principle may operate effectively? The larger our association, the less will it be shaken by local passions: and, in any view, is it not better that the opposite bank of the Mississippi should be settled by our own brethren and children, than by strangers of another family? With which should we be most likely to live in harmony and friendly intercourse?

In matters of religion, I have considered that its free exercise is placed by the Constitution independent of the powers of the General Government. I have therefore undertaken, on no occasion, to prescribe the religious exercises suited to it; but have left them, as the Constitution found them, under the direction and discipline of the Church or State authorities acknowledged by the several religious societies.

The aboriginal inhabitants of these countries I have regarded with the commiseration their history inspires. Endowed with the faculties and the rights of men, breathing an ardent love of liberty and independence, and occupying a country which left them no desire but to be undisturbed, the stream of overflowing population from other regions directed itself on these shores. Without power to divert, or habits to contend against it, they have been overwhelmed by the current, or driven before it. Now reduced within limits too narrow for the hunter state, humanity enjoins us to teach them agriculture and the domestic arts; to encourage them to that industry which alone can enable them to maintain their place in existence; and to prepare them in time for that state of society which, to bodily comforts, adds the improvement of the mind and morals. We have therefore liberally furnished them with the implements of husbandry and household use; we have placed among them instructors in the arts of first necessity; and they are covered with theegis of the law against aggressors from among ourselves.

But the endeavors to enlighten them on the fate which awaits their present course of life, to induce them to exercise their reason, follow its dictates, and change their pursuits with the change of circumstances, have powerful obstacles to encounter. They are combatted by the habits of their bodies, prejudices of their minds, ignorance, pride, and the influence of interested and crafty individuals among them, who feel themselves something in the present order of things, and fear to become nothing in any other. These persons inculcate a sanctimonious reverence for the customs of their ancestors; that whatsoever they did, must be done through all time; that reason is a false guide, and to advance under its counsel in their physical, moral, or political condition, is perilous innovation; that their duty is to remain as their Creator made them; ignorance being safety, and knowledge full of danger. In short, my friends, among them, also, is seen the action and counteraction of good sense and of bigotry. They, too, have their anti-philosophists, who find an interest in keeping things in their present state; who dread reformation, and exert all their faculties to maintain the ascendancy of habit over the duty of improving our reason, and obeying its mandates.

In giving these outlines, I do not mean, fellow-citizens, to arrogate to myself the merit of the measures—that is due, in the first place, to the reflecting character of our citizens at large, who, by the weight of public opinion, influence and strengthen the public measures. It is due to the sound discretion with which they select from among themselves those to whom they confide the Legislative duties. It is due to the zeal and wisdom of the characters thus selected, who lay the foundations of public happiness in wholesome laws, the execution of which alone remains for others; and it is due to the able and faithful auxiliaries, whose patriotism has associated them with me in the Executive functions.

During this course of Administration, and in order to disturb it, the artillery of the press has been levelled against us, charged with whatsoever its licentiousness could devise or dare. These abuses of an institution, so important to freedom and science, are deeply to be regretted, inasmuch as they tend to lessen its usefulness, and to sap its safety. They might, indeed, have been corrected by the wholesome punishments reserved to, and provided by, the laws of the several States against falsehood and defamation; and public duties, more urgent, press on the time of public servants, and the offenders have therefore been left to find their punishment in the public indignation.

Nor was it uninteresting to the world, that an experiment should be fairly and fully made, whether freedom of discussion, unaided by power, is not sufficient for the propagation and protection of truth? Whether a Government, conducting itself in the true spirit of its Constitution, with zeal and purity, and doing no act which it would be unwilling the whole world should witness, can be written down by falsehood and defamation? The experiment has been tried. You have witnessed the scene. Our fellow-citizens looked on cool and collected. They saw the latent source from which these outrages proceeded. They gathered around their public functionaries; and when the Constitution called them to the decision by suffrage, they pronounced their verdict honorable to those who had served them, and consolatory to the friend of man, who believes that he may be trusted with the control of his own affairs.

No inference is here intended, that the laws provided by the States against false and defamatory publications, should not be enforced. He who has time, renders a service to public morals and public tranquillity, in reforming these abuses by the salutary coercions of the law. But the experiment is noted to prove, that, since truth and reason have maintained their ground against false opinions, in league with false facts, the press, confined to truth, needs no other legal restraint. The public judgment will correct false reasonings and opinions, on a full hearing of all parties; and no other definite line can be drawn between the inestimable liberty of the press, and its demoralizing licentiousness. If there be still improprieties which this rule would not restrain, its supplement must be sought in the censorship of public opinion.

Contemplating, the union of sentiment now manifested so generally, as auguring harmony and happiness to our future course, I offer to our country sincere congratulations. With those, too, not yet rallied to the same point, the disposition to do so is gaining strength. Facts are piercing through the veil drawn over them; and our doubting brethren will at length see that the mass of their fellow-citizens, with whom they cannot yet resolve to act, as to principles and measures, think as they think, and desire what they desire: that our wish, as well as theirs, is, that the public efforts may be directed honestly to the public good; that peace be cultivated; civil and religious liberty unassailed; law and order preserved; equality of rights maintained; and that state of property, equal or unequal, which results to every man from his own industry, or that of his father's. When satisfied of these views, it is not in human nature that they should not approve and support them. In the mean time, let us cherish them with patient affection; let us do them justice, and more than justice, in all competitions of interest; and we need not doubt that truth, reason, and their own interests, will at length prevail; will gather them into the fold of their country, and will complete that entire union of opinion which gives to a nation the blessing of harmony, and the benefit of all its strength.

I shall now enter on the duties to which my fellow-citizens have again called me, and shall proceed in the spirit of those principles which they have approved. I fear not that any motives of interest may lead me astray. I am sensible of no passion which could seduce me, knowingly, from the path of justice; but the weaknesses of human nature, and the limits of my own understanding, will produce errors of judgment, sometimes injurious to your interests. I shall need, therefore, all the indulgence which I have heretofore experienced from my constituents. The want of it will certainly not lessen with increasing years. I shall need, too, the favor of that Being in whose hands we are; who led our fathers, as Israel of old, from their native land, and planted them in a country flowing with all the necessities and comforts of life; who has covered our infancy with His providence, and our riper years with His wisdom and power; and to whose goodness I ask you to join in supplications with me, that He will so enlighten the minds of your servants, guide their councils, and prosper their measures, that, whatsoever they do, shall result in your good, and shall secure to you the peace, friendship, and approbation of all nations.

After which, the Chief Justice of the United States administered to him the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution; and the oath was, in like manner, administered to GEORGE CLINTON, Vice President of the United States; after which, the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT retired.

TRIAL OF SAMUEL CHASE,

AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, IMPEACHED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS, BEFORE THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

[TAKEN IN SHORT-HAND BY SAMUEL H. SMITH AND THOMAS LLOYD.]

---

[The following report of the trial of SAMUEL CHASE has been drawn up with the greatest care. To guard against misconception or omission, two individuals, one of whom is a professional stenographer, were constantly engaged during the whole course of the trial; and the arguments of the managers and counsel have in most instances, and whenever it was attainable, been revised by them. It is with some satisfaction that the editor of this impression is enabled, under these circumstances, to submit to the public a tract, whose fidelity and comprehensiveness, he hopes will amply reward the interest so deeply excited by the progress and issue of this important trial.—Editor National Intelligencer.]

MEASURES PRELIMINARY TO THE TRIAL.

On the fifth day of January 1804, Mr. J. RANDOLPH, a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, rose and addressed that body to the following effect:

He observed "That no people were more fully impressed with the importance of preserving unpolluted the fountain of justice than the citizens of these States. With this view the Constitution of the United States, and of many of the States also, had rendered the magistrates who decided judicially between the State and the offending citizens, and between man and man, more independent than those of any other country in the world, in the hope that every inducement, whether of intimidation or seduction, which should cause them to swerve from the duty assigned to them, might be removed. But such was the frailty of human nature, that there was no precaution by which our integrity and honor could be preserved, in case we were deficient in that duty which we owed to ourselves. In consequence, sir," said Mr. Randolph, "of this unfortunate condition of man, we have been obliged, but yesterday, to prefer an accusation against a judge of the United States, who has been found wanting in his duty to himself and his country. At the last session of Congress, a gentleman from Pennsylvania did, in his place, (on a bill to amend the judicial system of the United States,) state certain facts, in relation to the official conduct of an eminent judicial character, which I then thought, and still think, the House bound to notice. But the lateness of the session (for we had, if I mistake not, scarce a fortnight remaining) precluding all possibility of bringing the subject to any efficient result, I did not then think proper to take any steps in the business. Finding my attention, however, thus drawn to a consideration of the character of the officer in question, I made it my business, considering it my duty, as well to myself as those whom I represent, to investigate the charges then made and the official character of the judge, in general. The result having convinced me that there exists ground of impeachment against this officer, I demand an inquiry into his conduct, and therefore submit to the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of SAMUEL CHASE, one of the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to report their opinion, whether the said SAMUEL CHASE hath so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House."

A short debate immediately arose on this motion, which was advocated by Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, SMILIE, and J. CLAY; and opposed by Mr. ELLIOT. Several members supported a motion to postpone it until the ensuing day, which was superseded by an adjournment of the House.

The House, on the next day, resumed the consideration of Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, which was supported by Mr. SMILIE, and, on the motion of Mr. LEIB, so amended as to embrace an inquiry into the official conduct of Richard Peters, district judge for the District of Pennsylvania. On the motion, thus amended, further debate arose, which occupied the greater part of this and the ensuing day. It was supported by Messrs. FINDLEY, JACKSON, NICHOLSON, HOLLAND, J. RANDOLPH, EUSTIS, EARLY, SMILIE, and EPPES; and opposed by Messrs. LOWNDES, R. GRISWOLD, ELLIOT, DENNIS, GRIFFIN, THATCHER, HUGER, and DANA. Some ineffectual attempts were made to amend the resolution, when the final question was taken on the resolution, as amended, in the following words:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, and to report their opinion, whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so acted in their judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House."

Trial of Judge Chase.

And resolved in the affirmative—years 81, says 40, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., Nathaniel Alexander, David Bard, George Michael Bedinger, Phaneul Bishop, William Blackledge, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, Levi Casey, Joseph Clay, John Clopton, Jacob Crowninshield, Richard Cutts, William Dickson, John B. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, and Lemuel Williams.

Whereupon, Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, NICHOLSON, J. CLAY, EARLY, R. GRISWOLD, HUGER, and BOYLE, were appointed a committee pursuant to the foregoing resolution.

On the 10th of January, the committee were authorized by the House to send for persons, papers, and records; and on the 30th day of the same month they were authorized to cause to be printed such documents and papers, as they might deem necessary, previous to their presentation to the House.

On the 6th day of March, Mr. RANDOLPH, in the name of the committee, made a report, "That in consequence of the evidence collected by them, in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, and which is hereunto subjoined, they are of opinion, 1st. That Samuel Chase, Esq., an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

"2d. That Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, has not so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House."

This report, accompanied by a great mass of printed documents, embracing various depositions taken before the committee, as well as at a distance, was made the order of the day for the Monday following.

On that day the House took up the report, and after a short debate concurred in the first resolution by the following votes—years 73, nays 32, as follows:

The second resolution was agreed to unanimously.

Whereupon, it was ordered, that Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH and Mr. EARLY be appointed a committee to go to the Senate, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices, of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same. It was also ordered, that the committee do demand, that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase, to answer to the said impeachment.

On the 13th of March, Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, NICHOLSON, J. CLAY, EARLY, and BOYLE, were appointed a committee to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, and invested with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Trial of Judge Chase.

On the 14th, a message was received from the Senate, notifying the House, that they would take proper order on the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House.

On the 26th, Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase. No order was taken on the report during the remainder of the session, which terminated the next day.

At the ensuing session of Congress, on the 6th of November 1804, on the motion of Mr. J. RANDOLPH, the articles of impeachment were referred to Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, J. CLAY, EARLY, BOYLE, and J. RHEA, of Tennessee.

On the 30th of November, Mr. RANDOLPH reported the following articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, in substance, not dissimilar from those reported at the last session, with the addition of two new articles:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors:

ARTICLE 1. That, unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," the said Samuel Chase, on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, viz:

1. In delivering an opinion, in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defence:

2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client:

3. In debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt, or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give:

In consequence of which irregular conduct of the said Samuel Chase, as dangerous to our liberties as it is novel to our laws and usages, the said John Fries was deprived of the right secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death without having been heard by counsel in his defence, to the disgrace of the character of the American bench, in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the rights of juries, on which, ultimately, rest the liberty and safety of the American people.

ART. 2. That, prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred, for the district of Virginia, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the said trial because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words charged to be libellous in the indictment were extracted; and the said Basset was accordingly sworn and did serve on the said jury, by whose verdict the prisoner was subsequently convicted.

ART. 3. That, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, on pretence that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact.

ART. 4. That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance; viz:

1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above named John Taylor, the witness.

2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest, that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term:

3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law to which the conduct of the judge did, at the same time, manifestly tend:

4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which at length induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment:

5. In an indecent solicitude manifested by the said Samuel Chase for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.

ART. 5. And whereas it is provided by the act of Congress, passed on the 24th day of September, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found: and whereas it is provided by the laws of Virginia, that upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court, yet the said Samuel Chase did, at the court aforesaid, award a capias against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offence not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 6. And whereas it is provided by the 34th section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply; and whereas, by the laws of Virginia it is provided, that, in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall have been made, yet the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial, during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 7. That, at a circuit court of the United States for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge, and stoop to the level of an informer, by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared, through their foreman, that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury, that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood "that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order—that the name of 'this printer was'—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum he was committing, added, "that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of 'this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter," or words to that effect; and that, with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question, the said Samuel Chase did; moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the District Attorney of the United States the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded, (and which were understood to be those published under the title of "Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser,") and, by a strict examination of them, to find some passage which might furnish the ground-work of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper; thereby degrading his high judicial functions, and tending to impair the public confidence in, and respect for, the tribunals of justice, so essential to the general welfare.

ART. 8. And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those Governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony, without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred and three, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against their State government and constitution, a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming, in a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and moreover that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against the Government of the United States, by delivering opinions, which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra-judicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested, to the low purpose of an electioneering partizan.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any farther articles, or other accusation, or impeachment, against the said Samuel Chase, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Samuel Chase may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as are agreeable to law and justice.

This report was made the order for the 3d of December. On that and the ensuing day the House took the articles into consideration, to all of which they agreed, according to the following votes:

On the 5th, the House proceeded to the choice, by ballot, of seven managers to conduct the impeachment; and on counting the votes, Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, RODNEY, NICHOLSON, EARLY, BOYLE, NELSON, and G. W. CAMPBELL, appeared to be elected.

On a subsequent day, Mr. NELSON having declined his appointment, on account of absence, Mr. CLARK was chosen in his place.

The following resolution was then adopted:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House be exhibited in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, in maintenance of their impeachment against him, for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

The Senate having appointed the 7th of December for receiving the articles of impeachment, the managers repaired on that day, at 1 o'clock, to the Senate Chamber. Having taken seats assigned them within the bar, and the Sergeant-at-Arms having proclaimed silence, Mr. J. RANDOLPH read the foregoing articles: whereupon the President of the Senate informed the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House of Representatives. The managers delivered the articles of impeachment at the table and withdrew.

On the 10th of December, the Senate, sitting as a High Court of Impeachments, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons to Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to answer certain articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on Friday last: That the said summons be returnable the 2d day of January, and be served at least fifteen days before the return day thereof.

On the 24th and 31st of December, the Senate adopted the following rules of proceeding, to be observed in cases of impeachment.

1. Whensoever the Senate shall receive notice from the House of Representatives, that managers are appointed on their part, to conduct an impeachment against any person, and are directed to carry such articles to the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate shall immediately inform the House of Representatives, that the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting such articles of impeachment, agreeably to the said notice.

2. When the managers of an impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against any person, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation; who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, articles of impeachment against ——" after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers, that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

3. A summons shall issue, directed to the person impeached, in the form following:

The United States of America, ss.

The Senate of the United States, to —, greeting:

Whereas, the House of Representatives of the United States of America, did, on the — day of — exhibit to the Senate, articles of impeachment against you, the said —, in the words following, viz: [here recite the articles] and did demand that you the said — should be put to answer the accusations as set forth in said articles; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, might be thereupon had, as are agreeable to law and justice: You, the said —, are therefore hereby summoned, to be, and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, at their Chamber in the City of Washington, on the — day of —, then and there to answer to the said articles of impeachment, and then and there to abide by, obey, and perform such orders and judgments as the Senate of the United States shall make in the premises, according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. Hereof you are not to fail.

Witness, —, Vice President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the City of Washington, this — day of — in the year of our Lord, — and of the independence of the United States, the —.

Which summons shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate, and sealed with their seal, and served by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, or by such other person as the Senate shall specially appoint for that purpose; who shall serve the same, pursuant to the directions given in the form next following:

4. A precept shall be endorsed on said writ of summons, in the form following, viz:

United States of America, ss:

The Senate of the United States, to —, greeting:

You are hereby commanded to deliver to, and leave with —, if to be found, a true and attested copy of the within writ of summons, together with a like copy of this precept, showing him both; or in case he cannot with convenience be found, you are to leave true and attested copies of the said summons and precept, at his usual place of residence, and in whichever way you perform the service, let it be done at least — days before the appearance day mentioned in said writ of summons. Fail not, and make return of this writ of summons and precept, with your proceedings thereon endorsed, on or before the appearance day mentioned in said writ of summons.

Witness, —, Vice President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the City of Washington, this — day of —, in the year of our Lord —, and of the Independence of the United States, the —.

Which precept shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate, and sealed with their seal.

5. Subpoenas shall be issued by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the application of the managers of the impeachment, or of the party impeached, or his counsel, in the following form, to wit:

To —, greeting:

You, and each of you, are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate of the United States, on the — day of —, at the Senate Chamber, in the City of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before the Senate, in which the House of Representatives have impeached —. Fail not.

Witness, —, Vice President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the City of Washington, this — day of —, in the year of our Lord —, and of the Independence of the United States, the —.

Which shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate, and sealed with their seal.

Which subpoenas shall be directed, in every case, to the Marshal of the district, where such witnesses respectively reside, to serve and return.

6. The form of direction to the Marshal, for the service of the subpoena, shall be as follows:

The Senate of the United States of America, to the Marshal of the district of —:

You are hereby commanded to serve and return the within subpoena, according to law.

Dated at Washington, this — day of —, in the year of our Lord —, and of the Independence of the United States, the —.

Secretary of the Senate.

7. The President of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and all the forms of proceeding, while the Senate are sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial, not otherwise specially provided for by the Senate.

8. He shall also be authorized to direct the employment of the Marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons, during the trial, to discharge such duties as may be prescribed by him.

9. At twelve o'clock of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the Legislative and Executive business of the Senate shall be suspended and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer, in the form following, viz: "I, —, do solemnly swear, that the return made and subscribed by me, upon the process issued on the — day of —, by the Senate of the United States, against —, is truly made, and that I have performed said services as therein described. So help me God." Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

10. The person impeached shall then be called to appear, and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly, if by himself, or if by agent or attorney; naming the person appearing, and the capacity in which he appears. If he does not appear, either personally, or by agent or attorney, the same shall be recorded.

11. At twelve o'clock of the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment, the Legislative and Executive business of the Senate shall be postponed. The Secretary shall then administer the following oath or affirmation to the President:

"You solemnly swear, or affirm, that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of —, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws of the United States."

12. And the President shall administer the said oath or affirmation to each Senator present.

The Secretary shall then give notice to the House of Representatives, that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of —, in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

13. Counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear, and be heard upon an impeachment.

14. All motions made by the parties, or their counsel, shall be addressed to the President of the Senate, and if he shall require it, shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table; and all decisions shall be had by yeas and nays, and without debate, which shall be entered on the records.

15. Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, to wit: "You — do swear, (or affirm, as the case may be,) that the evidence you shall give in the case now depending between the United States and —, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God." Which oath shall be administered by the Secretary.

16. Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross-examined in the usual form.

17. If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn, and give his testimony standing in his place.

18. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, it shall be reduced to writing and put by the President.

19. At all times, whilst the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment, the doors of the Senate Chamber shall be kept open.

HIGH COURT OF IMPEACHMENTS.

WEDNESDAY, January 2, 1805.

The Court having been opened by proclamation, The return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms was read, as follows:

"I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within summons to me directed, did proceed to the residence of the within named Samuel Chase, on the 12th day of December, 1804, and did then and there leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, together with a true copy of the articles of impeachment annexed, with him the said Samuel Chase.

"JAMES MATHERS."

After which the Secretary administered to him the oath as follows:

"You, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear, that the return made and subscribed by you, upon the process issued on the 10th day of December last, by the Senate of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, is truly made, and that you have performed said services as therein described. So help you God."

SAMUEL CHASE, having been solemnly called, appeared.

The President of the Senate (Mr. BURR) informed Mr. CHASE, that having been summoned to answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, the Senate were ready to receive any answer he had to make to them.

Mr. CHASE requested the indulgence of a chair,* which was immediately furnished.

After being seated for a short time, Mr. CHASE rose, and commenced the following address to the Senate, which he read from a paper that he held in his hand:

"Mr. President: I appear, in obedience to a summons from this honorable Court, to answer articles of impeachment exhibited against me, by the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States.

"To these articles, a copy of which was delivered to me with the summons, I say that I have committed no crime or misdemeanor whatsoever, for which I am subject to impeachment according to the Constitution of the United States. I deny, with a few exceptions, the acts with which I am charged; I shall contend, that all acts admitted to have been done by me were legal; and I deny, in every instance, the improper intentions with which the acts charged are alleged to have been done, and in which their supposed criminality altogether consists."

* We understand, that in correspondence with the Parliamentary practice of England, no chair was, previously to the introduction of Mr. Chase, assigned him; but that an informal intimation was made to him, that, on his requesting it, it would be allowed.

Trial of Judge Chase.

The PRESIDENT reminded Mr. Chase that this was the day appointed to receive any answer he might make to the articles of impeachment.

Mr. CHASE said his purpose was to request the allowance of further time to put in his answer.

The PRESIDENT desired him to proceed.

Mr. CHASE proceeded in his address:

"But in charges of so heinous a nature, urged by so high an authority, a simple denial is not sufficient. It behooves me, for the legal justification of my conduct, and for the vindication of my character, to meet each charge with a full and particular answer; to explain and refute at length every principle urged against me; to state the evidence by which I am to disprove every fact relied on in support of the accusation; and to detail all the facts and arguments on which my defence is to rest. The necessity of an answer embracing all these objects, in cases of impeachment, is obvious; and the right to make it, is secured by law and sanctioned by uniform practice.

'Such an answer it is my intention to make. It is my purpose to submit the whole ground of my defence to the view of this honorable Court, of my country, of the world, and of those who are to conduct the prosecution. So will my judges come to the trial with that full knowledge of the whole matter in dispute, which is essential for enabling them to understand and apply the testimony and the arguments; and the honorable managers will be better prepared to refute such parts of my defence as they may think untenable."

The PRESIDENT here interrupted Mr. Chase; and asked if the paper he was reading was intended for his answer; if so, it would be put on file. If it was the prelude to a motion he meant to make, praying to be allowed further time for putting in his answer, he would confine himself strictly to what had relation to that object. From the tenor of what had been urged it had appeared to him as intended for an answer to the articles of impeachment.

Mr. CHASE said it was not his answer that he was reading; but that he was assigning reasons, why he could not now answer, in order to show that he was entitled to further time to prepare and put in his answer.

PRESIDENT.—You, who are so conversant in the practice of courts of law, know very well that a motion for time must not be founded on mere suggestions, but must be founded on some facts to prove the propriety of the motion.

Mr. CHASE said he meant to show the impracticability of his answering at this time, from the articles themselves, and it was for that purpose he had made an allusion to them.

The PRESIDENT said, with the caution he had given, he might proceed, provided no objection were made by any gentleman of the Senate.

Mr. CHASE proceeded in his address:

"But in a case of this kind, where the accusation embraces so great a variety of charges, of principles, and of facts, it is manifest, that preparing such an answer, as I have a right to make and as my duty to myself, my family, my friends and my country, requires at my hand, a considerable time must be necessary.

"Many of the principles involved in this impeachment, are very important not only to me, but to the liberties of every American citizen, and to the cause of free government in general. These principles ought to be maturely considered, and clearly explained. They present a wide field of legal investigation; many of them require laborious and extensive research, and although some of them have accompanied the prosecution from its commencement, and have thus been for a considerable time subjected to my consideration; some, on the other hand, have been very recently introduced.

"Of this description is the principle, whereon the 5th and 6th articles rest: relative to the extent in which the courts of the United States are to be governed, not only in their decisions, but in their proceedings by the State laws. A principle which was not brought into view until a few weeks ago, and the explanation of which will require a careful consideration, of the conduct and proceedings of the supreme and circuit courts of the United States, from the first establishment of our federal system.

"The same articles involve the construction of two State laws of Virginia, which I am charged with having infringed in the trial of Callender, which were not mentioned on the trial, or during any of the introductory proceedings, and of which I never heard until these articles were reported a few weeks ago. It is manifest that in order to fix the true construction of these laws, about which professional men have differed in opinion, recourse must be had to the decisions of the courts of that State, as explained by their records; or in case those records should be silent, to the recollection and opinion of professional men, accustomed to preside or attend in the courts where those laws are enforced. It is manifest that such an investigation cannot be accomplished in a short time.

"The facts on which this prosecution rests, except the last article, are alleged to have taken place more than four years ago; some of them at Philadelphia, some at Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, and some at Richmond, in Virginia. These facts are very numerous, and the greater part of them are of such a nature, as to depend, for their criminality or innocence, on minute circumstances, or slight shades of testimony, and often on the different manner in which the same circumstances may affect different spectators, all equally disposed to represent truly what they observed. The most material facts are alleged to have happened in Richmond and Philadelphia. In the former of these places I am an utter stranger, having never been there but once; and in the latter, I know personally but very few individuals. These circumstances render it very difficult for me to ascertain the persons who witnessed the various transactions in question, and are able, after this lapse of time, to give accurate testimony concerning them; and this difficulty is very much increased, by the distance of those places from that of my residence. I assure this honorable court, that from the moment when this prosecution assumed a serious appearance and a definitive form, at the last session of Congress, I have turned my attention to the subject of my defence, and my answer, and have exerted myself in finding out and procuring the requisite testimony; but the difficulties which I have stated, added to my ill state of health during a great part of the last year, have prevented me from making such progress as to afford me the hope of being able to obtain the object in a very short time. I have done much, but much, very much, remains to be done, even in those parts of the prosecution where I had some notice by the proceedings of last session. In those very material parts which have originated during the present session, everything is still to be done.

"It may perhaps be thought, that although these preparations might be necessary for the trial, they are not so for the answer. But such an opinion, I trust, would on examination be found erroneous.

"The answer, in cases of impeachment, must disclose the whole defence, and the defence must be confined to the matters stated in the answer. Otherwise the prosecutors might be surprised at the trial, by objections which with previous notice, it would be in their power to refute or explain. The accused, therefore, before he puts in his answer, ought to have times sufficient for making himself thoroughly master of his defence, of the grounds on which it rests, and of the facts and evidence by which it is to be supported. He ought to be completely prepared for the trial; between which and the answer no delay need to take place, except such as may be necessary for convening the witnesses.

"In so material a part of his preparation for defence, as the drawing up of his answer, it will not, I presume, be denied, that he ought to have an opportunity of obtaining the best professional assistance which it may be in his power to procure. This assistance is rendered peculiarly necessary to me, by the very precarious state of my health; which affords me, at this season of the year, especially, but short and uncertain intervals of fitness for mental or bodily exertion. Should my answer be required in a short time, I have no reason to suppose that I shall be able to obtain such assistance of this kind as I so much need, and as probably, I shall otherwise have in my power. Professional gentlemen, engaged extensively in business, are at all times too liable to interruption, and too much occupied to devote themselves exclusively to an affair of this nature, so as to complete it within a short period; and at this season of the year, they are for the most part particularly and indispensably engaged.

"These reasons in favor of a liberal allowance of time for preparing the answer, derive great additional force from one further consideration, which I hope that I may, without impropriety, present to the view of this honorable Court. Reputation ought to be more dear to every man, and is more dear to me than the honors or the emoluments of office. In cases of impeachment, the facts which appear, the explanations which are given, and the arguments which are urged, at the trial, are sometimes wholly omitted in the statements given to the public, and often misrepresented, or stated too indistinctly to be generally understood. It is to the answer that the world must look for the justification of the accused. It is by his answer alone, that he can furnish a clear, concise, and authentic explanation of his conduct and his motives, supported by such a statement of his proofs, as can be extensively read, clearly understood, and easily remembered. He may, therefore, claim from justice, and expect from the high dignity and responsible character of this honorable tribunal, such time for preparing this very important document, as may enable him to bestow on it all the care and labor which it requires, and to give it all the force of which it may be susceptible.

"In stating these considerations, Mr. President, in support of my request for a continuance of this case, I disclaim all intention of affected delay. Feeling a consciousness of my integrity, and a just pride of character, which place me far above the fear of events, I am anxious to meet this accusation, and I rejoice in an opportunity of refuting it. I know that my conduct, though liable to a full portion of human error, has at all times been free from intentional impropriety. I know that, in all the instances selected as the grounds of accusation, I have discharged my official duties, with a sacred and inviolate regard to my oath, my character, the laws of my country, and the rights of my fellow-citizens. I know that I can prove my innocence as to all the matters alleged against me. And acrimonious as are the terms in which many of the accusations are conceived; harsh and opprobrious as are the epithets wherewith it has been thought proper to assail my name and character, by those who were 'pulling in their nurses' arms,' whilst I was contributing my utmost aid to lay the groundwork of American liberty; I yet thank my accusers, whose functions as members of the Government of my country I highly respect, for having at length put their charges into a definitive form, susceptible of refutation; and for having thereby afforded me an opportunity of vindicating my innocence, in the face of this honorable Court, of my country, and of the world."

On using the expressions marked in italics,

The PRESIDENT interrupted Mr. Chase, and said that observations of censure or recrimination were not admissible; it would be very improper for him to listen to observations on the statements of the House of Representatives before an answer was filed.

Mr. CHASE said he had very few words more to add, which would conclude what he had to say at the present time.

With the permission of the President he proceeded:

"But this vindication, situated as I am, and as this case is, cannot be the work of a few weeks. Much time has been employed in preparing the accusation; less will be required for the defence; but a short time will not suffice. I am far from presuming to prescribe to this honorable Court, whose sense of justice and disposition to grant every proper indulgence, I cannot doubt; but it may, perhaps, not be improper to suggest that, by the first day of next session, the answer could be prepared and put in; and that the trial might then take place as soon afterwards as the witnesses could be collected. I declare that it will be impossible for me to prepare my answer in such time as to commence the trial during this session with any prospect of bringing it to a close before the session must end; and were I to omit that full answer, which I wish to give, it would be impossible for me, in the course of this session, (only two months of which now remain,) to ascertain fully all the facts necessary for my defence; to find out and bring to this place, the witnesses and written testimony; or to make arrangements relative to that assistance of counsel which my case requires, my age and infirmities render essential, and a longer time would enable me to procure.

"I hope, Mr. President, I may be permitted to observe, that my private and professional reputation for probity and honor has never been called in question. I have sustained a high judicial character for above sixteen years, and during the first six I presided at the trial of more criminals than any other judge within the United States. During this whole period of time my official conduct has never been arraigned, except only in the trial of Cooper, Fries, and Callender, above four years ago. For the truth of these assertions, I appeal to all who know me; and particularly to the two honorable Senators from Maryland.

"In respect to the present prosecution, I will make but one remark: That I am impeached for giving, on the trial of Callender, several judicial opinions, in which Judge Griffin, my associate concurred; my opinions are held to be criminal, or that they flowed from partiality, and an intention to oppress Callender; but the same opinions given by my associate have been considered perfectly innocent.

"I have now only to solicit this honorable Court to allow me until the first day of the next session to put in my answer, and to prepare for my trial; and I submit myself as to the further proceedings in this case to the discretion of this honorable Court, in whose integrity, impartiality, and independence, I repose the highest confidence. I will not for a moment believe that the spirit of party can ever enter and pollute these walls, or that popular prejudice or political motives will be harbored in the bosom of any member in this honorable body.

"On the contrary, I hope and expect, that all its decisions will be governed by the immutable principles of justice, and a sacred regard to the Constitution and the law of the land, which every member of this Court is bound by duty, and the obligations of a Christian judge, to support and observe."

Mr. CHASE having finished his address, was desired by the President, if he had any motion to make, to reduce it to writing, and hand it to the Secretary.

Whereupon, Mr. CHASE submitted the following motion:

"I solicit this honorable Court to allow me until the first day of the next session, to put in my answer, and to prepare for my trial."

The PRESIDENT informed Mr. Chase, that the Court would take time to consider his motion.*

The Senate withdrew to a private apartment, where debate arose on the question, whether it was not incumbent on the Senators to take the oath required by the Constitution, before they took into consideration the motion of Mr. Chase, which issued in the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, on the meeting of the Senate, tomorrow, before they proceed to any business on the articles of impeachment before them, and before any decision of any question, the oath prescribed by the rules, shall be administered to the President and members of the Senate.

On the ensuing day, previously to the entrance of the Senate into the public room, considerable debate took place on the motion of Mr. Chase, without any decision being made.

THURSDAY, January 3.

The Court was opened by proclamation about two o'clock.

The oath prescribed was administered to the President by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT administered the oath prescribed to the following members:

MESSRS. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Giles, Hillhouse, Howland, Jackson, Mitchell, Moore, Olcott, Pickering, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Sumter, Tracy, White, Worthington, and Wright.

And the affirmation was administered to Messrs. Logan, Maclay, and Plumer.

The PRESIDENT stated that he had received a letter from the defendant, enclosing an affidavit that further time was necessary for him to prepare for trial; which affidavit was read, as follows:

City of Washington, ss:

Samuel Chase made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that it is not in his power to obtain information respecting the facts alleged in the articles of impeachment to have taken place in the city of Philadelphia in the trial of John Fries; or of the facts alleged to have taken place in the city of Richmond, in the trial of James T. Callender, in time to prepare and put in his answer, and to proceed to trial, with any probability that the same could be finished on or before the fifth day of March next. And further, that it is not in his power to procure information of the names of the witnesses, whom he thinks it may be proper and necessary for him to summon, in time to obtain their attendance, if his answer could be prepared in time * During these proceedings, neither the managers nor the House of Representatives were present.

sufficient for the finishing of the said trial, before the said fifth day of March next; and the said Samuel Chase further made oath, that he believes it will not be in his power to obtain the advice of counsel, to prepare his answer, and to give him their assistance on the trial, which he thinks necessary, if the said trial should take place during the present session of Congress; and that he verily believes, if he had at this time full information of facts, and of the witnesses proper for him to summon, and if he had also the assistance of counsel, that he could not prepare the answer he thinks he ought to put in, and be ready for his trial, within the space of four or five weeks from this time. And further, that his application to the honorable the Senate, for time to obtain the information of facts, in order to prepare his answer, and for time to procure the attendance of necessary witnesses, and to prepare for his defence in the trial, and to obtain the advice and assistance of counsel, is not made for the purpose of delay, but only for the purpose of obtaining a full hearing of the articles of impeachment against him, in their real merits.

SAMUEL CHASE.

Sworn to, this third day of January, 1805, before
SAMUEL HAMILTON.

Whereupon, the following motion was made by Mr. BRADLEY:

"Ordered, That Samuel Chase file his answer, with the Secretary of the Senate, to the several articles of impeachment exhibited against him, by the House of Representatives, on or before the — day of —."

A motion was made by Mr. GILES to amend the motion, and to strike out all that follows the word "Ordered," and insert "That — next shall be the day for receiving the answer, and proceeding on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase."

MR. HILLHOUSE called for a division of the question. And the yeas and nays being taken on striking out, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 10, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, White, and Wright.

On motion, to insert the amendment proposed, the yeas and nays being taken, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy, White, and Wright.

On motion, by Mr. TRACY, to fill the blank with the words "the first Monday of December next," the yeas and nays being taken, it passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Logan, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Tracy, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Giles, Howland, Jackson, Maclay, Mitchell, Moore, Smith of New York, Sumter, Worthington and Wright.

On motion, by Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, to fill the blank with the words "the fourth day of February next" the yeas and nays being taken, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Giles, Howland, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Mitchell, Moore, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Sumter, Worthington, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy and White.

On motion, to agree to the order, as amended, the yeas and nays being taken, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 9, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradley, Dayton, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Tracy and White.

So it was Ordered, That the fourth day of February next shall be the day for receiving the answer, and proceeding on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives, and Samuel Chase, thereof.

[Between this day, and that assigned for receiving the answer of Mr. Chase, the Senate Chamber was fitted up in a style of appropriate elegance. Benches, covered with crimson, on each side, and in a line with the chair of the President, were assigned to the members of the Senate. On the right and in front of the chair, a box was assigned to the Managers, and on the left a similar box to Mr. Chase, and his counsel, and chairs allotted to such friends as he might introduce. The residue of the floor was occupied with chairs for the accommodation of the members of the House of Representatives; and with boxes for the reception of the foreign Ministers, and civil and military officers of the United States. On the right and left of the Chair, at the termination of the benches of the members of the Court, boxes were assigned to stenographers. The permanent gallery was allotted to the indiscriminate admission of spectators. Below this gallery, and above the floor of the House, a new gallery was raised, and fitted up with peculiar elegance, intended primarily for the exclusive accommodation of ladies. But this feature of the arrangement, made by the Vice President, was at an early period of the trial abandoned, it having been found impracticable to separate the sexes! At the termination of this gallery, on each side, boxes were specially assigned to ladies attached to the families of public characters. The preservation of order was devolved on the Marshal of the District of Columbia, who was assisted by a number of deputies.]

Trial of Judge Chase.

TRIAL OF SAMUEL CHASE.

MONDAY, February 4, 1805.

About a quarter before ten o'clock the Court was opened by proclamation, all the members of the Senate, thirty-four, attending.

The Chamber of the Senate, which is very extensive, was soon filled with spectators, a large portion of whom consisted of ladies, who continued, with little intermission, to attend during the whole course of the trial.

The oath prescribed was administered to Mr. BAYARD, Mr. COCKE, Mr. GAILLARD, and Mr. STONE, members of the Court, who were not present when it was before administered.

Ordered. That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate are in their public chamber, and are ready to proceed on the trial of Samuel Chase; and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the members.

In a few minutes the Managers, viz: Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, RODNEY, NICHOLSON, BOYLE, G. W. CAMPBELL, EARLY, and CLARK, accompanied by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole, entered and took their seats.

SAMUEL CHASE being called to make answer to the articles of impeachment, exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, appeared, attended by Messrs. HARPER, MARTIN, and HOPKINSON, his counsel; to whom seats were assigned.

The PRESIDENT, after stating to Mr. CHASE the indulgence of time which had been allowed, inquired if he was prepared to give in his answer?

Mr. CHASE said, he had prepared it, as well as circumstances would permit; and submitted the following motion:

"Samuel Chase moves for permission to read his answer, by himself and his counsel, at the bar of this honorable Court."

The PRESIDENT asked him if it was the answer on which he meant to rely? to which he replied in the affirmative.

The motion being agreed to by a vote of the Senate, Mr. CHASE commenced the reading of his answer, (in which he was assisted by Messrs. HARPER, and HOPKINSON,) as follows:

This respondent, in his proper person, comes into the said Court, and protesting that there is no high crime or misdemeanor particularly alleged in the said articles of impeachment, to which he is, or can be bound by law to make answer; and saving to himself now, and at all times hereafter, all benefit of exception to the insufficiency of the said articles, and each of them, and to the defects therein appearing in point of law, or otherwise; and protesting also, that he ought not to be injured in any manner, by any words, or by any want of form in this his answer; he submits the following facts and observations by way of answer to the said articles.

The first article relates to his supposed misconduct in the trial of John Fries, for treason, before the circuit court of the United States at Philadelphia, in April and May 1800; and alleges that he presided at that trial, and that "unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," he did then, "in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust."

This general accusation, too vague in itself for reply, is supported by three specific charges of misconduct:

1st "In delivering an opinion, in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which, the defence of the accused materially depended:" which opinion, it is alleged, tended to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his favor.

2d. "In restricting the counsel for the said John Fries, from recurring to such English authorities, as they believed apposite; or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions, upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client."

3d. "In debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give."

This first article then concludes, that in consequence of this irregular conduct of this respondent, "the said John Fries was deprived of the right secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death, without having been heard by counsel, in his defence."

By the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, this respondent supposes is meant the sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which secures to the accused, in all criminal prosecutions, the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

In answer to these three charges, the respondent admits that the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Pennsylvania, was held at Philadelphia, in that district, in the months of April and May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred, at which court John Fries, the person named in the said first article, was brought to trial on an indictment for treason against the United States; and that this respondent then held a commission as one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, by virtue of which office he did, pursuant to the laws of the United States, preside at the above-mentioned trial, and was assisted therein by Richard Peters, Esq., then, and still district judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania; who, as directed by the laws of the United States, sat as assistant judge at the said trial.

With respect to the opinion, which is alleged to have been delivered by this respondent, at the above-mentioned trial, he begs leave to lay before this honorable Court the true state of that transaction, and to call its attention to some facts and considerations, by which his conduct on that subject will, he presumes, be fully justified.

The Constitution of the United States, in the third section of the third article, declares that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

By two acts of Congress, the first passed on the third day of March, 1791, and the second on the eighth day of May, 1792, a duty was imposed on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills; and various provisions were made for its collection.

In the year 1794, an insurrection took place in four of the western counties of Pennsylvania, with a view of resisting, and preventing by force the execution of these two statutes; and a circuit court of the United States, held at Philadelphia, for the district of Pennsylvania, in the month of April, in the year 1795, by William Patterson, Esq., then one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the above mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States, for the district of Pennsylvania, two persons, who had been concerned in the above-named insurrection, namely, Philip Vigol and John Mitchel, were indicted for treason, of levying war against the United States, by resisting and preventing by force the execution of the two last mentioned acts of Congress; and were, after a full and very solemn trial, convicted of the indictments and sentenced to death. They were afterwards pardoned by George Washington, then President of the United States.

In the first of these trials, that of Vigol, the defence of the prisoner was conducted by very able counsel, one of whom, William Lewis, Esq., is the same person who appeared as counsel for John Fries, in the trial now under consideration. Neither that learned gentleman, nor his able colleague, then thought proper to raise the question of law, "whether resisting and preventing by armed force, the execution of a particular law of the United States, be a 'levying of war against the United States,' according to the true meaning of the Constitution?" Although a decision of this question in the negative, must have acquitted the prisoner. But in the next trial, that of Mitchel, this question was asked on the part of the prisoner, and was very fully and ably discussed by his counsel; and it was solemnly determined by the court, both the judges concurring, "that to resist or prevent by armed force, the execution of a particular law of the United States, is a levying of war against the United States, and consequently is treason, within the true meaning of the Constitution." The decision, according to the best established principles of our jurisprudence, became a precedent for all courts of equal or inferior jurisdiction; a precedent which, although not absolutely obligatory, ought to be viewed with very great respect, especially by the court in which it was made, and ought never to be departed from, but on the fullest and clearest conviction of its incorrectness.

On the 9th of July, an act of Congress was passed, providing for a valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and an enumeration of slaves throughout the United States; and directing the appointment of commissioners and assessors for carrying it into execution: and on the 4th day of July, in the same year, a direct tax was laid by another act of Congress of that date, on the lands, dwelling-houses, and slaves, so to be valued and enumerated.

In the months of February and March, A. D. 1799, an insurrection took place in the counties of Bucks and Northampton, in the State of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of resisting and preventing by force, the execution of the two last mentioned acts of Congress, and particularly that for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses. John Fries, the person mentioned in the article of impeachment now under consideration, was apprehended and committed to prison, as one of the ringleaders of this insurrection; and at a circuit court of the United States, held at Philadelphia, in and for the district of Pennsylvania, in the month of April, A. D. 1799, he was brought to trial for this offence, on an indictment for treason, by levying war against the United States, before James Iredell, Esq., then one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who presided in the said court, according to law, and the above-mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States; for the district of Pennsylvania, who sat in the said circuit court as assistant judge.

In this trial, which was conducted with great solemnity, and occupied nine days, the prisoner was assisted by William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, Esqs., two very able and eminent counsellors; the former of whom, William Lewis, is the person who assisted, as above mentioned, in conducting the defence of Vigol, on a similar indictment. These gentlemen, finding that the facts alleged were fully and undeniably proved, by a very minute and elaborate examination of witnesses, thought proper to rest the case of the prisoner on the question of law which had been determined in the cases of Vigol and Mitchel, above-mentioned, and had then been acquiesced in, but which they thought proper again to raise. They contended, "that to resist by force of arms a particular law of the United States, does not amount to levying war against the United States, within the true meaning of the Constitution, and therefore is not treason, but a riot only." This question they argued at great length; and with all the force of their learning and genius; and after a full discussion at the bar, and the most mature deliberation by the court, the learned and excellent judge who then presided, and who was no less distinguished by his humanity and tenderness towards persons tried before him, than by his extensive knowledge and great talents as a lawyer, pronounced the opinion of himself and his colleague, "that to resist, or prevent by force, the execution of a particular law of the United States, does amount to levying war against them, within the true meaning of the Constitution, and does, therefore, constitute the crime of treason:" thereby adding the weight of another and more solemn decision to the precedent which had been established in the above-mentioned cases of Vigol and Mitchel.

Under this opinion of the court on the question of law, the jury, having no doubt as to the facts, found the said John Fries guilty of treason on the above-mentioned indictment. But a new trial was granted by the court, not by reason of any doubt as to the correctness of the decision on the question of law, but solely on the ground, as this respondent hath understood and believes, that one of the jurors of the petit jury, after he was summoned, but before he was sworn on the trial, had made some declaration unfavorable to the prisoner.

The yellow fever having appeared in Philadelphia in the Summer of the year 1799, the above mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, did, according to law, appoint the next circuit court of that district, to be held at Norristown therein: Pursuant to which appointment, a circuit court was held at Norristown aforesaid, in and for the said district, on the 11th day of October, in the last mentioned year, before Bushrod Washington, Esq., then one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the above mentioned Richard Peters; at which court no proceedings were had on the aforesaid indictment against John Fries, because, as this respondent hath been informed and believes, the commission of the marshal of the district had expired before he summoned the jurors to attend at the said court, and had not been renewed; by reason of which no legal panel of jurors could be formed.

On the 11th day of April, 1800, and from that day until the 2d day of May in the same year, a circuit court of the United States was held at Philadelphia, in and for the district of Pennsylvania, before this respondent, then one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the above mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania. At this court the indictment on which the said John Fries had been convicted as above-mentioned, was quashed ex officio by William Rawle, Esq., then attorney of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, and a new indictment was by him preferred against the said John Fries, for treason of levying war against the United States, by resisting and preventing by force in the manner above set forth, the execution of the above-mentioned acts of Congress, for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves, and for levying and collecting a direct tax. This indictment, of which a true copy, marked No. 1, is herewith exhibited by this respondent, who prays that it may be taken as part of this his answer, being found by the grand jury on the 16th day of April, 1800, the said John Fries was on the same day arraigned thereon, and plead not guilty. William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, Esqrs., the same persons who had conducted his defence at his former trial, were again at his request assigned by the court as his counsel; and his trial was appointed to be had on Tuesday the 23d day of the last mentioned month of April.

After this indictment was found by the grand jury, this respondent considered it with great care and deliberation, and finding from the three overt acts of treason which it charged, that the question of law arising upon it was the same question which had already been decided twice in the same court, on solemn argument and deliberation, and once in that very case, he considered the law as settled by those decisions, with the correctness of which, on full consideration, he was entirely satisfied; and by the authority of which he should have deemed himself bound, even had he regarded the question as doubtful in itself. They are moreover in perfect conformity with the uniform tenor of decisions in the courts of England and Great Britain, from the Revolution in 1688 to the present time, which, in his opinion, added greatly to their weight and authority.

And surely he need not urge to this honorable Court, the correctness, the importance, and the absolute necessity of adhering to principles of law once established, and of considering the law as finally settled, after repeated and solemn decisions by courts of competent jurisdiction. A contrary principle would unsettle the basis of our whole system of jurisprudence, hitherto our safeguard and our boast; would reduce the law of the land, and subject the rights of the citizen to the arbitrary will, the passions, or the caprice, of the judge in each particular case, and would substitute the varying opinions of various men, instead of that fixed, permanent rule, in which the very essence of law consists. If this respondent erred in regarding this point as settled, by the repeated and solemn adjudications of his predecessors in the same court and in the same case; if he erred in supposing that a principle established by two solemn decisions was obligatory upon him, sitting in the same court where those decisions had been made; if he erred in believing that it would be the highest presumption in him to set up his opinion and judgment over that of his colleague, who had twice decided the same question, and of two of his predecessors, who justly rank among the ablest judges that have ever adorned a court; if in all this he erred, it is an error of which he cannot be ashamed, and which he trusts will not be deemed criminal in the eyes of this honorable Court, of his country, or of that posterity by which he, his accusers, and his judges, must one day be judged.

Under the influence of these considerations this respondent drew up an opinion on the law, arising from the overt acts stated in the said indictment, which was conformable to the decisions before given as above-mentioned, and which he sent to his colleague the said Richard Peters for his consideration. That gentleman returned it to this respondent, with some amendments affecting the form only, but not in any manner touching the substance.

Trial of Judge Chase.

The opinion, thus agreed to, this respondent thought it proper to communicate to the prisoner's counsel; several reasons concurred in favor of this communication. In the first place this respondent considered himself and the court as bound by the authority of the former decisions, especially the last of them, which was on the same case. He considered the law as settled, and had every reason to believe that his colleague viewed it in the same light. It was not suggested or understood that any new evidence was to be offered; and he knew that if any should be offered, which could vary the case, it would render wholly inapplicable both the opinion and the former decisions in which it was founded. And he could not and did not suppose that the prisoner's counsel would be desirous of wasting very precious time, in addressing to the court an useless argument on a point which that court held itself precluded from deciding in their favor. He therefore conceived that it would be rendering the counsel a service, and a favor to apprise them beforehand of the view which the court had taken of the subject, so as to let them see in time the necessity of endeavoring to produce new testimony, which might vary the case, and take it out of the authority of former decisions.

Secondly, there were more than one hundred civil causes then depending in the said court, as appears by the exhibit marked No. 1, which this respondent prays may be taken as part of this, his answer. Many of those causes had already been subjected to great delay, and it was the peculiar duty of this respondent, as presiding judge, to take care that as little time as possible should be unnecessarily consumed, and that every convenient and proper dispatch should be given to the business of the citizens. He did believe that an early communication of the court's opinion might tend to the saving of time, and consequently to the dispatch of business.

Thirdly, as the court held itself bound by the former decisions, and could not therefore alter its opinion in consequence of any argument; and as it was the duty of the court to charge the jury on the law in all cases submitted to their consideration, he knew that this opinion must not only be made known at some period or other of the trial, but must at the end of the trial be expressly delivered to the jury by him in a charge from the bench: and he could not suppose and cannot yet imagine, that an opinion, which was to be thus solemnly given in charge to the jury at the close of the trial, could make any additional impression on their minds from the circumstance of its being intimated to the counsel before the trial began, in the hearing of those who might be afterwards sworn on the jury.

And lastly, it was then his opinion, and still is, that it is the duty of every court of this country, and was his duty on the trial now under consideration, to guard the jury against erroneous impressions respecting the laws of the land. He well knows that it is the right of juries in criminal cases to give a general verdict of acquittal, which cannot be set aside on account of its being contrary to law, and that hence results the power of juries to decide on the law as well as on the facts in all criminal cases. This power he holds to be a sacred part of our legal privileges, which he never has attempted, and never will attempt to abridge or to obstruct. But he also knows, that in the exercise of this power, it is the duty of the jury to govern themselves by the laws of the land, over which they have no dispensing power; and their right to expect and receive from the court all the assistance which it can give for rightly understanding the law. To withhold this assistance in any manner whatever; to forbear to give it in that way which may be most effectual for preserving the jury from error and mistake, would be an abandonment or forgetfulness of duty, which no judge could justify to his conscience or to the laws. In this case, therefore, where the question of law arising on the indictment had been finally settled by authoritative decisions, it was the duty of the court, and especially of this respondent as presiding judge, early to apprise the counsel and the jury of these decisions, and their effect, so as to save the former from the danger of making an improper attempt to mislead the jury in a matter of law, and the jury from having their minds preoccupied by erroneous impressions.

It was for these reasons that on the 22d day of April, 1800, when the said John Fries was brought into court, and placed in the prisoners' box for trial, but before the petit jury were empanelled to try him, this respondent informed the above-mentioned William Lewis, one of his counsel, the aforesaid Alexander James Dallas not being then in court, "that the court had deliberately considered the indictment against John Fries for treason, and the three several overt acts of treason, stated therein: That the crime of treason was defined by the Constitution of the United States. That as the Federal Legislature had the power to make, alter, or repeal laws, so the judiciary only had the power, and it was their duty, to declare, expound and interpret the Constitution and laws of the United States. That it was the duty of the Court, in all criminal cases, to state to the petit jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the petit jury, in all criminal cases, were to decide both the law and the facts, on a consideration of the whole case. That there must be some constructive exposition of the terms used in the Constitution, "levying war against the United States." That the question, what acts amounted to levying war against the United States, or the Government thereof, was a question of law, and had been decided by Judges Patterson and Peters, in the cases of Vigol and Mitchel, and by Judges Iredell and Peters, in the case of John Fries, prisoner at the bar, in April 1799. That Judge Peters remained of the same opinion, which he had twice before delivered, and he, this respondent, on long and great consideration, concurred in the opinion of Judges Patterson, Iredell, and Peters. That to prevent unnecessary delay, and to save time on the trial of John Fries, and to prevent a delay of justice, in the great number of civil causes depending for trial at that term, the court had drawn up in writing, their opinion of the law, arising on the overt acts stated in the indictment against John Fries; and had directed David Caldwell, their clerk, to make out three copies of their opinion, one to be delivered to the attorney of the district, one to the counsel for the prisoner, and one to the petit jury, after they shall have been empanelled and heard the indictment read to them by the clerk, and after the district attorney should have stated to them the law on the overt acts alleged in the indictment, as it appeared to him."

After these observations, this respondent delivered one of the above-mentioned copies to the aforesaid William Lewis, then attending as one of the prisoner's counsel; who read part of it, and then laid it down on the table before him. Some observations were then made on the subject, by him and the above-mentioned Alexander James Dallas, who had then come into court; but this respondent doth not now recollect those observations, and cannot undertake to state them accurately.

And this respondent further saith, that the paper marked exhibit No. 2, and herewith exhibited, which, he prays leave to make part of this his answer, is a true copy of the original opinion, drawn up by him and concurred in by the said Richard Peters, as above set forth, which original opinion is now in the possession of this respondent, ready to be produced to this honorable Court. He may have erred in forming this opinion, and in the time and manner of making it known to the counsel for the prisoner. If he erred in forming it, he erred in common with his colleague and with two of his predecessors; and he presumes to hope that an error which has never been deemed criminal in them, will not be imputed as a crime to him, who was led into it by their example and their authority. If he erred in the time and manner of making known his opinion, he feels a just confidence, that when the reasons which he has alleged for his conduct, and by which it seemed to him to be fully justified, shall come to be carefully weighed, they will be sufficient to prove, if not that this conduct was perfectly regular and correct, yet that he might sincerely have considered it as right; and that in a case where so much doubt may exist, to have committed a mistake, is not to have committed a crime.

And this respondent further answering insists, that the opinion thus delivered to the prisoner's counsel, viz: that "any insurrection or rising of any body of people within the United States, for the purpose of resisting or preventing by force or violence, under any pretence whatever, the execution of any statute of the United States, for levying or collecting taxes, or for any other object of a general or national concern, is levying war against the United States, within the contemplation and true meaning of the Constitution of the United States," is a legal and correct opinion, supported not only by the two previous decisions above-mentioned, but also by the plainest principles of law and reason, and by the uniform tenor of legal adjudications in England and Great Britain, from the Revolution in 1688 to this time.

It ever was, and now is his opinion, that the peace and safety of the National Federal Government must be endangered by any other construction of the terms "levying war against the United States," used by the Federal Constitution; and he is confident that no judge of the Federal Government, no judge of a superior State court, nor any gentleman of established reputation for legal knowledge, would or could deliberately give a contrary opinion.

If, however, this opinion were erroneous, this respondent would be far less censurable than his predecessors, by whose example he was led astray, and by whose authority he considered himself bound. Was it an error to consider himself bound by the authority of their previous decisions? If it were, he was led into the error by the uniform course of judicial proceedings, in this country and in England, and is supported in it, by one of the fundamental principles of our jurisprudence. Can such an error be a crime or misdemeanor?

If, on the other hand, the opinion be in itself correct, as he believes and insists that it is, could the expression of a correct opinion on the law, wherever and however made, mislead the jury, infringe their rights, or give an improper bias to their judgments? Could truth excite improper prejudice? Could the jury be less prepared to hear the law discussed, and to decide on it correctly, because it was correctly stated to them by the court? And is not that a new kind of offence, in this country at least, which consists in telling the truth, and giving a correct exposition of the law?

As to the second specific charge adduced in support of the first article of impeachment, which accuses this respondent, "of restricting the counsel for the said Fries, from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client," this respondent admits that he did, on the above-mentioned trial, express it as his opinion to the aforesaid counsel for the prisoners, "that the decisions in England, in cases of indictments for treason at common law, against the person of the King, ought not to be read to the jury, on trials for treason under the Constitution and statutes of the United States; because such decisions could not inform, but might mislead and deceive the jury: that any decisions on cases of treason, in the courts of England, before the Revolution of 1688, ought to have very little influence in the courts of the United States; that he would permit decisions in the courts of England or of Great Britain, since the said Revolution, to be read to the court or jury, for the purpose of showing what acts have been considered by those courts, as a constructive levying of war against the King of that country, in his legal capacity, but not against his person; because levying war against his Government was of the same nature as levying war against the Government of the United States: but that such decisions, nevertheless, were not to be considered as authorities binding on the courts and juries of this country, but merely in the light of opinions entitled to great respect, as having been delivered after full consideration, by men of great legal learning and ability.

These are the opinions which he did, on that occasion, deliver to the counsel for the prisoner, and which he then thought, and still thinks, it was his duty to deliver. The counsellors admitted to practice in any court of justice are, in his opinion, and according to universal practice, to be considered as officers of such courts, and ministers of justice therein, and as such subject to the direction and control of the court, as to their conduct in its presence, and in conducting the defence of criminals on trial before it. As counsel, they owe to the person accused, diligence, fidelity, and secrecy, and to the court and jury, due and correct information, according to the best of their knowledge, and ability, on every matter of law which they attempt to adduce in argument. The court, on the other hand, hath power, and is bound in duty, to decide and direct what evidence, whether by record or by precedents of the decisions in courts of justice, is proper to be admitted for the establishment of any matter of law or fact. Consequently, should counsel attempt to read to a jury, as a law still in force, a statute which had been repealed, or a decision which had been reversed, or the judgments of courts in countries whose laws have no connexion with ours; it would be the duty of the court to interpose, and prevent such an imposition from being practised on the jury. For these reasons, this respondent thinks that his conduct was correct, in expressing to the counsel for Fries, the opinions stated above. He is not bound to answer here for the correctness of those principles, though he thinks them incontestable; but merely for the correctness of his motives in delivering them. A contrary opinion would convert this honorable Court, from a Court of Impeachment into a Court of Appeals; and lead directly to the strange absurdity, that whenever the judgment of an inferior court should be reversed on appeal or writ of error, the judges of that court must be convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors, and turned out of office: that error in judgment is a punishable offence, and that crimes may be committed without any criminal intention. Against a doctrine so absurd and mischievous, so contrary to every notion of justice hitherto entertained, so utterly subversive of all that part of our system of jurisprudence, which has been wisely and humanely established for the protection of innocence, this respondent deems it his duty now, and on every fit occasion, to enter his protest and lift up his voice; and he trusts that in the discharge of this duty, infinitely more important to his country than to himself, he shall find approbation and support in the heart of every American, of every man throughout the world, who knows the blessings of civil liberty, or respects the principles of universal justice.

It is only, then, for the correctness of his motives in delivering these opinions, that he can now be called to answer; and this correctness ought to be presumed, unless the contrary appear by some direct proof, or some violent presumption, arising from his general conduct on the trial, or from the glaring impropriety of the opinion itself. For he admits that cases may be supposed, of an opinion delivered by a judge, so palpably erroneous, unjust, and oppressive, as to preclude the possibility of its having proceeded from ignorance or mistake.

Do the opinions now under consideration bear any of these marks? This honorable Court need not be informed that there has existed in England no such thing as treason at common law, since the year 1350, when the statute of the 25th Edward III, chap. 2, declaring what alone should in future be judged treason, was passed. Is it perfectly clear that decisions made before that statute, four hundred and fifty years ago, when England, together with the rest of Europe, was still wrapped in the deepest gloom of ignorance and barbarism—when the system of English jurisprudence was still in its infancy—when law, justice, and reason, were perpetually trampled under foot by feudal oppression and feudal anarchy—when, under an able and vigorous monarch, everything was adjudged to be treason which he thought fit to call so, and, under a weak one, nothing was considered as treason which turbulent, powerful, and rebellious nobles thought fit to perpetrate—is it perfectly clear that decisions, made at such a time; and under such circumstances, ought to be received by the courts of this country as authorities to govern their decisions, or lights to guide the understanding of juries? Is it perfectly clear that decisions made in England, on the subject of treason, before the Revolution of 1688, by which alone the balance of the English constitution was adjusted, and the English liberties were fixed on a firm basis; decisions made either during the furious civil wars in which two rival families contended for the Crown; when in the vicissitudes of war, death and confiscation, in the forms of law, continually walked in the train of the victors, and actions were treasonable or praiseworthy, according to the preponderance of the party by whose adherents they were perpetrated; during the reigns of three able and arbitrary monarchs who succeeded this dreadful conflict, and relaxed or invigorated the law of treason, according to their anger, their policy, or their caprice; or during those terrible struggles between the principles of liberty, not yet well defined or understood, on one hand, and arbitrary power, insinuating itself under the forms of the constitution, on the other; struggles which presented at some times the wildest anarchy, at others, the extremes of servile submission, and, after having brought one king to the scaffold, ended in the expulsion of another from his throne;—is it clear that decisions on the law of treason, made in times like those, ought not only to be received as authorities in the courts of this country, but also to have great influence on their decisions? Is it clear that decisions made in England, as to what acts will amount to levying war against the king, personally, and not against his government, are applicable to the Constitution and laws of this country?

Trial of Judge Chase.

Is it clear that such English decisions on the subject of treason as are applicable to our Constitution and laws, are to be received in our courts, not merely as the opinions of learned and able men, which may enlighten their judgment, but as authorities which ought to govern absolutely their decisions? Is all this so clear that a judge could not honestly and sincerely have thought the contrary? that he could not have expressed an opinion to the contrary without corrupt and improper motives? If it be not thus clear, then must it be admitted that this respondent, sincerely and honestly, and in the best of his judgment, considered these decisions as wholly inadmissible, or admissible only for the purposes and to the extent which he pointed out.

And if he did not so consider them, was it not his duty to prevent them from being read to the jury, except under those restrictions, and for those purposes? Would his duty permit him to sit silently, and see the jury imposed on and misled? To sit silently and hear a book read to them as containing the law, which he knew did not contain the law? Such silence would have rendered him a party to the deception, and would have justly subjected him to all the contumely which a conscientious and courageous discharge of his duty has so unmeritedly brought on his name.

With respect to the statutes of the United States, which he is charged with having prevented the prisoner's counsel from citing on the aforesaid trial, he denies that he prevented any act of Congress from being cited either to the court or jury on the said trial, or declared at any time that he would not permit the prisoner's counsel to read to the jury or to the court any act of Congress whatever. Nor does he remember or believe that he expressed on the said trial any disapprobation of the conduct of the circuit court, before whom the said case was first tried, in permitting the act of Congress relating to crimes less than treason, commonly called the Sedition Act, to be read to the jury. He admits indeed that he was then and still is of opinion that the said act of Congress was wholly irrelevant to the issue, in the trial of John Fries, and therefore ought not to have been read to the jury, or regarded by them. This opinion may be erroneous, but he trusts that the following reasons on which it was founded will be considered by this honorable court as sufficiently strong to render it possible, and even probable, that such an opinion might be sincerely held and honestly expressed: 1. That Congress did not intend by the Sedition law to define the crime of treason by "levying war." Treason and sedition are crimes very distinct in their nature, and subject to very different punishments—the former by death, and the latter by fine and imprisonment. 2. The Sedition law makes a combination or conspiracy, with intent to impede the operation of any law of the United States, or the advising or attempting to procure any insurrection or riot, a high misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment; but a combination or conspiracy with intent to prevent the execution of a law, or with intent to raise an insurrection for that purpose, or even with intent to commit treason, is not treason by "levying war" against the United States, unless it be followed by an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into effect, by actual force or violence. 3. The Constitution of the United States is the fundamental and supreme law, and, having defined the crime of treason, Congress could not give any Legislative interpretation or exposition of that crime, or of the part of the Constitution by which it is defined. 4. The Judicial authority of the United States is alone vested with power to expound their Constitution and laws.

And this respondent further answering saith, that after the above-mentioned proceedings had taken place in the said trial, it was postponed until the next day. (Wednesday, April 23, 1800.) when, at the meeting of the court, this respondent told both the above-mentioned counsel for the prisoner, that, "to prevent any misunderstanding of anything that had passed the day before, he would inform them, that, although the court retained the same opinion of the law, arising on the overt acts charged in the indictment against Fries, yet the counsel would be permitted to offer arguments to the court, for the purpose of showing them that they were mistaken in the law; and that the court, if satisfied that they had erred in opinion, would correct it; and also that the counsel would be permitted to argue before the petit jury that the court were mistaken in the law." And this respondent added, that the court had given no opinion as to the facts in the case, about which both the counsel had declared that there would be no controversy.

After some observations by the said William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, they both declared to the court, "that they did not any longer consider themselves as the counsel for John Fries, the prisoner." This respondent then asked the said John Fries, whether he wished the court to appoint other counsel for his defence? He refused to have other counsel assigned; in which he acted, as this respondent believes and charges, by the advice of the said William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas: whereupon, the court ordered the trial to be had on the next day, Thursday, the 24th of April, 1800.

On that day the trial was proceeded in; and before the jurors were sworn, they were, by the direction of the court, severally asked on oath, whether they were in any way related to the prisoner, and whether they had ever formed or delivered any opinion as to his guilt or innocence, or that he ought to be punished? Three of them answering in the affirmative, were withdrawn from the panel. The said John Fries was then informed by the court, that he had a right to challenge thirty-five of the jury, without showing any cause of challenge against them, and as many more as he could show cause of challenge against. He did accordingly challenge peremptorily thirty-four of the jury, and the trial proceeded. In the evening, the court adjourned till the next day, Friday, the 25th of April; when after the district attorney had stated the principal facts proved by the witnesses, and had applied the law to those facts, this respondent, with the concurrence of his colleague, the said Richard Peters, delivered to the jury the charge contained and expressed in exhibit marked No. 3, and herewith filed, which he prays may be taken as part of this his answer.

Immediately after the petit jury had delivered their verdict, this respondent informed the said Fries, from the bench, that if he, or any person for him, could show any legal ground, or sufficient cause to arrest the judgment, ample time would be allowed him for that purpose. But no cause being shown, sentence of death was passed on the said Fries, on Tuesday, the 2d day of May, 1800, the last day of the term; and he was afterwards pardoned by John Adams, then President of the United States.

And this respondent further answering saith, that if the two instances of misconduct, first stated in support of the general charge, contained in the first article of impeachment, were true as alleged, yet the inference drawn from them, viz: "that the said Fries was thereby deprived of the benefit of counsel for his defence," is not true. He insists that the said Fries was deprived of the benefit of counsel, not by any misconduct of this respondent, but by the conduct and advice of the above-mentioned William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, who having been, with their own consent, assigned by the court as counsel for the prisoner, withdrew from his defence, and advised him to refuse other counsel when offered to him by the court, under pretence that the law had been prejudged, and their liberty of conducting the defence, according to their own judgment, improperly restricted by this respondent; but in reality because they knew the law and the facts to be against them, and the case to be desperate, and supposed that their withdrawing themselves under this pretence, might excite odium against the court; might give rise to an opinion that the prisoner had not been fairly tried; and in the event of a conviction, which from their knowledge of the law and the facts they knew to be almost certain, might aid the prisoner in an application to the President for a pardon. That such was the real motive of the said prisoner's counsel, for depriving their client of legal assistance on his trial, this respondent is fully persuaded, and expects to make appear, not only from the circumstances of the case, but from their own frequent and public declarations.

As little can this respondent be justly charged with having, by any conduct of his, endeavored to "wrest from the jury their indisputable right 'to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law as well as the question of fact involved in the verdict which they were required 'to give.'" He denies that he did at any time declare that the aforesaid counsel should not at any time address the jury, or did in any manner hinder them from addressing the jury on the law as well on the facts arising in the case. It was expressly stated in the copy of his opinion delivered as above set forth to William Lewis, that the jury had a right to determine the law as well as the fact; and the said William Lewis and Alexander James

Dallas were expressly informed, before they declared their resolution to abandon the defence, that they were at liberty to argue the law to the jury. This respondent believes that the said William Lewis did not read the opinion delivered to him as aforesaid, except a very small part at the beginning of it, and of course, acted upon it without knowing its contents; and that the said Alexander James Dallas read no part of the said opinion until about a year ago, when he saw a very imperfect copy, made in court by a certain W. S. Biddle.

And this respondent further answering, saith, that according to the Constitution of the United States, civil officers thereof, and no other persons, are subject to impeachment; and they only for treason, bribery, corruption, or other high crime or misdemeanor, consisting in some act done or omitted, in violation of some law forbidding or commanding it; on conviction of which act, they must be removed from office; and may, after conviction, be indicted and punished therefor, according to law. Hence, it clearly results, that no civil officer of the United States can be impeached, except for some offence for which he may be indicted at law: and that no evidence can be received on an impeachment, except such as on an indictment at law, for the same offence, would be admissible. That a judge cannot be indicted or punished according to law, for any act whatever, done by him in his judicial capacity, and in a matter of which he has jurisdiction, through error of judgment merely, without corrupt motives, however manifest his error may be, is a principle resting on the plainest maxims of reason and justice, supported by the highest legal authority, and sanctioned by the universal sense of mankind. He hath already endeavored to show, and he hopes with success, that all the opinions delivered by him in the course of the trials now under consideration were correct in themselves, and in the time and manner of expressing them; and that even admitting them to have been incorrect, there was such strong reason in their favor, as to remove from his conduct every suspicion of improper motives. If these opinions were incorrect, his mistake in adopting them, or in the time or manner of expressing them, cannot be imputed to him as an offence of any kind, much less as a high crime and misdemeanor, for which he ought to be removed from office; unless it can be shown by clear and legal evidence, that he acted from corrupt motives. Should it be considered that some impropriety is attached to his conduct, in the time and mode of expressing any of these opinions; still he apprehends, that a very wide difference exists between such impropriety, the casual effect of human infirmity, and a high crime and misdemeanor for which he may be impeached, and must, on conviction, be removed from office.

Finally, this respondent, having thus laid before this honorable Court a true state of his case, so far as respects the first article of impeachment, declares, upon the strictest review of his conduct during the whole trial of John Fries for treason, that he was not on that occasion unmindful of the solemn duties of his office as judge; that he faithfully and impartially, and according to the best of his ability and understanding, discharged those duties towards the said John Fries; and that he did not in any manner, during the said trial, conduct himself arbitrarily, unjustly, or oppressively, as he is accused by the honorable the House of Representatives.

And the said Samuel Chase, for the plea to the said first article of impeachment, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by the said first article is alleged; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

The second article of impeachment charges, that this respondent, at the trial of James Thompson Callender for a libel, in May 1800, did, "with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the said trial, because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words, charged to be libellous in the indictment, were extracted."

In answer to this article, this respondent admits that he did, as one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, hold the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Virginia, at Richmond, on Thursday the 22d day of May, in the year 1800, and from that day, till the 30th of the same month; when Cyrus Griffin, then district judge of the United States for the district of Virginia, took his seat in the said court; and that during the residue of that session of the said court, which continued till the — day of June, in the same year, this respondent and the said Cyrus Griffin held the said court together. But how far any of the other matters charged in this article, are founded in truth or law, appear from the following statement; which he submits to this honorable court, by way of answer to this part of the accusation.

By an act of Congress passed on the 4th day of May, A. D. 1798, it is among other things enacted, "That if any person shall write, print, utter or publish, or shall knowingly and wittingly assist and aid in writing, printing, uttering or publishing, any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the President of the United States, with intent to defame or to bring him into contempt or disrepute, such person, being thereof convicted, shall be punished by fine, not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment, not exceeding two years;" and "that if any person shall be prosecuted under this act, it shall be lawful for him to give in evidence in his defence, the truth of the matter contained in the publication charged as a libel; and the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the fact, under the direction of the court, as in other cases," as in and by the said act, commonly called the sedition law, to which this respondent begs leave to refer this honorable Court, will more fully appear.

At the meeting of the last above-mentioned circuit court, this respondent, as required by the duties of his office, delivered a charge to the grand jury; in which, according to his constant practice, and to his duty as a judge, he gave in charge to them several acts of Congress for the punishment of offences, and among them, the above-mentioned act, called the sedition law; and directed the jury to make particular inquiry concerning any breaches of these statutes or any of them, within the district of Virginia. On the 24th day of May, 1800, the said jury found an indictment against one James Thompson Callender, for printing and publishing, against the form of the said act of Congress, a false, scandalous, and malicious libel, called "The Prospect before Us," against John Adams, then President of the United States, in his official conduct as President; as appears by an official copy of the said indictment, marked exhibit No. 4, which this respondent begs leave to make part of this his answer.

On Wednesday, the 28th day of the same month, May 1800, Philip Norbonne Nicholas, Esq., now attorney general of the State of Virginia, and George Hay, Esq., now district attorney of the United States, for the district of Virginia, appeared in the said circuit court as counsel for the said Callender; and on Thursday the 3d of June following, his trial commenced, before this respondent, and the said Cyrus Griffin, who then sat as assistant judge. The petit jurors being called over, eight of them appeared, namely, Robert Gamble, Bernard Mackham, John Barrell, William Austin, William Richardson, Thomas Tinsley, Matthew Harvey, and John Basset; who, as they came to the book to be sworn, were severally asked on oath, by direction of the court, "whether they had ever formed or delivered any opinion respecting the subject-matter then to be tried, or concerning the charges contained in the indictment?" They all answered in the negative, and were sworn in chief to try the issue. The counsel for the said Callender declaring that it was unnecessary to put this question to the other four jurymen, William Mayo, James Hayes, Henry S. Shore, and John Prior, they also were immediately sworn in chief. No challenge was made by the said Callender or his counsel, to any of these jurors; but the said counsel declared, that they would rely on the answer that would be given by the said jurors, to the question thus put by order of the court.

After the above-mentioned John Basset, whom this respondent supposes and admits to be the person mentioned in the article of impeachment now under consideration, had thus answered in the negative to the question put to him by order of the court, as above-mentioned, which this respondent states to be the legal and proper question to be put to jurors on such occasions, he expressed to the court his wish to be excused from serving on the said trial, because he had made up his mind, or had formed his opinion, "that the publication, called 'The Prospect before Us,' from which the words charged in the indictment as libellous were said to be extracted, but which he had never seen, was, according to the representation of it, which he had received, within the Sedition law." But the court did not consider this declaration by the said John Basset as a sufficient reason for withdrawing him from the jury, and accordingly directed him to be sworn in chief.

In this opinion and decision, as in all the others delivered during the trial in question, this respondent concurred with his colleague, the aforementioned Cyrus Griffin, in whom none of these opinions have been considered as criminal. He contends that the opinion itself was legal and correct; and he denies that he concurred in it, under the influence of any "spirit of persecution and injustice," or with any "intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner;" as is most untruly alleged by the second article of impeachment. His reasons were correct and legal. He will submit them with confidence to this honorable Court; which, although it cannot condemn him for an incorrect opinion, proceeding from an honest error in judgment, and ought not to take on itself the power of inquiring into the correctness of his decisions, but merely that of examining the purity of his motives; will, nevertheless, weigh his reasons, for the purpose of judging how far they are of sufficient force, to justify a belief that they might have appeared satisfactory to him. If they might have so appeared, if the opinion which he founded on them be not so palpably and glaringly wrong, as to carry with it internal evidence of corrupt motives, he cannot in delivering it have committed an offence.

This honorable Court need not be informed, that it is the duty of courts before which criminal trials take place, to prevent jurors from being excused for light and insufficient causes. If this rule were not observed, it would follow, that as serving on such trials as a juror, is apt to be a very disagreeable business, especially to those best qualified for it, there would be a great difficulty, and often an impossibility, in finding proper juries. The law has, therefore, established a fixed and general rule on this subject, calculated not to gratify the wishes or the unreasonable scruples of jurors, but to secure to the party accused, as far as in the imperfection of human nature it can be secured, a fair and impartial trial. The criterion established by this rule is, "that the juror stands indifferent between the Government and the person accused, as to the matter in issue, on the indictment." This indifference is always, according to a well-known maxim of law, to be presumed, unless the contrary appear; and the contrary may be alleged by way of excuse by the juror himself, or by the prisoner by way of challenge. Even if not alleged, it may be inquired into by the court of its own mere motion, or on the suggestion of the prisoner, and it may be established by the confession of the juror himself, on oath, or by other testimony.

But in order to show that a juror does not "stand indifferent between the accuser and the accused, as to the matter in issue," it is not sufficient to prove that he has expressed a general opinion, "that such an offence as that charged by the indictment ought to be punished;" or "that the party accused, if guilty of the offence charged against him, ought to be punished;" or "that a book, for printing and publishing which the party is indicted, comes within the law on which the indictment is founded." All these are general expressions of opinion, as to the criminality of an act of which the party is accused, and of which he may be guilty; not declarations of an opinion that he actually is guilty of the offence with which he stands charged. It is impossible for any man in society to avoid having, and extremely difficult for him to avoid expressing, an opinion, as to the criminality or innocence of those acts, which, for the most part, are the subjects of indictments for offences of a public nature; such as treason, sedition, and libels against the Government. Such acts always engage public attention, and become the subject of public conversation; and if to have formed or expressed an opinion as to the general nature of those acts, were a sufficient ground of challenge to a juror, when alleged against him, or of excuse from serving when alleged by himself, it would be in the power of almost every offender to prevent a jury from being empanelled to try him, and of almost every man, to exempt himself from the unpleasant task of serving on such juries. The magnitude and heinous nature of an offence would give it a greater tendency to attract public attention, and to draw forth public expressions of indignation, and would thus increase its chance of impunity.

To the present case this reasoning applies with peculiar force. The "Prospect before Us" is a libel so profligate and atrocious, that it excited disgust and indignation in every breast not wholly depraved. Even those whose interest it was intended to promote, were, as this respondent has understood and believed, either so much ashamed of it, or so apprehensive of its effects, that great pains were taken by them to withdraw it from public and general circulation. Of such a publication; it must have been extremely difficult to find a man of sufficient character and information to serve on a jury, who had not formed an opinion, either from his own knowledge, or from report. The juror in the present case had expressed no opinion. He had formed no opinion as to the facts. He had never seen the "Prospect before Us;" and, therefore, could have formed no fixed or certain opinion about its nature or contents. They had been reported to him, and he had formed an opinion that if they were such as reported, the book was within the scope and operation of a law for the punishment of "false, 'scandalous and malicious libels, against the President in his official capacity, written or published 'with intent to defame him.'" And who is there, that having either seen the book, or heard of it, had not necessarily formed the same opinion?

But this juror had formed no opinion about the guilt or innocence of the party accused; which depended on four facts wholly distinct from the opinion which he had formed. First, whether the contents of the book were really such as had been represented to him? Secondly, whether they should, on the trial, be proved to be true?

Trial of Judge Chase.

Thirdly, whether the party accused was really the author or publisher of this book? And fourthly, whether he wrote or published it "with intent to defame the President, or to bring him into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against him the hatred of the good people of the United States?" On all these questions, the mind of the juror was perfectly at large, notwithstanding the opinion which he had formed. He might, consistently with that opinion, determine them all in the negative; and it was on them that the issue between the United States and James Thompson Callender depended. Consequently, this juror, notwithstanding the opinion which he had thus formed, did stand indifferent as to the matter in issue, in the legal and proper sense, and in the only sense in which such indifference can ever exist; and therefore his having formed that opinion, was not such an excuse as could have justified the court in discharging him from the jury.

That this juror did not himself consider this opinion as an opinion respecting the "matter in issue," appears clearly from this circumstance, that when called upon to answer on oath, "whether he had expressed any opinion as to the matter in issue?" he answered that he had not. Which clearly proves that he did not regard the circumstance of his having formed this opinion, as a legal excuse, which ought to exempt him of right from serving on the jury; but merely suggested it as a motive of delicacy, which induced him to wish to be excused. To such motives of delicacy, however commendable in the persons who feel them, it is impossible for courts of justice to yield, without putting it in the power of every man, under pretence of such scruples, to exempt himself from those duties which all the citizens are bound to perform. Courts of justice must regulate themselves by legal principles, which are fixed and universal; not by delicate scruples, which admit of endless variety, according to the varying opinions and feelings of men.

Such were the reasons of this respondent, and he presumes of his colleague the said Cyrus Griffin, for refusing to excuse the said John Basset, from serving on the jury above-mentioned. These reasons, and the decisions founded on them, he insists were legal and valid. But if the reasons should be considered as invalid, and the decision as erroneous, can they be considered as so clearly and flagrantly incorrect, as to justify a conclusion that they were adopted by this respondent, through improper motives? Are not these reasons sufficiently strong, or sufficiently plausible, to justify a candid and liberal mind in believing, that a judge might honestly have regarded them as solid? Has it not been conceded, by the omission to prosecute Judge Griffin for this decision, that his error, if he committed one, was an honest error? Whence this distinction between this respondent and his colleague? And why is that opinion imputed to one as a crime, which in the other is considered as innocent?

And the said Samuel Chase, for plea to the said second article of impeachment, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by the said second article is alleged against him; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

The third article of impeachment alleges that 'this respondent "with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, did not permit the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness in behalf of the said Callender, to be given in, on pretence that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact."

In answer to this charge, this respondent begs leave to submit the following facts and observations.

The indictment against James Thompson Callender, which has been already mentioned, and of which a copy is exhibited with this answer, consisted of two distinct and separate counts, each of which contained twenty distinct and independent charges, or sets of words. Each of those sets of words was charged as a libel against John Adams, as President of the United States, and the twelfth charge embraced the following words, "He (meaning President Adams) was a professed aristocrat; he proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest." The defence set up was confined to this charge, and was rested upon the truth of the words. To the other nineteen charges no defence of any kind was attempted or spoken of, except such as might arise from the supposed unconstitutionality of the sedition law; which, if solid, applied to the twelfth charge as well as to the other nineteen. It was to prove the truth of these words that John Taylor, the person mentioned in the article of impeachment now under consideration was offered as a witness. It can hardly be necessary to remind this honorable Court, that when an indictment for a libel contains several distinct charges, founded on distinct sets of words, the party accused, who in such cases is called the "traverser," must be convicted, unless he makes a sufficient defence against every charge. His innocence on one, does not prove him innocent on the others. If the sedition law should be considered as unconstitutional, the whole indictment, including this twelfth charge, must fall to the ground, whether the words in question were proved to be true or not. If the law should be considered as constitutional, then the traverser, whether the words in the twelfth charge were proved to be true or not, must be convicted on the other nineteen charges, against which no defence was offered. This conviction on nineteen charges would put the traverser as completely in the power of the court, by which the amount of the fine and the term of the imprisonment were to be fixed, as a conviction upon all the twenty charges. The imprisonment could not exceed two years, nor the fine be more than two thousand dollars. If then this respondent were desirous of procuring the conviction of the traverser, he was sure of his object without rejecting the testimony of John Taylor. If his temper towards the traverser were so vindictive as to make him feel anxious to obtain an opportunity and excuse for inflicting on him the whole extent of punishment permitted by the law, still a conviction on nineteen charges afforded this opportunity and excuse as fully as a conviction on twenty charges. One slander more or less, in such a publication as the "Prospect before Us," could surely be of no moment. To attain this object, therefore, it was not necessary to reject the testimony of John Taylor.

That the court did not feel this vindictive spirit is clearly evinced by the moderation of the punishment, which actually was inflicted on the traverser, after he was convicted of the whole twenty charges. Instead of two thousand dollars, he was fined only two hundred, and was sentenced to only nine months' imprisonment, instead of two years. And this respondent avers that he never felt or expressed a wish to go further; but that in this decision, as well as in every other given in the course of the trial, he fully and freely concurred with his colleague, Judge Griffin.

As a further proof that his rejection of this testimony did not proceed from any improper motive, but from a conviction in his mind that it was legally inadmissible, and that it was therefore his duty to reject it, he begs leave to state that he interfered in order to prevail on the district attorney to withdraw his objection to those questions, and consent to their being put; which that officer refused to do, on the ground "that he did not feel himself at liberty to consent to such a departure from legal principles."

Hence appears the utter futility of a charge, which attributes to this respondent a purpose as absurd as it was wicked; and without the slightest proof, imputes to the worst motives in him the same action, which in his colleague is considered as free from blame. But this respondent will not content himself with showing that his conduct in concurring with his colleague in the rejection of John Taylor's testimony, could not have proceeded from the motives ascribed to him; but he will show that this rejection, if not strictly legal and proper, as he believes and insists that it is, rests on legal reasons of sufficient force to satisfy every mind, that a judge might have sincerely considered it as correct.

The words stated as the ground of the twelfth charge above-mentioned, are stated in the indictment as one entire and indivisible paragraph, constituting one entire offence. This respondent considered them at the trial, and still considers them as constituting one entire charge and one entire offence; and that they must be taken together in order to explain and support each other. It is clear that no words are indictable as libellous, except such as expressly, or by plain implication, charge the person against whom they are published with some offence, either legal or moral. To be an "aristocrat," is not in itself an offence, either legal or moral, even if it were a charge susceptible of proof; neither was it an offence, either legal or moral, for Mr. Adams to be "faithful and serviceable to the British interest," unless he thereby betrayed or endangered the interests of his own country which does not necessarily follow, and is not directly alleged in the publication. These two phrases, therefore, taken separately, charge Mr. Adams with no offence of any kind; and, consequently, could not be indictable as libellous: but taken together, they convey the implication that Mr. Adams, being an "aristocrat," that is, an enemy to the republican Government of his own country, had subverted the British interest against the interest of his own country; which would, in his situation, have been an offence both moral and legal; to charge him with it was, therefore, libellous.

Admitting, therefore, these two phrases to constitute one distinct charge, and one entire offence, this respondent considers and states it to be law, that no justification which went to part only of the offence, could be received. The plea of justification must always answer the whole charge, or it is bad on the demurrer, for this plain reason, that the object of the plea is to show the party's innocence; and he cannot be innocent if the accusation against him be supported in part. Where the matter of defence may be given in evidence, without being formally pleaded, the same rules prevail. The defence must be of the same nature, and equally complete, in one case as in the other. The only difference is in the manner of bringing it forward. Evidence, therefore, which goes only to justify the charge in part, cannot be received. It is not, indeed, necessary that the whole of this evidence should be given by one witness. The justification may consist of several facts, some of which may be proved by one person, and some by another. But proof, in such cases, must be offered as to the whole, or it cannot be received.

In the case under consideration, no proof was offered as to the whole matter contained in the twelfth article. No witness except the above-mentioned John Taylor was produced or mentioned. When a witness is offered to a court and jury, it is the right and duty of the court to require a statement of the matters intended to be proved by him. This is the invariable practice of all our courts, and was done most properly by this respondent and his colleague, on the occasion in question. From the statement given by the traverser's counsel of what they expected to prove by the said witness, it appeared that his testimony could have no possible application to any part of the indictment, except the twelfth charge above-mentioned, and but a very weak and imperfect application even to that part. The court, therefore, as it was their right and duty, requested that the questions intended to be put to the witness, should be reduced to writing, and submitted to their inspection, so as to enable them to judge more accurately, how far those questions were proper and admissible. This being done, the questions were of the following tenor and effect:

1st. "Did you ever hear Mr. Adams express any sentiments favorable to monarchy, or 'aristocracy,' and what were they?"

2d. "Did you ever hear Mr. Adams, while Vice President, express his disapprobation of the funding system?"

Trial of Judge Chase.

3d. "Do you know whether Mr. Adams did not, in the year 1794, vote against the sequestration of British debts, and also against the bill for suspending intercourse with Great Britain?"

The second question, it is manifest, had nothing to do with the charge; for Mr. Adams's approbation or disapprobation of the funding system could not have the most remote tendency to prove that he was an aristocrat, or had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest. In that part of the publication which furnishes the matter of the thirteenth charge in the indictment, it is indeed stated that Mr. Adams, "when but in a secondary station, censured the funding system," but these words are in themselves wholly immaterial; and no attempt was made, nor any evidence offered or spoken of, to prove the truth of the other matter contained in the thirteenth charge. It was from their connexion with that other matter that these words could alone derive any importance; and consequently their truth or falsehood was altogether immaterial, while that other matter remained unproved. This question, therefore, which went solely to those immaterial words, was clearly inadmissible. The third question was in reality as far as the second from any connexion with the matter in issue, although its irrelevancy is not quite so apparent. Mr. Adams's having voted against the two measures alluded to in that question, if he did in fact vote against them, could by no means prove that he was "faithful and serviceable to the British interest," in any sense, much less with those improper and criminal views, with which the publication in question certainly meant to charge him. He might, in the honest and prudent performance of his duty towards his Government and his country, incidentally promote the interests of another country; but it was by no means competent for a jury to infer from thence, that he was "faithful" to that other country, or, in other words, that he held the interests of that other country chiefly in view, and was actuated in giving his vote by a desire to promote them, independently of, or without regard to, the interests of his own country. Such an inference could not be made from the fact, admitting it to be true. The fact, if true, was no evidence to support such an inference, therefore the fact was immaterial; and as it is the province and duty of the court, in such circumstances, to decide on the materiality of facts offered in evidence, it follows clearly that it was the right and duty of the court, in this instance, to reject the third question; an affirmative answer to which could have proved nothing in support of the defence.

The first question, therefore, and the only remaining one proposed to be put to this witness, stood alone; and an affirmative answer to it, if it could have proved anything, could have proved only a part of the charge; namely, that Mr. Adams was an aristocrat. But evidence to prove a part only of an entire and indivisible charge was inadmissible for the reasons stated above.

If, on the other hand, the phrases in question, "that Mr. Adams was an aristocrat," that "he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest," were distinct and divisible, and constituted two distinct charges, which may perhaps be the proper way of considering them, still the above-mentioned questions were improper and inadmissible, in that point of view.

The first charge in that case is, that Mr. Adams "was an aristocrat." To be an aristocrat, even if any precise and definite meaning could be affixed to the term, is not an offence either legal or moral; consequently, to charge a man with being an aristocrat is not a libel; and such a charge in an indictment for a libel, is wholly immaterial. Nothing is more clear, than that immaterial matters in legal proceedings ought not to be proved, and need not be disproved. In the next place, the term "aristocrat" is one of those vague indefinite terms, which admit not of precise meaning, and are not susceptible of proof. What one person might consider as aristocracy, another would consider as republicanism, and a third as democracy. If indictments could be supported on such grounds, the guilt or innocence of the party accused must be measured not by any fixed or known rule, but by the opinions which the jurors appointed to try him might happen to entertain, concerning the nature of aristocracy, democracy, or republicanism. And, lastly, the question itself was as vague, and as void of precise meaning, as the charge of which it was intended to furnish the proof. The witness was called upon to declare "whether he had heard Mr. Adams express any and what opinions, favorable to aristocracy or monarchy?" How was it to be determined, whether an opinion was favorable to aristocracy or monarchy? One man would think it favorable and another not so, according to the opinions which they might respectively entertain, on political subjects. The first question, therefore, was inconclusive, immaterial, and inadmissible.

The second, as has already been remarked, was wholly and manifestly foreign from the matter in issue. Mr. Adams's dislike of the funding system, if he did in fact dislike it, had nothing to do with his aristocracy or his faithfulness to the British interest. There is no pretence for saying, that such a question ought to have been admitted.

As to the third, "whether Mr. Adams had not voted against the sequestration of British property, and the suspension of commercial intercourse with Great Britain," it has already been shown to be altogether improper; on the ground that such votes, if given by Mr. Adams, were no evidence whatever of his having been "faithful and serviceable to the British interest." If he had been so, provided it were, in his opinion, at the same time useful to the interests of his own country, which it well might be, and the contrary of which is not alleged by this part of the publication, taken separately, it was no offence of any kind; and to charge him with it was not a libel. The charge was, therefore, immaterial and futile, and no evidence for or against it could properly be received. And, finally, if the charge had been material, and the giving of these votes had been legal evidence to prove it, that fact was on record in the journals of the Senate, and might have been proved by that record, or an official copy of it. As this evidence was the highest of which the case admitted, no inferior evidence of it, such as oral proof is well known to be, could be admitted.

For these reasons this respondent did concur with his colleague, the said Cyrus Griffin, in rejecting the three above-mentioned questions; but not any other testimony that the said John Taylor might have been able to give. In this he insists that he acted legally and properly, according to the best of his ability. If he erred, it is impossible, for the reasons stated by him in the beginning of his answer to this article, to suppose that he erred willfully: since he could have had no possible motive for a piece of misconduct so shameful, and at the same time so well calculated to give offence. In a point so liable to misapprehension and misrepresentation, and so likely to be used as a means of exciting public odium against him, it is far more probable, that had he been capable of bending his opinion of the law to other motives, he would have admitted illegal testimony; which, taken in its utmost effect, could have had no tendency to thwart those plans of vengeance against the traverser, under the influence of which he is supposed to have acted.

If his error was an honest one, which, as his colleague also fell into it, might in charity be supposed; and, as there is not a shadow of evidence to the contrary, must in law be presumed; he cannot, for committing it, be convicted of any offence, much less a high crime and misdemeanor, for which he must, on conviction, be deprived of his office.

And for plea to the said third article of impeachment, the said Samuel Chase, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by the said third article is alleged against him: this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

The fourth article of impeachment alleges, that during the whole course of the trial of James Thompson Callender, above-mentioned, the conduct of this respondent was marked by "manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance;" and five particular instances of the "injustice, partiality, and intemperance," are adduced.

The first consists, "in compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above-mentioned John Taylor, the witness."

This respondent, in answer to this part of the article now under consideration, admits that the court, consisting of himself and the above-mentioned Cyrus Griffin, did require, the counsel for the traverser, on the trial of James Thompson Callender, above-mentioned, to reduce to writing the questions which they intended to put to the said witness. But he denies that it is more his act than the act of his colleague, who fully concurred in this measure. The measure, as he apprehends and insists, was legal and proper; his reasons for adopting it, and he presumes those of his colleague, he will submit to this honorable Court, in order to show that if he, in common with his colleague, committed an error, it was an error into which the best and wisest men might have honestly fallen.

It will not be denied, and cannot be doubted, that according to our laws, evidence, whether oral or written, may be rejected and prevented from going before the jury, on various grounds. 1st, For incompetency; where the source from which the evidence is attempted to be drawn, is an improper source: as if a witness were to be called who was infamous, or interested in the event of the suit; or a paper should be offered in evidence, which was not between the same parties, or was not executed in the forms prescribed by law. 2d, for irrelevancy: when the evidence offered is not such as in law will warrant the jury to infer the fact intended to be proved; or where that fact, if proved, is immaterial to the issue. For these reasons, and perhaps for others which might be specified, evidence may properly be rejected, in trials before our courts.

As little can it be doubted that, according to our laws, the court, and not the jury, is the proper tribunal for deciding all questions relative to the admissibility of evidence. The effect of the evidence, when received, is to be judged of by the jury; but whether it ought to be received, must be determined by the court. This arises from the very constitution of the trial by jury; one fundamental principle of which is, that the jury must decide the case, not according to vague notions, secret impressions, or general belief, but, according to legal and proper evidence delivered in court. So strictly is this rule observed, that if one juror have any knowledge of the matter in dispute, it may influence his own judgment, but not that of his fellow jurors, unless he state it to them on oath, in open court; and nothing is more common than for our courts, after all the evidence which the party can produce has been offered and received, to tell the jury that there is no evidence to support the claim, or the defence; or when proof is offered of a certain fact, to determine that such fact is not proper to be given in evidence.

Hence it results, and is every day's practice, that when a witness is produced, or a writing is offered in evidence, the opposite party, having a right to object to the evidence if he should think it improper, requires to be informed what the witness is to prove, or to see the writing before the first is examined, or the second is read to the jury. The court has the same right, resulting necessarily from its power to decide all questions relative to the admissibility of evidence. This right our courts are in the constant habit of exercising; not only when objections are made by the parties, but when, there being no objection, the court itself has reason to suspect that the testimony is improper. In most cases, but not in all, consent by the opposite party removes all objections to the admissibility of evidence, and courts sometimes infer consent from silence; but, as it is their duty to take care that no improper or illegal evidence goes to the jury, unless the objection to it be removed by consent of parties, it is consequently their duty, in all cases where they see reason to suspect that the evidence offered is improper, to ascertain whether consent has been given, or whether the seeming acquiescence of the opposite party has proceeded from inattention. This is more particularly their duty in criminal cases, where they are bound to be counsel for the Government, as well as for the party accused.

It being thus the right and duty of a court before which a trial takes place, to inform itself of the evidence offered, so as to be able to judge whether such evidence be proper, it results necessarily that they have a right to require, that any question intended to be put to a witness, should be reduced to writing, for that is the form in which their deliberation upon it may be most perfect, and their judgment will be most likely to be correct. In the case now under consideration, the court did exercise this right. When the testimony of John Taylor was offered, the court inquired of the traverser's counsel, what that witness was to prove. The statement of his testimony given in answer, induced the court to suspect that it was irrelevant and inadmissible. They, therefore, that they might have an opportunity for more careful and accurate consideration, called upon the counsel to state, in writing, the questions intended to be put to the witness.

This is the act done by the court, but concurred in by the respondent, which has been selected and adduced as one of the proofs and instances of "manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance" on his part. He owes an apology to this honorable Court for having occupied so much of its time with the refutation of a charge which has no claim to serious consideration, except what it derives from the respect due to the honorable body by which it was made, and the high character of the court where it is preferred.

The next circumstance stated by the article now under consideration, as an instance and proof of "manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance" in this respondent, is his refusal to postpone the trial of the said James Thompson Callender, "although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused, and although it was manifest that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term."

This respondent, in answer to this part of the charge, admits that, in the above-mentioned trial, the traverser's counsel did move the court, while this respondent sat in it alone, for a continuance of the trial until the next term; not merely a postponement of the trial, as the expressions used in this part of the article would seem to import; and did file, as the ground work of their motion, an affidavit of the traverser, a true and official copy of which (marked exhibit No. 5)

this respondent herewith exhibits, and begs leave to make part of this answer; but he denies that any sufficient ground for a continuance until the next term was disclosed by this affidavit; as he trusts will clearly appear from the following facts and observations:

The trial of an indictment at the term when it is found by the grand jury, is a matter of course, which the prosecutor can claim as a right, unless legal cause can be shown for a continuance. The prosecutor may consent to a continuance, but if he withholds his consent, the court cannot grant a continuance without legal cause. Of the sufficiency and legality of this cause, as of every other question of law, the court must judge; but it must decide on this, as on every other point, according to the fixed and known rules of law.

One of the legal grounds, and the principal one on which such a continuance may be granted, is the absence of competent and material witnesses, whom the party cannot produce at the present term, but has a reasonable ground for expecting to be able to produce at the next term. Analogous to this, is the inability to procure, at the present term, legal and material written testimony, which the party has a reasonable expectation of being able to procure at the next term.

These rules are as reasonable and just in themselves, as they are essential to the due administration of justice, to the punishment of offences on the one hand, and to the protection of innocence on the other. If the continuance of a cause, on the application of the party accused, were a matter of right, it is manifest that no indictment would be brought to trial until after a delay of many months. If, on the other hand, the granting of a continuance depended not on fixed rules, but on the arbitrary will of the court, it would follow that weakness or partiality might induce a court, on some occasions, to extend a very improper indulgence to the party accused; while, on others, passion or prejudice might deprive him of the necessary means of making his defence. Hence the necessity of fixed rules, which the judges are bound to expound and apply, under the solemn sanction of their oath of office.

The true and only reason for granting a continuance, is, that the party accused may have the best opportunity that the laws can afford to him, of making his defence. But incompetent or immaterial witnesses could not be examined if they were present; and, consequently, their absence can deprive the party of no opportunity which the laws afford him, of making his defence. Hence the rule, that the witnesses must be competent and material.

Public justice will not permit the trial of offenders to be delayed, on light or unfounded pretences. To wait for testimony which the party really wished for, but did not expect to be able to produce within some definite period, would certainly be a very light pretence; and to make him the judge, how far there was reasonable expectation of obtaining the testimony within the proper time, would put it in his power to delay the trial on the most unfounded pretences. Hence the rule, that there must be reasonable ground of expectation, in the judgment of the court, that the testimony may be obtained within the proper time.

It is therefore a settled and most necessary rule, that every application for a continuance, on the ground of obtaining testimony, must be supported by an affidavit, disclosing sufficient matter to satisfy the court, that the testimony wanted "is competent and material," and that there is "reasonable expectation of procuring it within the time prescribed." From a comparison of the affidavit in question with the indictment, it will soon appear how far the traverser in this case brought himself within this rule.

The absent witnesses, mentioned in the affidavit, are William Gardner, of Portsmouth in New Hampshire; Tench Coxe, of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania; Judge Bee, of some place in South Carolina; Timothy Pickering, lately of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, but of what place at that time the deponent did not know; William B. Giles, of Amelia county, in the State of Virginia; Stevens Thompson Mason, whose place of residence is not mentioned in the affidavit, but was known to be in Loudon county, in the State of Virginia; and General Blackburn, of Bath county, in the said State. The affidavit also states, that the traverser wished to procure, as material to his defence, authentic copies of certain answers made by the President of the United States, Mr. Adams, to addresses from various persons; and also, a book entitled "an Essay on Canon and Feudal Law," or entitled in words to that purport, which was ascribed to the President, and which the traverser believed to have been written by him; and also, evidence to prove that the President was in fact the author of that book.

It is not stated, that the traverser had any reasonable ground to expect, or did expect, to procure this book or evidence, or these authentic copies, or the attendance of any one of these witnesses, at the next term. Nor does he attempt to show in what manner the book, or the copies of answers to addresses, were material, so as to enable the court to form a judgment on that point. Here, then, the affidavit was clearly defective. His believing the book and copies to be material, was of no weight, unless he showed to the court, sufficient grounds for entertaining the same opinion. Moreover, he does not state where he supposes that this book, and those authentic copies, may be found: so as to enable the court to judge, how far a reasonable expectation of obtaining them might be entertained. On the ground of this book and these copies, therefore, there was no pretence for a continuance. As to the witnesses, it is manifest, that from their very distant and dispersed situation, there existed no ground of reasonable expectation, that their attendance could be procured at the next term, or at any subsequent time. Indeed, the idea of postponing the trial of an indictment till witnesses could be convened at Richmond, from South Carolina, New Hampshire, and the western extremities of Virginia, is too chimerical to be seriously entertained. Accordingly, the traverser, though in his affidavit he stated them to be material, and declared that he could not procure their attendance at that term, could not venture to declare, on oath, that he expected to procure it at the next, or at any other time; much less that he had any reasonable ground for such an expectation. On this ground, therefore, the affidavit was clearly insufficient; and it was consequently the duty of the court to reject such application.

But the testimony of these witnesses, as stated in the affidavit, was wholly immaterial; and, therefore, their absence was no ground for a continuance, had there been reasonable ground for expecting their attendance at the next term.

William Gardner and Tench Coxe were to prove that Mr. Adams had turned them out of office, for their political opinions or conduct. This applied to that part of the publication, which constituted the matter of the third charge in the indictment, in these words, "the same system of persecution extended all over the continent. Every person holding an office, must either quit it, or think and vote exactly with Mr. Adams." Judge Bee was to prove, that Mr. Adams had advised and requested him by letter, in the year 1799, to deliver Thomas Nash, otherwise called Jonathan Robbins, to the British Consul, in Charleston. This might have had some application to the matter of the seventh charge; which alleged that "the hands of Mr. Adams, were reeking with the blood of the poor, friendless Connecticut sailor." Timothy Pickering was to prove, that Mr. Adams, while President, and Congress was in session, was many weeks in possession of important despatches, from the American Minister in France, without communicating them to Congress. This testimony was utterly immaterial; because, admitting the fact to be so, Mr. Adams was not bound, in any respect, to communicate those despatches to Congress; unless, in his discretion, he should think it necessary; and also, because the fact, if true, had no relation to any part of the indictment. There are, indeed, three charges, on which it might at first sight seem to have some slight bearing. These are the eighth, the words furnishing the matter of which are, "every feature in the Administration of Mr. Adams forms a distinct and additional evidence that he was determined, at all events, to embroil this country with France;" the fourteenth, the words stated in which, allege, that "by sending these Ambassadors to Paris, Mr. Adams and his British faction designed to do nothing but mischief;" and the eighteenth, the matter of which states, "that in the midst of such a scene of profligacy and usury, the President persisted as long as he durst, in making his utmost efforts for provoking a French war." To no other charge in the indictment had the evidence of Timothy Pickering, as stated in the affidavit, the remotest affinity. And surely, it will not be pretended by any man, who shall compare this evidence with the three charges above-mentioned, that the fact intended to be proved by it, furnished any evidence proper to go to a jury, in support of either of those charges: that "every feature of his Administration formed a distinct and additional evidence of a determination, at all events, to embroil this country with France," that "in sending Ambassadors to Paris, he intended nothing but mischief;" that "in the midst of a scene of profligacy and usury, he persisted, as long as he durst, in making his utmost effort for provoking a French war," are charges, which surely cannot be supported or justified, by the circumstance of his "keeping in his possession, for several weeks, while Congress was in session, despatches from the American Minister in France, without communicating them to Congress," which he was not bound to do, and which it was his duty not to do, if he supposed that the communication, at an earlier period, would be injurious to the public interest. The testimony of William B. Giles and Stevens Thompson Mason was to prove, that Mr. Adams had uttered in their hearing certain sentiments, favorable to aristocratic or monarchical principles of Government.

This had no application except to a part of the twelfth charge; which has been already shown to be wholly immaterial if taken separately, and wholly incapable of a separate justification, if considered as part of an entire charge. And, lastly, it was to be proved by General Blackburn, that in his answer to an address, Mr. Adams avowed, "that there was a party in Virginia, which deserved to be humbled into dust and ashes, before the indignant frowns of their injured, insulted, and offended country." There were but two charges in the indictment to which this fact, if true, had the most distant resemblance. These are the fifteenth and sixteenth, the words forming the matter of which, call Mr. Adams "an hoary-headed libeller of the Governor of Virginia, who with all the fury, but without the propriety or sublimity of Homer's Achilles, bawled out, to arms, then, to arms!" and "who, floating on the bladder of popularity, threatened to make Richmond the centre point of a bonfire." It would be an abuse of the patience of this honorable Court, to occupy any part of its time in proving that the fact intended to be proved by General Blackburn could not in the slightest degree support or justify such charges as these. This is the account given of the testimony of the absent witnesses, by the affidavit filed as the ground of the motion for a continuance. From a comparison of it with the indictment, it will appear, that out of twenty charges in the indictment, there were but eight, to which any part of the testimony of those witnesses had the most distant allusion: and that of those eight charges there are five, which the testimony, having some allusions to them, could not in the slightest degree support. Twelve charges, therefore, remained without even an attempt to justify them; and seventeen were wholly destitute of any legal or sufficient justification. On these seventeen charges, therefore, the traverser must have been convicted; even if the remaining three had been completely justified by the testimony of the absent witnesses. The conviction on these seventeen charges, or even on one of them, would have put it into the power of the court to fine and imprison the traverser, to the whole extent allowed by the law. If the truth of these three charges, admitting it to be established, could not have any effect in mitigating the punishment, which depended on the court and not on the jury, the court in passing sentence might make, and in this case actually did make, the fullest abatement on that account that the testimony if adduced would warrant.

This testimony, therefore, was in every view immaterial; and had it been material, there existed no ground of reasonable expectation that it could be obtained at the next term, or any future term. For these reasons, and not from criminal motives, which without the least shadow of proof are ascribed to him, this respondent did overrule and reject the motion for a continuance till the next term; as it was his duty to do, since he had no discretion in the case, but was bound by the rules of law.

But in order to afford every accommodation to the traverser and his counsel, which it was in his power to give, this respondent did offer to postpone the trial for a month, or more, in order to afford them full time for preparation, and for procuring such testimony as was within their reach. This indulgence they thought proper to refuse.

On Monday, the second, and Tuesday, the third day of June, 1800, when Judge Griffin had taken his seat in court, and was on the bench, the counsel for the traverser renewed their motion for a continuance, founded on the same affidavit; and after a full hearing and consideration of the argument, the court, Judge Griffin concurring, overruled the motion, and ordered the trial to proceed.

If this decision be correct, as he believes and insists that it is, no offence could be committed by him in making or concurring in it. It was a proper and legal performance of his duty as a judge. If it be erroneous, still the error, if an honest one, cannot be an offence, much less a high crime and misdemeanor; and as in his colleague it has been considered as an honest error, he confidently trusts it will be considered so in him also.

To the third charge adduced in support of the article now under consideration, the charge of using "unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions, towards the prisoner's counsel," and of "falsely insinuating, that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law, to which the conduct of this respondent did manifestly tend," he cannot answer otherwise than by a general denial. A charge so vague, admits not of precise or particular refutation. He denies that there was anything unusual or intentionally rude or contemptuous in his conduct or his expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; that he made any false insinuation whatever against them, or that his own conduct tended in any manner to produce insubordination to law. On the contrary, it was his wish and intention to treat the counsel with the respect due to their situation and functions, and with the decorum due to his own character. He thought it his duty to restrain such of their attempts as he considered improper, and to overrule motions made by them, which he considered as unfounded in law; but this it was his wish to accomplish in the manner least likely to offend, from which every consideration concurred in dissuading him. He did indeed think at that time, and still remains under the impression, that the conduct of the traverser's counsel, whether from intention or not he will not undertake to say, was disrespectful, irritating, and highly incorrect. That conduct which he viewed in this light, might have produced some irritation in a temper naturally quick and warm, and that this irritation might, notwithstanding his endeavors to suppress it, have appeared in his manner and in his expressions, he thinks not improbable; for he has had occasions of feeling and lamenting the want of sufficient caution and self-command, in things of this nature. But he confidently affirms, that his conduct in this particular was free from intentional impropriety; and this respondent denies, that any part of his conduct was such as ought to have induced the traverser's counsel to "abandon the cause of their client," nor does he believe that any such cause did induce them to take that step. On the contrary, he believes that it was taken by them under the influence of passion, or for some motive into which this respondent forbears at this time to inquire. And this respondent admits that the said traverser was convicted, and condemned to fine and imprisonment, but not by reason of the abandonment of his defence by his counsel; but because the charges against him were clearly proved, and no defence was made or attempted against far the greater number of them.

The fourth charge in support of this article attributes to this respondent "repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, which at length induced them to abandon the cause of their client, who was therefore convicted, and condemned to fine and imprisonment." To this charge, also, it is impossible to give any other answer but a general denial. He avers that he never interrupted the traverser's counsel vexatiously, or except when he considered it his duty to do so.

It cannot be denied that courts have power to interrupt counsel, when in their opinion the correctness of proceeding requires it. In this, as in everything else, they may err. They may sometimes act under the influence of momentary passion or irritation, to which they in common with other men are liable. But unless their conduct in such cases, though improper or ill-judged, be clearly shown to proceed, not from human infirmity, but from improper motives, it cannot be imputed to them as an offence, much less as a crime or misdemeanor.

Lastly, this respondent is charged under this article, with an "indecent solicitude, manifested by him, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice." This is another charge of which it is impossible to give a precise refutation, and to a general denial of which, this respondent must therefore confine himself. He denies that he felt any solicitude whatever for the conviction of the traverser; other than the general wish natural to every friend of truth, decorum, and virtue, that persons guilty of such offences, as that of which the traverser stood indicted, should be brought to punishment for the sake of example. He has no hesitation to acknowledge, that his indignation was strongly excited, by the atrocious and profligate libel which the traverser was charged with having written and published. This indignation, he believes, was felt by every virtuous and honorable man in the community, of every party, who had read the book in question, or become acquainted with its contents. How properly it was felt, will appear from the book itself, which this respondent has ready to produce to this honorable court; from the parts of it incorporated into the indictment now under consideration; and from further extracts contained in the paper marked exhibit No. 6, which this respondent prays leave to make part of this his answer. He admits, and it can never be to him a subject of self-reproach or a cause of regret, that he partook largely in this general indignation, but he denies that it in any manner influenced his conduct towards the traverser, which was regulated by a conscientious regard to his duty and the laws. He moreover contends, that a solicitude to procure the conviction of the traverser, however unbecoming his character as a judge, would not have been an offence, had he felt it; unless it had given rise to some misconduct on his part. Intentions and feelings, unless accompanied by actions, do not constitute crimes in this country; where the guilt or innocence of men is not judged of by their wishes and solicitudes, but by their conduct and its motives. And this respondent thinks it his duty, on this occasion, to enter his solemn protest against the introduction in this country of those arbitrary principles, at once the offspring and the instruments of despotism, which would make "high crimes and misdemeanors" to consist in "rude and contemptuous expressions," in "vexatious interruptions of counsel," and in the manifestation of "indecent solicitude" for the conviction of a most notorious offender. Such conduct is, no doubt, improper and unbecoming in any person, and much more so in a judge: but it is too vague, too uncertain, and too susceptible of forced interpretations, according to the impulse of passion or the views of policy, to be admitted into the class of punishable offences, under a system of law whose certainty and precision in the definition of crimes is its greatest glory, and the greatest privilege of those who live under its sway.

In concluding his defence against those charges contained in the fourth article of impeachment, he declares, that his whole conduct in that trial was regulated by a strict regard to the principles of law, and by an honest desire to do justice between the United States and the party accused. He felt a sincere wish, on the one hand, that the traverser might establish his innocence, by those fair and sufficient means which the law allows; and a determination, on the other, that he should not, by subterfuges and frivolous pretences, sport with the justice of the country, and evade that punishment of which, if guilty, he was so proper an object. These intentions, he is confident, were legal and laudable; and if, in any part of his conduct, he swerved from this line, it was an error of his judgment and not of his heart.

And the said respondent for plea to the said fourth article of impeachment, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime and misdemeanor, as in and by the said fourth article is alleged against him, and this he prays, may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to require.

The fifth article of impeachment charges this respondent with having awarded "a capias against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offence not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in that case made and provided."

This charge is rested, 1st, on the act of Congress of September 24, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," by which it is enacted, "that for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process, in the State where such offender may be found." And, 2dly, on a law of the State of Virginia, which is said to provide "that upon presentment by any grand jury, of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons so offending, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court." It is contended, in support of this charge, that the act of Congress above-mentioned made the State law the rule of proceeding, and that the State law was violated by issuing a capias against Callender, instead of a summons.

The first observation to be made on this part of the case is, that the date of the law of Virginia is not mentioned in the article. A very material omission! For it cannot be contended, that by the act of Congress in question, which was passed for establishing the laws of the United States, and regulating their proceedings, it was intended to render those proceedings dependent on all future acts of the State Legislatures. The intention certainly was to adopt, to a certain limited extent, the regulations existing in the States at the time of passing the act. Consequently, a law of Virginia, passed after this act, can have no operation on the proceedings under it. But by referring to the law of Virginia in question, it will be found to bear date on November 13, 1792, more than three years after this act of Congress, by which it is said to have been adopted. But the omission of the date of this law of Virginia is not the most material oversight which has been made in citing it. Its title is, "An act directing the method of proceeding against free persons charged with certain crimes," &c., and it enacts, section 28th, "that upon presentment made by the grand jury, of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons, or other proper process, against the person or persons so presented, to appear and answer at the next court." It will be observed that these words, "or other proper process," which leave it perfectly in the discretion of the court what process shall issue, provided it be such as is proper for bringing the offender to answer to the presentment, are omitted in this article of impeachment.

From these words it is perfectly manifest that the law of Virginia, admitting it to apply, did not order a summons to be issued, but left it perfectly in the discretion of the court to issue a summons, or such other process as they should judge proper. It is, therefore, a sufficient answer to this article to say, that this respondent considered a capias as the proper process, and therefore ordered it to issue; which he admits that he did immediately after the presentment was found against the said Callender by the grand jury.

This he is informed, and expects to prove, has been the construction of this law by the courts of Virginia, and their general practice. Indeed it would be most strange if any other construction or practice had been adopted. There are many offences not capital, which are of a very dangerous tendency, and on which very severe punishment is inflicted by the laws of Virginia; and to enact by law that in all such cases, however notorious or profligate the offenders might be, the courts should be obliged, after a presentment by a grand jury, to proceed against them by summons, would be to enact, that as soon as their guilt was rendered extremely probable, by the presentment of a grand jury, they should receive regular notice to escape from punishment by flight or concealment.

It will also appear, as this respondent believes, by a reference to the laws and practice of Virginia, into which he has made all the inquiries which circumstances and the shortness of time allowed him for preparing his answer would permit, that all the cases in which a summons is considered as the only proper process, are cases of petty offences, which, on the presentment of a grand jury, are to be tried by the court in a summary way, without the intervention of a petit jury. Therefore these provisions had no application to the case of Callender, which could be no otherwise proceeded on than by indictment, and trial on the indictment by a petit jury.

It must be recollected that the act of Congress of September 24, 1789, enacts, section 14, "that the courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of laws." Consequently, the circuit court, where the proceedings in question took place, had power to issue a capias against the traverser, on the presentment, unless the State law above-mentioned governed the case, and contained something to restrain the issuing of that writ in such a case. This respondent contends, for the reasons above stated, that this State law neither applied to the case, nor contained anything to prevent the issuing of a capias, if it had applied.

Thus it appears that this respondent, in ordering a capias to issue against Callender, decided correctly, as it certainly was his intention to do. But he claims no other merit than that of upright intention in this decision; for when he made the decision, he was utterly ignorant that such a law existed in Virginia; and declares he never heard of it till this article was reported by a committee of the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress. This law was not mentioned on the trial either by the counsel or the traverser, or by Judge Griffin, who certainly had much better opportunities of knowing it than this respondent, and who, no doubt, would have cited it had they known it and considered it as applicable to the case. This respondent well knows that, in a criminal view, ignorance of the law excuses no man in offending against it; but this maxim applies not to the decision of a judge; in whom ignorance of the law in general would certainly be a disqualification for this office, though not a crime; but ignorance of a particular act of assembly, of a State where he was an utter stranger, must be considered as a very pardonable error, especially as the counsel for the prisoner, to whose case that law is supposed to have applied, forebore or omitted to cite it; and as a judge of the State, always resident in it, and long conversant with its local laws, either forgot this law, or considered it as inapplicable.

Such is the answer which this respondent makes to the fifth article of impeachment. If he erred in this case, it was through ignorance of the law, and surely ignorance under such circumstances cannot be a crime, much less a crime and misdemeanor, for which he ought to be removed from his office. If a judge were impeachable for acting against law from ignorance only, it would follow that he would be punished in the same manner for deciding against law wilfully, and for deciding against it through mistake. In other words, there would be no distinction between ignorance and design, between error and corruption.

And the said respondent, for plea to the said fifth article of impeachment, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime and misdemeanor, as in and by the said fifth article is alleged against him; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

The sixth article of impeachment alleges that this respondent, "with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial, during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to the law in that case made and provided."

This charge also is founded, 1st, on the act of Congress of September 24, 1789, above-mentioned, which enacts, section 34, "that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision, in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply;" and, 2dly, on a law of the State of Virginia, which is supposed to provide, "that in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury, until the court next preceding that during which such presentment shall have been made." This law, it is contended, is made the rule of decision by the above-mentioned act of Congress, and was violated by the refusal to continue the case of Callender till the next term.

In answer to this charge this respondent declares, that he was at the time of making the above-mentioned decision wholly ignorant of any such law of Virginia as that in question; that no such law was adduced or mentioned by the counsel of Callender, in support of their motion for a continuance; neither when they first made it, before this respondent sitting alone, nor when they renewed it, after Judge Griffin had taken his seat in court; that no such law was mentioned by Judge Griffin, who concurred in overruling the motion for a continuance and ordering on the trial; which he could not have done had he known that such a law existed, or considered it as applicable to the case; and that this respondent never heard of any such law until the articles of impeachment now under consideration were reported, in the course of the present session of Congress, by a committee of the House of Representatives.

A judge is certainly bound to use all proper and reasonable means of obtaining a knowledge of the laws which he is appointed to administer; but, after the use of such means, to overlook, misunderstand, or remain ignorant of some particular law, is at all times a very pardonable error. It is much more so in the case of a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding a circuit court in a particular State, with which he is a stranger, and with the local laws of which he can have enjoyed but very imperfect opportunities of becoming acquainted. It was foreseen by Congress, in establishing the circuit courts of the United States, that difficulties and inconveniences must frequently arise from this source, and to obviate such difficulties, it was provided that the district judge of each State, who having been a resident of the State, and a practitioner in its courts, had all the necessary means of becoming acquainted with its local laws, should form a part of the circuit court in his own State. The Judge of the Supreme Court is expected, with reason, to be well versed in the general laws; but the local laws of the State form the peculiar province of the district judge, who may be justly considered as particularly responsible for their due observance. If, in the case in question, this respondent overlooked or misconstrued any local law of the State of Virginia, which ought to have governed the case, it was equally overlooked and misunderstood, not only by the prisoner's counsel who made the motion, and whose peculiar duty it was to know the law and bring it into the view of the court, but also by the district judge, who had the best opportunities of knowing and understanding it, and in whom, nevertheless, this oversight or mistake is considered as a venial error, while in this respondent it is made the ground of a criminal charge.

This respondent further states, that after the most diligent and the most extensive inquiry which the time allowed for preparing this answer would permit, he can find no law in Virginia which expressly enacts, that "in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury, until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall have been made." This principle he supposes to be an inference drawn by the authors of the articles of impeachment, from the law of Virginia mentioned in the answer to the preceding article, the law of November 15th, 1792, which provides "that upon presentment made by the grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons, or other proper process, against the person or persons so presented, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court." This law, he conceives, does not warrant the inference so drawn from it, because it speaks of presentments and not of indictments, which are very different things; and is, as he is informed, confined by practice and construction, in the State of Virginia, to cases of small offences, which are to be tried by the court itself, upon the presentment, without an indictment or the intervention of a petit jury. But, for cases, like that of Callender, where an indictment must follow the presentment, this law made no provision. Further, the State laws are directed by the above-mentioned act of Congress, to be the rule of decision in the courts of the United States only "in cases where they apply." Whether they apply or not to a particular case, is a question of law, to be decided by the court where such case is pending, and an error in making the decision is not a crime, nor even an offence, unless it can be shown to have proceeded from improper motives. This respondent is of opinion that the law in question did not apply to the case of Callender, for the reasons stated above; and, therefore, that it would have been his duty to disregard it, even had it been made known to him by the counsel for the traverser.

And, in the last place, he contends, that the law of Virginia in question, is not adopted by the above-mentioned act of Congress as the rule of decision, in such cases as that now under consideration. That act does, indeed, provide: "that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." But this provision, in his opinion, can relate only to rights acquired under the State laws which come into question on the trial; and not to forms of process or modes of proceeding, anterior or preparatory to the trial. Nor can it, as this respondent apprehends, have any application to indictments for offences against the statutes of the United States, which cannot with any propriety be called "trials at common law." It relates merely, in his opinion, to civil rights acquired under the State laws; which by virtue of this provision are, when they come in question in the courts of the United States, to be governed by the laws under which they accrued.

If in these opinions this respondent be incorrect, it is an honest error: and he contends that neither such an error in the construction of a law, nor his ignorance of a local State law which he had no opportunity of knowing, and of which the counsel for the party whose case it is supposed to have affected were equally ignorant, can be considered as an offence liable to impeachment, or to any sort of punishment or blame.

And for plea to the said sixth article of impeachment, the said Samuel Chase saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime, or misdemeanor, as in and by the said article is alleged against him; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

The seventh article of impeachment relates to some conduct of this respondent in his judicial capacity, at a circuit court of the United States held at Newcastle, in the State of Delaware, in June, 1800. The statement of this conduct, made in the article, is altogether erroneous; but if it were true, this respondent denies that it contains any matter for which he is liable to impeachment. It alleges that, "disregarding the duties of his office, he did descend from the dignity of a judge, and stoop to the level of an informer." This high offence consisted, according to the article, first, "in refusing to discharge the grand jury although entreated by several of the said jury to do so." Secondly, in "observing to the said grand jury, after the said grand jury had regularly declared through their foreman, that they had found no bills of indictment, and had no presentments to make, that he the said Samuel Chase understood that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order, that the name of this printer was —." Thirdly, "in then checking himself as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing." Fourthly, in adding "that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person; but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter," or words to that effect. And, fifthly, "in authoritatively enjoining on the District Attorney of the United States, with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question, the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded, and by a strict examination of them to find some passage which might furnish the groundwork of a prosecution against the printer."

These charges amount in substance to this: that the respondent refused to discharge a grand jury, on their request, which is every day's practice, and which he was bound to do, if he believed that the due administration of justice required their longer attendance; that he directed the attention of the grand jury to an offence against a statute of the United States, which, he had been informed, was committed in the district; and that he desired the District Attorney to aid the grand jury, in their inquiries concerning the existence and nature of this offence. By these three acts, each of which it was his duty to perform, he is alleged "to have degraded his high judicial functions, and tended to impair the public confidence 'in, and respect for, the tribunals of justice, so 'essential to the public welfare."

That this honorable Court may be able to form correctly its judgment, concerning the transaction mentioned in this article, this respondent submits the following statement of it, which he avers to be true, and expects to prove:

On the 27th day of June, 1800, this respondent, as one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, presided in the circuit court of the United States, then held at Newcastle, in and for the district of Delaware, and was assisted by Gunning Bedford, Esq., then district judge of the United States for that district. At the opening of the court on that day, this respondent, according to his duty and his uniform practice, delivered a charge to the grand jury, in which he gave in charge to them several statutes of the United States, and, among others, an act of Congress, passed July 14th, 1798, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and commonly called the "sedition law." He directed them to inquire concerning any breaches of those statutes, and especially of that commonly called the sedition law, within the district of Delaware.

On the same day, before the usual hour of adjournment, the grand jury came into court, and informed the court that they had found no indictment or presentment, and had no business before them, for which reason they wished to be discharged. This respondent replied, that it was earlier than the usual hour of discharging a grand jury; and that business might occur during the sitting of the court. He also asked them if they had no information of publications within the district, that came under the sedition law, and added, that he had been informed that there was a paper called the Mirror, published at Wilmington, which contained libellous charges against the Government and President of the United States: that he had not seen that paper, but it was their duty to inquire into the subject; and if they had not turned their attention to it, the attorney for the district would be pleased to examine a file of that paper, and if he found anything that came within the sedition law, would lay it before them." This is the substance of what the respondent said to the grand jury on that occasion, and, he believes, nearly his words; on the morning of the next day they came into court and declared that they had no presentments or indictments to make, on which they were immediately discharged. The whole time, therefore, for which they were detained, was twenty-four hours, far less than is generally required of grand juries.

In these proceedings, this respondent acted according to his sense of what the duties of his office required. It certainly was his duty to give in charge to the grand jury, all such statutes of the United States as provided for the punishment of offences, and, among others, that called the sedition act; into all offences against which act, while it continued in force, the grand jury were bound by their oaths to inquire. In giving it in charge, together with the other acts of Congress for the punishment of offences, he followed, moreover, the example of the other judges of the Supreme Court, in holding their respective circuit courts. He also contends, and did then believe, that it was his duty, when informed of an offence, which the grand jury had overlooked, to direct their attention towards it, and to request for them, and even to require, if necessary, the aid of the District Attorney in making their inquiries. In thus discharging what he conceives to be his duty, even if he committed an error in so considering it, he denies that he committed or could commit any offence whatever.

With respect to the remarks which he is charged by this article with having made to the grand jury relative to "a highly seditious temper, which he had understood to have manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington," and relative to "a most seditious printer, residing in Wilmington, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order;" this respondent does not recollect or believe, that he made any such observations. But if he did make them, it could not be improper in him to tell the jury that he had received such information, if in fact he had received it; which was probably the case, though he cannot recollect it with certainty at this distance of time. That this information, if he did receive it, was correct so far as regarded the printer in question, will fully appear from a file of the paper called the "Mirror of the Times," &c., published at Wilmington, Delaware, from February 5th to March 19th, 1800, inclusive, which he has lately obtained, and is ready to produce to this honorable Court, when necessary, and some extracts from which are contained in the exhibits severally marked No. 7, which he prays leave to make part of this his answer.

And for plea to the said seventh article of impeachment, the said Samuel Chase saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by the said seventh article is alleged against him, and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

The eighth article of impeachment charges that this respondent, "disregarding the duties and dignity of his official character did, at a circuit court for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore, in the month of May, 1803, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against their State government and constitution," and also that this respondent, "under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the grand jury as aforesaid, did endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against the Government of the United States, by delivering opinions which were, at that time and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra judicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan."

In answer to this charge this respondent admits that he did, as one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, preside in a circuit court held at Baltimore in and for the district of Maryland, in May, 1803, and did then deliver a charge to the grand jury, and express in the conclusion of it some opinions as to certain public measures, both of the Government of Maryland and of that of the United States. But he denies that, in thus acting, he disregarded the duties and dignity of his judicial character, perverted his official right and duty to address the grand jury, or had any intention to excite the fears or resentment of any person whatever against the Government and Constitution of the United States or of Maryland. He denies that the sentiments which he thus expressed were "intemperate and inflammatory," either in themselves or in the manner of delivering; that he did endeavor to excite the odium of any person whatever against the Government of the United States, or did deliver any opinions which were in any respect indecent, or which had any tendency to prostitute his judicial character to any low or improper purpose. He denies that he did anything that was unusual, improper, or unbecoming in a judge, or expressed any opinions, but such as a friend to his country and a firm supporter of the Governments, both of the State of Maryland and of the United States, might entertain. For the truth of what he here says, he appeals confidently to the charge itself: which was read from a written paper now in his possession ready to be produced. A true copy of all such parts of this paper as relate to the subject matter of this article of impeachment, is contained in the exhibit marked No. 8, which he prays leave to make part of this his answer. That part of it which relates to the article now under consideration is in these words:

"You know, gentlemen, that our State and national institutions were framed to secure to every member of the society equal liberty and equal rights; but the late alteration of the Federal Judiciary, by the abolition of the office of the sixteen circuit judges, and the recent change in our State constitution by the establishing universal suffrage, and the further alteration that is contemplated in our State judiciary. (if adopted,) will in my judgment take away all security for property and personal liberty. The independence of the National Judiciary is already shaken to its foundation, and the virtue of the people alone can restore it. The independence of the judges of this State will be entirely destroyed if the bill for the abolishing the two supreme courts should be ratified by the next General Assembly. The change of the State constitution, by allowing universal suffrage, will, in my opinion, certainly and rapidly destroy all protection to property and all security to personal liberty; and our republican constitution will sink into a mobocracy, the worst of all possible governments.

"I can only lament that the main pillar of our State constitution has been thrown down by the establishment of universal suffrage. By this shock alone the whole building totters to its base, and will crumble into ruins before many years elapse, unless it be restored to its original state. If the independency of your State judges, which your bill of rights wisely declares 'to be essential to the impartial administration of justice, and the great security to the rights and liberties of the people,' shall be taken away, by the ratification of the bill passed for that purpose, it will precipitate the destruction of your whole State constitution, and there will be nothing left in it worthy the care or support of freemen."

Admitting these opinions to have been incorrect and unfounded, this respondent denies that there was any law which forbids him to express them in a charge to a grand jury, and he contends that there can be no offence without the breach of some law. The very essence of despotism consists in punishing acts which, at the time when they were done, were forbidden by no law. Admitting the expression of political opinions by a judge, in his charge to a grand jury, to be improper and dangerous, there are many improper and very dangerous acts, which not being forbidden by law, cannot be punished. Hence the necessity of new penal laws, which are from time to time enacted for the prevention of acts not before forbidden, but found by experience to be of dangerous tendency. It has been the practice in this country, ever since the beginning of the Revolution which separated us from Great Britain, for the judges to express from the bench, by way of charge to the grand jury, and to enforce to the utmost of their ability such political opinions as they thought correct and useful. There have been instances in which the Legislative bodies of this country have recommended this practice to the judges; and it was adopted by the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States as soon as the present Judicial system was established. If the Legislature of the United States considered this practice as mischievous, dangerous, or liable to abuse, they might have forbidden it by law; to the penalties of which, such judges as might afterwards transgress it, would be justly subjected. By not forbidding it, the Legislature has given to it an implied sanction; and for that Legislature to punish it now by way of impeachment would be to convert into crime, by an ex post facto proceeding, an act which, when it was done and at all times before, they had themselves virtually declared to be innocent. Such conduct would be utterly subversive of the fundamental principle on which free government rests; and would form a precedent for the most sanguinary and arbitrary persecutions under the forms of law.

Nor can the incorrectness of the political opinions thus expressed have any influence in deciding on the guilt or innocence of a judge's conduct in expressing them. For if he should be considered as guilty or innocent, according to the supposed correctness or incorrectness of the opinion thus expressed by him, it would follow that error in political opinion, however honestly entertained, might be a crime; and that a party in power might, under this pretext, destroy any judge who might happen, in a charge to a grand jury, to say something capable of being construed by them into a political opinion adverse to their own system.

There might be some pretence for saying, that for a judge to utter seditious sentiments with intent to excite sedition, would be an impeachable offence, although such a doctrine would be liable to the most dangerous abuses, and is hostile to the fundamental principles of our Constitution, and to the best established maxims of our criminal jurisprudence. But, admitting this doctrine to be correct, it cannot be denied that the seditious intention must be proved clearly, either by the most necessary implication from the words themselves, or by some overt acts of a seditious nature connected with them. In the present case no such acts are alleged, but the proof of a seditious intent must rest on the words themselves. By this rule this respondent is willing to be judged. Let the opinions which he delivered be examined, and if the members of this honorable Court can lay their hands on their hearts, in the presence of God, and say that these opinions are not only erroneous, but seditious also, and carry with them internal evidence of an intention in this respondent to excite sedition, either against the State or General Government, he is content to be found guilty.

In making this examination, let it be borne in mind, that to oppose a depending measure by endeavoring to convince the public that it is improper, and ought not to be adopted; or to promote the repeal of a law already passed by endeavoring to convince the public that it ought to be repealed, and that such men ought to be elected to the Legislature as will repeal it; to attempt, in fine, the correction of public measures by arguments tending to show their improper nature, or destructive tendency, never has been or can be considered as sedition in any country where the principles of law and liberty are respected; but is the proper and usual exercise of that right of opinion and speech which constitutes the distinguishing feature of free government. The abuse of this privilege by writing and publishing as facts malicious falsehoods, with intent to defame, is punishable as libellous in the courts having jurisdiction of such offences; where the truth or falsehood of the facts alleged, and the malice or correctness of the intention form the criterion of guilt and innocence. But the character of libellous, much less of seditious, has never been applied to the expression of opinions concerning the tendency of public measures, or to arguments urged for the purpose of opposing them, or of effecting their repeal. To apply the doctrine of sedition or of libels to such cases, would instantly destroy all liberty of speech, subvert the main pillars of free government, and convert the tribunals of justice into engines of party vengeance. To condemn a public measure, therefore, as pernicious in its tendency; to use arguments for proving it to be so, and to endeavor by these means to prevent its adoption, if still depending, or to procure its repeal in a regular and Constitutional way, if it be already adopted, can never be considered as sedition, or in any way illegal.

The first opinion expressed to the grand jury on the occasion in question, by this respondent, was, that "the late alteration of the Federal Judiciary, by the abolition of the office of the sixteen circuit judges; and the recent change in our State Constitution, by establishing universal suffrage; and the further alteration that was then contemplated in our State Judiciary, if adopted," would, in the judgment of this respondent, "take away all security for property and personal liberty." That is, "these three measures, if the last of them, which is still depending, should be adopted, will, in my opinion, form a system whose pernicious tendency must be, to take away the security for our property and our personal liberty, which we have hitherto derived from the salutary restrictions laid by the authors of our Constitution on the right of suffrage, and from the present constitution of our courts of justice." What is this but an argument to persuade the people of Maryland to reject the alterations in their State Judiciary which were then proposed; which this respondent, as a citizen of that State, had a right to oppose; and the adoption of which depended on the Legislature then to be chosen? If this be sedition, then will it be impossible to express an opinion opposite to the views of the ruling party of the moment, or to oppose any of their measures by argument, without becoming subject to such punishment as they may think proper to inflict.

The next opinion is, that "the independence of the national Judiciary was also shaken to its foundation, and that the virtue of the people alone could restore it." In other words, "The act of Congress for repealing the late circuit court law, and vacating thereby the offices of the judges, has shaken to its foundation the independence of the national Judiciary, and nothing but a change in the representation of Congress, which the return of the people to correct sentiments alone can effect, will be sufficient to produce a repeal of this act, and thereby restore to its former vigor the part of the Federal Constitution which has been thus impaired."

This is the obvious meaning of the expression; and it amounts to nothing more than an argument in favor of that change, which this respondent then thought and still thinks to be very desirable; an argument, the force of which as a patriot he might feel, and which as a free man he had a right to advance.

Trial of Judge Chase.

The next opinion is, that "the independence of the judges of the State of Maryland would be entirely destroyed if the bill for abolishing the two supreme courts should be ratified by the next General Assembly." This opinion, however incorrect it may be, seems to have been adopted by the people of Maryland, to whom this argument against the bill in question was addressed: for at the next session of the Legislature this bill, which went to change entirely the constitutional tenure of judicial office in the State, and to render the subsistence of the judges dependent on the Legislature, and their continuance in office on the Executive, was abandoned by common consent.

All the other opinions expressed by this respondent, as above mentioned, bear the same character with those already considered. They are arguments addressed to the people of Maryland, for the purpose of dissuading them from the adoption of a measure then depending, and of inducing them, if possible, to restore to its original state that part of their constitution relating to the right of suffrage, by a repeal of the law, which had been made for its alteration.

Such were the objects of this respondent in delivering those opinions, and he contends that they were fair, proper, and legal objects, and that he had a right to pursue them in this way—a right sanctioned by the universal practice of this country, and by the acquiescence of its various Legislative authorities. Such, he contends, is the true and obvious meaning of the opinions which he delivered, and which he believes to be correct. It is not now necessary to inquire into their correctness; but if incorrect, he denies that they contain anything seditious, or any evidence of those improper intentions which are imputed to him by this article of impeachment. He denies that in delivering them to the grand jury he committed any offence, infringing any law, or did anything unusual, or heretofore considered in this country as improper and unbecoming a judge. If this article of impeachment can be sustained on these grounds, the liberty of speech on national concerns, and the tenure of the judicial office under the Government of the United States, must hereafter depend on the arbitrary will of the House of Representatives and the Senate, to be declared on impeachment, after the acts are done, which it may at any time be thought necessary to treat as high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said Samuel Chase, for plea to the said eighth article of impeachment, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime and misdemeanor, as in and by the said eighth article is alleged against him, and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable Court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

This respondent has now laid before this honorable Court, as well as the time allowed him would permit, all the circumstances of the case, with an humble trust in Providence, and a consciousness that he has discharged all his official duties with justice and impartiality, to the best of his knowledge and abilities; and that intentionally he hath committed no crime or misdemeanor, or any violation of the Constitution or laws of his country. Confiding in the impartiality, independence, and integrity of his judges, and that they will patiently hear, and conscientiously determine this case, without being influenced by the spirit of party, by popular prejudice, or political motives, he cheerfully submits himself to their decision.

If it shall appear to this honorable court, from the evidence produced, that he hath acted in his judicial character with wilful injustice or partiality, he doth not wish any favor, but expects that the whole extent of the punishment permitted in the Constitution will be inflicted upon him.

If any part of his official conduct shall appear to this honorable court, stricti juris, to have been illegal, or to have proceeded from ignorance or error in judgment; or if any part of his conduct shall appear, although not illegal, to have been irregular or improper, but not to have flown from a depravity of heart, or any unworthy motive, he feels confident that this court will make allowance for the imperfections and frailties incidental to man.

He is satisfied that every member of this tribunal will observe the principles of humanity and justice, and will presume him innocent until his guilt shall be established by legal and creditable witnesses, and will be governed in his decision by the moral and Christian rule of rendering that justice to this respondent which he would wish to receive:

This respondent now stands not merely before an earthly tribunal, but also before that awful Being whose presence fills all space, and whose all-seeing eye more especially surveys the temples of justice and religion. In a little time, his accusers, his judges, and himself, must appear at the bar of Omnipotence, where the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, and every human being shall answer for his deeds done in the body, and shall be compelled to give evidence against himself, in the presence of an assembled universe. To his Omnipotent Judge, at that awful hour, he now appeals for the rectitude and purity of his conduct, as to all the matters of which he is this day accused.

He hath now only to adjure each member of this honorable Court, by the living God, and in his holy name, to render impartial justice to him, according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. He makes this solemn demand of each member by all his hopes of happiness in the world to come, which he will have voluntarily renounced by the oath he has taken, if he shall wilfully do this respondent injustice, or disregard the Constitution or laws of the United States, which he has solemnly sworn to make the rule and standard of his judgment and decision.

Mr. RANDOLPH, on behalf of the Managers, requested time to consult the House of Representatives, and likewise to be furnished with a copy of the answer of Judge Chase, for the purpose of making a replication to it.

The PRESIDENT said the Senate would take the request into consideration, and make known to the House of Representatives such order as should be taken thereon.

Whereupon, the Senate, at the suggestion of the President, retired to their Legislative apartment.

On Wednesday, the 6th instant, the House of Representatives received a copy of the foregoing answer, which was referred to the Managers. On the same day, Mr. RANDOLPH reported a replication to the answer, which was immediately taken into consideration. Several motions were made and rejected, after a short debate, to soften the style; when the replication, as reported, was adopted—yeas 77, nays 34. Whereupon, it was resolved that the Managers be instructed to proceed to maintain the said replication at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

THURSDAY, February 7.

The Court was opened about two o'clock.

Present—the Managers, and Mr. HOPKINSON, of the counsel for Mr. Chase.

Mr. RANDOLPH, on behalf of the Managers, read the replication of the House of Representatives, to the answer of Samuel Chase, as follows:

Replication by the House of Representatives of the United States, to the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the said House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives of the United States have considered the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the Articles of Impeachment against him, by them exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and observe,

That the said Samuel Chase hath endeavored to cover the high crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge, by evasive insinuations and misrepresentation of facts; that the said answer does give a gloss and coloring utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters contained in the said Articles; that the said Samuel Chase did, in fact, commit the numerous acts of oppression, persecution, and injustice, of which he stands accused; and the House of Representatives, in full confidence of the truth and justice of their accusation, and of the necessity of bringing the said Samuel Chase to a speedy and exemplary punishment, and not doubting that the Senate will use all becoming diligence to do justice to the proceedings of the House of Representatives, and to vindicate the honor of the nation, do aver their charge against the said Samuel Chase to be true, and that the said Samuel Chase is guilty in such manner as he stands impeached; and that the House of Representatives will be ready to prove their charges against him, at such convenient time and place as shall be appointed for that purpose.

Signed by order, and in behalf of, the said House,

Mr. HOPKINSON requested a copy of the replication, which, the PRESIDENT replied, would be furnished by the Secretary.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE moved a resolution to the following effect:

That the Secretary be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, proceed with the trial of Samuel Chase; which was agreed to without one dissenting voice, 34 members voting for it.

Whereupon, the Senate withdrew to their Legislative apartment.

FRIDAY, February 8.

The Court opened precisely at twelve o'clock.

Present: the Managers, and the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole; and Mr. Chase, attended by his counsel, Messrs. MARTIN, HARPER, HOPKINSON, and KEY.

The crier having, agreeably to a prescribed form, notified all those concerned to come forward and make good the charges exhibited against Samuel Chase,

Mr. RANDOLPH, the leading Manager, requested that the witnesses on the part of the prosecution might be called, to ascertain who were present.

They were accordingly called, to the number of twenty-four.

Present: Alexander James Dallas, William Lewis, William Rawle, William S. Biddle, Edward Tilghman, George Read, John Montgomery, John Stephen, John Thomson Mason, Samuel H. Smith, John Taylor, George Hay, William Wirt, and John Heath.

Absent: James Lea, John Crow, Risdon Bishop, Aquila Hall, Philip Stewart, Thomas Hall, Philip N. Nicholas, John Harvie, Meriwether Jones, and James Pleasants.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that various considerations, which it was unnecessary to detail, induced him, on behalf of the Managers, to move a postponement of the trial till to-morrow, when they hoped to be prepared to proceed with it.

Mr. HARPER said that, on behalf of Judge Chase, he would not object to the motion.

The PRESIDENT informed the Managers that the Senate acceded to their request, and added, that the Senate would attend to-morrow at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of proceeding with the trial.

At the request of Mr. HARPER, the witnesses on the part of Judge Chase were called over, to the number of forty.

Present: John A. Chevalier, David M. Randolph, John Marshall, John Basset, Samuel P. Moore, William C. Frazier, David Robertson, Edward Tilghman, Wm. Meredith, Jared Ingersoll, Samuel Ewing, James Winchester, Walter Dorsey, James P. Boyd, Nicholas Brice, John Purviance, Wm. M. Mechin, Thomas Chase, William H. Winder, William Gwynn, William Rawle, William J. Govane, Gunning Bedford, Nicholas Vandyke, John Hall, junr, Archibald Hamilton, and Thomas Carpenter.

Absent: William Marshall, Edmund Randolph, Robert Gamble, Philip Moore, Cornelius Comegys, John Stewart, and Edward J. Coale.

Not found: John Hopkins, Philip Gooch, William Minor, and Samuel Wheeler.

Sick: Cyrus Griffin. Dead: J. C. Barrett.

Whereupon the Court rose.

Trial of Judge. Chase.

SATURDAY, February 9.

The Court was opened precisely at 12 o'clock.

Present: the Managers, attended by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel, as mentioned in the proceedings of yesterday.

At a quarter after 12 o'clock, Mr. RANDOLPH, on behalf of the managers, opened the impeachment, as follows:

Mr. President: It becomes my duty to open this cause on behalf of the prosecution. From this duty, however incompetent I feel myself to its performance, at all times, and more especially at this time, as well from the very short period which has been allowed us to consider the long and elaborate plea of the respondent, as from the severe pressure of disease, it does not become me to shrink. The station in which I have been placed calls for the discharge of an important public trust at my hands. It shall be performed to the best of my ability, inadequate as I know that ability to be. When I speak of the short period which has been allowed us, I hope not to be understood as expressing, on our part, any dissatisfaction at the course which has been pursued, or any wish to prolong the time which has been allotted for trial. We are sensible of a disposition in this honorable Court to grant us every indulgence which we ought to ask, and when their attention is called to the precipitate hurry of our preparation, it is only to offer, on behalf of an individual, perhaps a weak apology for the weak defence which he is about to make of the cause confided to his care. A desire for the furtherance of justice and the avoidance of delay, but, above all, an unshaken conviction that we stand on impregnable ground, induce us on this short notice to declare that we are ready to substantiate our accusation, to prove that the respondent is guilty in such manner as he stands impeached.

It is a painful but indispensable task which we are called upon to perform: to establish the guilt of a great officer of Government, of a man, who, if he had made a just use of those faculties which God and Nature bestowed upon him would have been the ornament and benefactor of his country, would have rendered her services as eminent and useful as he has inflicted upon her outrages and wrongs deep and deadly. A character endowed by nature with some of her best attributes, cultivated by education, placed by his country in a conspicuous station, invested with authority whose righteous exercise would have rendered him a terror to the wicked, whilst it endeared him to the wise and good: such a character, presented to the nation in the light in which he now stands, and in which his misdeeds have made it our duty to bring him forward, forms one of the saddest spectacles which can be offered to the public eye. Base is that heart which could triumph over him.

I will now proceed to state the principal points on which we mean to rely, and which we expect to establish by the clearest evidence. In doing this I shall be necessarily led to notice many of the leading statements of the respondent's answer. We will begin with the first article. [Here Mr. R. read that article.] The answer to the first of these charges is by evasive insinuation and misrepresentation, by an attempt to wrest the accusation from its true bearing, the manner and time of delivering the opinion, and the intent with which it was delivered, to the correctness of the opinion itself, which is not the point in issue. And here permit me to remark, that if the Managers of this impeachment were governed only by their own conviction of the course which they ought, necessarily, to pursue, and not by the high sense of duty which they owe to their eminent employers, they would have felt themselves justified in resting their accusation on the admissions of the respondent himself. It is not for the opinion itself, that the respondent is impeached; it is for a daring inroad upon the criminal jurisprudence of his country, by delivering that opinion at a time and in a manner (in writing) before unknown and unheard of. The criminal intent is to be inferred from the boldness of the innovation itself, as well as from other overt acts charged in this article. The admission of the respondent ought to secure his conviction on this charge. He acknowledges he did deliver an opinion, in writing, on the question of law, (which it was the right and duty of the jury to determine, as well as the fact,) before counsel had been heard in defence of John Fries, the prisoner. I must beg the assistance of one of the gentlemen with whom I am associated, to read this part of the answer. [Mr. Clark accordingly read the reply of Mr. Chase to this charge.] We charge the respondent with a gross departure from the forms, and a flagrant outrage upon the substance of criminal justice, in delivering a written, prejudicated opinion on the case of Fries, tending to bias the minds of the jury against him before counsel had been heard in his defence. The respondent (page 33, of the answer) admits the fact, for he knew that we are prepared to prove it. But he artfully endeavors to shift the argument from the real point in contest, to the soundness of the opinion itself, which, however questionable (and of its incorrectness I entertain no doubt) it is not our object, at this time, to examine. For the truth of this opinion and, as it would seem, for the propriety of this proceeding, the respondent takes shelter under precedent. He tells you, sir, this doctrine had been repeatedly decided on solemn argument and deliberation, twice in the same court, and once in that very case. What is this, but a confession, that he himself hath been the first man to venture on so daring an innovation on the forms of our criminal jurisprudence? To justify himself for having given a written opinion before counsel had been heard for the prisoner, he resorts to the example set by his predecessors, who had delivered the customary verbal opinion, after solemn arguments and deliberation. And what do these repeated arguments and solemn deliberations prove, but that none of his predecessors ever arrogated to themselves the monstrous privilege of breaking in upon those sacred institutions, which guard the life and liberty of the citizen from the rude inroads of powerful injustice? The learned and eminent judges, to whose example he appeals, for justification, decided after, and not before a hearing. They exercised the acknowledged privilege of the bench in giving an opinion to the jury on the question of law, after it had been fully argued by counsel, on both sides. They never attempted, by previous and written decisions, to wrest from the jury their undeniable right, of deciding upon the law as well as the fact, necessarily involved in a general verdict, to usurp the decision to themselves, or to prejudice the minds of the jurors against the defence. I beg this honorable Court never to lose sight of the circumstance, that this was a criminal trial, for a capital offence, and that the offence charged was treason. The respondent also admits, that the counsel for Fries, not meaning to contest the truth of the facts charged in the indictment, rested their defence altogether upon the law, which he declared to have been settled in the cases of Vigol and Mitchell: a decision which, although it might be binding on the court, the jury were not obliged to respect, and which the counsel had a right to controvert before them, the sole judges, in a case of that nature, both of the law and fact. I do not deny the right of the court to explain their sense of the law to the jury, after counsel have been heard; but I do deny that the jury are bound by such exposition. If they verily believed that the overt acts charged in the indictment did not amount to treason, they could not without a surrender of their consciences into the hands of the court, without a flagrant violation of all that is dear and sacred to man, bring in a verdict of guilty. I repeat that in such a case the jury are not only the sole judges of the law, but that where their verdict is favorable to the prisoner, they are the judges without appeal. In civil cases, indeed, the verdict may be set aside and a new trial granted; but in a criminal prosecution, the verdict, if not guilty, is final and conclusive. It is only when the finding of the jury is unfavorable to the prisoner, that the humane provisions of our law, always jealous of oppression when the life or liberty of the citizen is at stake, permits the verdict to be set aside, and a new trial granted to the unhappy culprit. When I concede the right of the court to explain the law to the jury in a criminal, and especially in a capital case, I am penetrated with a conviction that it ought to be done, if at all, with great caution and delicacy. I must beg leave to take, before this honorable Court, what appears to my unlettered judgment, to be a strong and obvious distinction. There is, in my mind, a material difference between a naked definition of law, the application of which is left to the jury, and the application by the court, of such definition to the particular case, upon which the jury are called upon to find a general verdict. Surely, there is a wide and evident distinction between an abstract opinion upon a point of law, and an opinion applied to the facts admitted by the party accused, or proven against him. But it is alleged, on behalf of the respondent, that the law in this case was settled, and upon this he rests his defence. Will it be pretended by any man that the law of treason is better established than the law of murder? What is treason, as defined by the Constitution? Levying war against the United States, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. What is murder? Killing with malice aforethought, a definition at least as simple and plain as the other. And because what constitutes murder has been established and settled through a long succession of ages and adjudications, has any judge, for that reason, been ever daring enough to assert that counsel should be precluded from endeavoring to convince the jury that the overt acts, charged in the indictment, did not amount to murder? Is a court authorized to say, that, because killing with deliberate malice is murder, therefore the act of killing, admitted by the prisoner's counsel, or established by evidence, was a killing with malice prepense, and did constitute murder? I venture to say that an instance cannot be adduced, familiar as the definition of murder is even to the most ignorant, numerous as have been the convictions for that atrocious crime, where counsel have been deprived of their unquestionable right to address the jury on the law, as well as on the fact. Much less can an instance be produced, in any trial for a capital offence, where they have found themselves anticipated in the question of law by a written opinion, to be taken by the jury out of court, as the landmark by which their verdict is to be directed. I have always understood, that, even in a civil case, when the jury carried out with them a written paper, relating to the matter in issue, and which was not offered, or permitted to be given in evidence to them, it was sufficient to vitiate their verdict, and good ground for a new trial. This written opinion of the court, delivered previous to a hearing of the cause, is a novelty to our laws and usages. It would be reprehensible in any case, but in a criminal prosecution, for a capital offence, and that offence treason, (where, above all, oppression and arbitrary proceedings on the part of courts are most to be dreaded and guarded against,) it cannot be too strongly reprobated, or too severely punished.

What would be said of a judge who in a trial for murder, where the facts were admitted (or proved) should declare from the bench, that whatever argument counsel had to offer, in relation to the facts, may be addressed to the jury, but that they should not attempt to convince the jury that such facts came not within the law, did not amount to murder, but that everything which they had to say upon the question of law, should be addressed to the court, and to the court only. Can you figure to yourselves a spectacle more horrible?

We are prepared to prove, what the respondent has in part admitted, that he "restricted the counsel of Fries from citing such English authorities as they believed apposite, and certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed material to their defence;" that the prisoner was debarred by him, from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury, through his counsel, on the law, as well as the fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give, and that he attempted to wrest from the jury their undeniable right to hear argument, and, consequently, to determine upon the question of law which in a criminal case it was their sole and unquestionable province to decide. These last charges (except as far as relates to the laws of the United States) are impliedly admitted by the respondent. He confesses that he would not admit the prisoner's counsel to cite certain cases, "because they could not inform but might deceive and mislead the jury." Mr. President, it is the noblest trait in this inestimable trial, that in criminal prosecutions, where the verdict is general, the jury are the sole judges, and, where they acquit the prisoner, the judges, without appeal, both of law and fact. And what is the declaration of the respondent but an admission that he wished to take from the jury their indisputable privilege to hear argument and determine upon the law, and to usurp to himself that power which belongs to them, and to them only? It is one of the most glorious attributes of jury trial, that in criminal cases (particularly such as are capital) the prisoner's counsel may (and they often do) attempt "to deceive and mislead the jury." It is essential to the fairness of the trial, that it should be conducted with perfect freedom. It is congenial to the generous spirit of our institutions to lean to the side of an unhappy fellow-creature, put in jeopardy, of limb, or life, or liberty. The free principles of our Governments, individual and federal, teach us to make every humane allowance in his favor, to grant him, with a liberality unknown to the narrow and tyrannous maxims of most nations, every indulgence not inconsistent with the due administration of justice. Hence, a greater latitude is permitted to the prosecutor. The jury, upon whose verdict the event is staked, are presumed to be men capable of understanding what they are called upon to decide, and the Attorney for the State, a gentleman learned in his profession, capable of detecting and exposing the attempts of the opposite counsel to mislead and deceive. There is, moreover, the court, to which, in cases of difficulty, recourse might be had. But what indeed is the difficulty arising from the law in criminal cases, for the most part? What is to hinder an honest jury from deciding, especially after the aid of an able discussion, whether such an act was killing with malice prepenze, or such other overt acts set forth in an indictment, constituted a levying war against the United States; and to what purpose has treason been defined by the Constitution itself, if overbearing arbitrary judges are permitted to establish among us the odious and dangerous doctrine of constructive treason? The acts of Congress which had been referred to on the former trial, but which the respondent said he would not suffer to be cited again, tended to show that the offence committed by Fries did not amount to treason; that it was a misdemeanor only, already provided for by law, and punishable with fine and imprisonment. The respondent indeed denies this part of the charge, but he justifies it even (as he says) if it be proved upon him. And are the laws of our own country (as well as foreign authorities) not to be suffered to be read in our courts, in justification of a man whose life is put in jeopardy!

I now proceed to the second article—the case of Basset, whose objection to serve on Callender's jury was overruled by the judge, who stands arraigned before this honorable Court. In the 30th page of the respondent's answer it is stated, that a new trial was granted to Fries, "upon the ground (as this respondent understood and believes) that one of the jurors, after he was summoned, but before he was sworn, had made some declaration unfavorable to the prisoner." It will be remembered that both the trials of Fries preceded that of Callender. Upon what principle, then, could the respondent declare Basset a good jurymen, when he was apprized of the previous decision in the case of Fries, by his brother judge, whom he professes to hold in such high reverence, and by whose decision, on his own principles, he must have held himself bound. For surely the same exception to a jurymen, which would furnish ground for a new trial, ought to be a cause of setting aside such juror, if it be taken previous to his being sworn.

From the respondent's own showing it appears, that the question put to the jurymen generally, and to Basset among others, was, whether they "had formed and delivered any opinion upon the subject-matter then to be tried, or concerning the charges contained in the indictment." And here let me refer the court to the question which the respondent put to the jurors in the case of Fries. It was, "whether they had ever formed, or delivered any opinion as to his guilt, or innocence, or that he ought to be punished?" How is this departure from the respondent's own practice, this inconsistency with himself, to be reconciled? In the one case the question is put in the disjunctive; "have you formed or delivered?" In the other, it is, in the conjunctive, "formed and delivered;" besides other material difference in the terms and import of the two questions. Wherefore, I repeat, this contradiction of himself? But, Mr. President, we shall be prepared to prove that the words "subject-matter then to be tried," were not comprised in the question propounded to Basset, or to any of the other jurors. The question was, as will be shown in evidence, "have you ever formed and delivered any opinion concerning the charges contained in the indictment?" And it is remarkable that the whole argument of the respondent upon this point, goes to justify the question which was actually put, and which he probably expected we should prove that he did put, rather than that which he himself declares to have been propounded by him. Such a question must necessarily have been answered in the negative. Basset could never have seen the indictment: and although his mind might have been made up on the book, whatever opinion he might have formed and delivered as to the guilt of Callender, or however desirous he might have been of procuring his conviction and punishment, still, not having seen the indictment, he could not divine what passages of the book were made the subject of charges, and, by the criterion established by the judge, he was a good juror. But if the juror's mind was thus prejudiced against the book and the writer, was he, merely because he had not seen the indictment, competent to pass between him and his country on the charges contained in it, and extracted out of the book? And even if the question had been such as the respondent states; yet being put in the conjunctive, the most inveterate foe of the traverser who was artful, or cautious enough to forbear the expression of his enmity, would thereby have been admitted as competent to pass between the traverser and his country in a criminal prosecution.

The third article relates to the rejection of John Taylor's testimony. This fact also is admitted, and an attempt is made to justify it, on the ground of its "irrelevancy," on the pretext that the witness could not prove the whole of a particular charge. By recurring to "The Prospect Before Us," a book, which, with all its celebrity, I never saw till yesterday, I find this charge consists of two distinct sentences. Taken separately the respondent asserts that they mean nothing; taken together, a great deal. And because the respondent undertook to determine (without any authority as far as I can learn) that Colonel Taylor could not prove the whole, that is both sentences, he rejected his evidence entirely, for "irrelevancy." Might not his testimony have been relevant to that of some other witness, on the same, or on another charge? I appeal to the learning and good sense of this honorable Court, whether it is not an unheard of practice (until the present instance) in a criminal prosecution, to declare testimony inadmissible because it is not expected to go to the entire exculpation of the prisoner? Does it not daily occur in our courts, that a party accused, making out a part of his defence by one witness and establishing other facts by the evidence of other persons; does it not daily occur that the testimony of various witnesses sometimes to the same, and sometimes to different facts, does so relieve and support the whole case, as to leave no doubt of the innocence or guilt of the accused, in the minds of the jury, who, it must never be forgotten, are, in such cases, the sole judges both of the law and the fact? Suppose for instance that the testimony of two witnesses would establish all the facts, but that each of those facts are not known by either of them. According to this doctrine the evidence of both might be declared inadmissible, and a man whose innocence, if the testimony in his favor were not rejected, might be clearly proved to the satisfaction of the jury, may thus be subjected by the verdict of that very jury to an ignominious death. Shall principles so palpably cruel and unjust be tolerated in this free country? I am free to declare that the decision of Mr. Chase, in rejecting Colonel Taylor's testimony, was contrary to the known and established rules of evidence, and this I trust will be shown by my learned associates, to the full satisfaction of this honorable Court, if indeed they can require further satisfaction on a point so clear and indisputable. But this honorable Court will be astonished when they are told (and the declaration will be supported by undeniable proof) that at this very time neither the traverser, his counsel, or the court, knew the extent to which Colonel Taylor's evidence would go. They were apprized, indeed, that he would show that Mr. Adams was an aristocrat, and that he had proved serviceable to the British interest, in the sense conveyed by the book; but they little dreamt that his evidence, if permitted to have been given in, would have thrown great light upon many other of the charges. There is one ground of defence taken by the respondent, which I did suppose, a gentleman of his discernment would have sedulously avoided. That although the traverser had justified nineteen out of twenty of the charges contained in the indictment, if he could not prove the truth of the twentieth, it was of little moment, as he was, "thereby, put into the power of the court." Gracious God! sir, what inference is to be drawn from this horrible insinuation?

In justification of the charges contained in the fourth article, the respondent, unable to deny the fact, confesses that he did require "the questions intended to be put to the witness to be reduced to writing, and submitted to the court," in the first instance, as we shall prove, and before they had been verbally propounded. And this requisition, he contends, it was "the right and duty of the court" to make. It would not become me, elsewhere, or on any other occasion, to dispute the authority of the respondent, on legal questions, but I do aver that such is not the law, at least in the State in which that trial was held, nor do I believe that it is law anywhere. I speak of the United States. Sir, in the famous case of Logwood, whereat the Chief Justice of the United States presided, I was present, being one of the grand jury who found a true bill against him. It must be conceded that the Government was as deeply interested in arresting the career of this dangerous and atrocious criminal, who had aimed his blow against the property of every man in society, as it could be in bringing to punishment a weak and worthless scribbler. And yet, although much testimony was offered by the prisoner, which did by no means go to his entire exculpation, although much of that testimony was of a very questionable nature, none of it was declared inadmissible; it was suffered to go to the jury, who were left to judge of its weight and credibility; nor were any interrogatories to the witnesses required to be reduced to writing. And I will go farther, and say that it never has been done before or since Callender's trial, in any court of Virginia, and I believe I might add in the United States, whether State or Federal. No, sir, the enlightened man who presided in Logwood's case knew that, although the basest and vilest of criminals, he was entitled to justice, equally with the most honorable member of society. He did not avail himself of the previous and great discoveries, in criminal law, of this respondent; he admitted the prisoner's testimony to go to the jury; he never thought it his right or his duty to require questions to be reduced to writing; he gave the accused a fair trial, according to law and usage, without any innovation or departure from the established rules of criminal jurisprudence, in his country.

The respondent also acknowledges his refusal to postpone the trial of Callender, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on his behalf; and here again the ground of his defence is, in my estimation, good cause for his conviction. The dispersed situation of the witnesses, which he alleges to have been the motive of his refusal, is, to my mind, one of the most unanswerable reasons for granting a postponement. The other three charges contained in this article will be supported by unquestionable evidence. The rude and contemptuous expressions of the judge to the prisoner's counsel; his repeated and vexatious interruptions of them; his indecent solicitude and predetermined resolution to effect the conviction of the accused. This predetermination we shall prove to have been expressed by him long before, as well as on his journey to Richmond, and whilst the prosecution was pending; besides the proofs which the trial itself afforded.

The fifth article is for the respondent's having "awarded a capias against the body of James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offence not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in such case made and provided;" that is, contrary to the act of Assembly of Virginia, recognised (by the act of Congress passed in 1789, for the establishment of the judicial courts of the United States) as the rule of decision in the federal courts, to be held in that State, until other provision be made. The defence of the respondent embraces several points: That the act of Virginia was passed posterior to the act of Congress, viz: in 1792, and could not be intended by the latter to be a rule of decision. Fortunately, there is no necessity to question, which we might well do, the truth of his position. It may be necessary to inform some of the members of this honorable Court, that, about twelve or thirteen years ago, the laws of Virginia underwent a revision; all those relating to a particular subject being condensed into one, and the whole code thereby rendered less cumbrous and perplexed. Hence, many of our laws, to a casual and superficial observer, would appear to take their date so late as the year 1792, although their provisions were, long before, in force. The twenty-eighth section of this very act on which we rely, the Court will perceive to have been enacted in 1788, one year preceding the act of Congress. (Virginia laws, chap. 74, sec. 28, page 106, NORTH b. Pleasants' edition.) [Here Mr. Randolph read the act referred to.] "Upon presentment made by a grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons, or other proper process, against the person so presented, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court;" &c. But the respondent, aware, no doubt, of this fact, asserts that the act not being adduced, he was not bound to know of its existence, and that he ought not to be censured for the omissions of the traverser's counsel, whose duty it was to have cited it on behalf of their client; and this objection, with the preceding ones, which I have endeavored to answer, will equally apply to the sixth article. Sir, when the counsel for the traverser were told by the judge at the outset, when they referred to a provision of this very law, "that such may be your local State laws here in Virginia, but that to suppose them as applying to the courts of the United States, is a wild notion," would it not, indeed, have been a wild experiment in them to cite the same law with a view of influencing the opinion of a man, who had scornfully scouted the idea that he was to be governed by it?

Unwilling, however, to rest himself now on the ground which he then took, the respondent justifies himself by declaring that he complied, although ignorantly, with this law, by issuing that other proper process, of which it speaks, that is a capias. But that other process must be of the nature of a summons, notifying the party to appear at the next term; and will any man pretend to say, that a capias taking him into close custody and obliging him to appear, not at the next, but at the existing term, is such process as that law describes? Sir, not only the law, but the uniform practice under it, as we are prepared to show by evidence, declares the capias not to be the proper process. But it is said that this would be nothing more than notice to the party accused to abscond, and therefore ought not to be law. Sir, we are not talking about what ought to have been the law; that is no concern of ours; the question is, what was the law? But the impolicy of this mode of proceeding is far from being ascertained. It is a relief to the innocent who may be in a state of accusation. It saves the expense of imprisoning the guilty, and if they should prefer voluntary exile to standing a trial, is it so very clear that the State is thereby more injured than by holding them to punishment, after which they would remain in her bosom to perpetrate new offences? Remember, this proceeding is against petty offenders, not felons. It does not apply to capital cases; to felonies, then, capital, for which our law has since commuted the punishment of death, into that of imprisonment at hard labor.

For further defence against the sixth article, the respondent takes shelter under this position: That the provision of the law of the United States establishing the judicial courts relates only to rights acquired under State laws, which come into question on the trial, and not to forms of process before the trial, and can have no application to offences created by statute, which cannot, with propriety, be termed trials at "common law." We are prepared to show that the words "trials at common law," are used in that statute, not in their most restricted sense, but to contradistinguish a certain description of cases from those arising in equity, or under maritime or civil law.

I will pass over the seventh article of impeachment, as well because I am nearly exhausted, as being content to leave it on the ground where the respondent himself has placed it. It would be impossible for us to put it in a stronger light than has been thrown upon it by his own admission.

The eighth and last article remains to be considered—[article read.] I ask this honorable Court whether the prostitution of the bench of justice, to the purposes of an hustings, is to be tolerated? We have nothing to do with the politics of the man. Let him speak, and write, and publish, as he pleases. This is his right in common with his fellow-citizens. The press is free. If he must electioneer and abuse the Government under which he lives, I know no law to prevent or punish him, provided he seeks the wonted theatres for his exhibition. But shall a judge decalaim on these topics from his seat of office? Shall he not put off the political partisan when he ascends the tribune? or shall we have the pure stream of public justice polluted with the venom of party virulence? In short, does it follow that a judge carries all the rights of a private citizen with him upon the bench, and that he may there do every act which, as a freeman, he may do elsewhere, without being questioned for his conduct?

But, sir, we are told that this high Court is not a court of errors and appeals, but a Court of impeachment, and that however incorrectly the respondent may have conducted himself, proof must be adduced of criminal intent, of wilful error, to constitute guilt. The quo animo is to be inferred from the facts themselves; there is no other mode by which, in any case, it can be determined, and even the respondent admits that there are acts of a nature so flagrant that guilt must be inferred from them, if the party be of sound mind. But this concession is qualified by the monstrous pretension that an act to be impeachable must be indictable. Where? In the Federal courts? There, not even robbery and murder are indictable, except in a few places under our exclusive jurisdiction. It is not an indictable offence under the laws of the United States for a judge to go on the bench in a state of intoxication—it may not be in all the State courts; and it is indictable nowhere for him to omit to do his duty, to refuse to hold a court. But who can doubt that both are impeachable offences, and ought to subject the offender to removal from office? But in this long and disgusting catalogue of crimes and misdemeanors, (which he has in a great measure confessed,) the respondent tells you he had accomplices, and that what was guilt in him could not be innocence in them. I must beg the Court to consider the facts alleged against the respondent in all their accumulated atrocity; not to take them, each in an insulated point of view, but as a chain of evidence indissolubly linked together, and establishing the indisputable proof of his guilt. Call to mind his high standing and character, and his superior age and rank, and then ask yourselves whether he stands justified in a long course of oppression and injustice, because men of weak intellect and yet feebleness of temper—men of far inferior standing to the respondent, have tamely acquiesced in such acts of violence and outrage? He is charged with various acts of injustice, with a series of misconduct so connected in time, and place, and circumstance, as to leave no doubt, on my mind at least, of intentional ill. Can this be justified, because his several associates have at several times and occasions barely yielded a faint compliance, which perhaps they dared not withhold? Can they be considered as equally culpable with him whose accumulated crimes are to be divided amongst them, who had given at best but a negative sanction to them? But, sir, would the establishment of their guilt prove his innocence? At most, it would only prove that they too ought to be punished. Wherever we behold the respondent sitting in judgment, there do we behold violence and injustice. Before him the counsel are always contumacious. The most accomplished advocates of the different States, whose demeanor to his brethren is uniformly conciliating and temperate, are to him, and him only, obstinate, perverse, rude, and irritating. Contumacy has been found to exist only where he presided.

Mr. President, it appears to me that one great distinction remains yet to be taken. A distinction between a judge zealous to punish and repress crimes generally, and a judge anxious only to enforce a particular law, whereby he may recommend himself to power or to his party. It is this hideous feature of the respondent's judicial character, on which I would fix your attention. We do not charge him with a general zeal in the discharge of his high office, but with an indecent zeal, in particular cases, for laws of doubtful and suspicious aspect. It is only in cases of constructive treason and libel, that this zeal breaks out. Through the whole tenor of his judicial conduct runs the spirit of party. I could cite the name and authority of a judge of whom, if I might be permitted to speak, I would say, that he was no less a terror to evil-doers than a shield to the oppressed. In a commendable zeal for the faithful execution of the laws, he has never been surpassed, neither in tenderness to the liberty of the citizen, nor the liberty of the press, nor trial by jury. [Here Mr. R. read the following passage from Tucker's Blackstone, vol. 4, page 350.] "But it is not customary nor agreeable to the general course of proceedings (unless by consent of parties, or where the defendant is actually in jail) to try persons indicted of smaller misdemeanors at the same court in which they have pleaded not guilty, or traversed the indictment." [What follows is subjoined in a note.] And this is the practice in Virginia; but in the case of the United States against Callender, in the Federal court at Richmond, May, 1800, a different course was pursued, although the act of Congress (First Congress, 1 Sept., chap. 20, sec. 32) may be interpreted otherwise. This is the very act and section on which we rely.

I have endeavored, Mr. President, in a manner, I am sensible, very lame and inadequate, to discharge the duty incumbent on me; to enumerate the principal points upon which we shall rely, and to repel some of the prominent objections advanced by the respondent. Whilst we confidently expect on his conviction, it is from the strength of our cause, and not from any art or skill in conducting it. It requires so little support that (thank Heaven) it cannot be injured by any weakness of mine. We shall bring forward in proof, such a specimen of judicial tyranny, as, I trust in God, will never be again exhibited in our country.

The respondent hath closed his defence by an appeal to the great Searcher of Hearts for the purity of his motives. For his sake, I rejoice that, by the timely exercise of that mercy which, for wise purposes, has been reposed in the Executive, this appeal is not drowned by the blood of an innocent man crying aloud for vengeance; that the mute agony of widowed despair, and the wailing voice of the orphan, do not plead to Heaven for justice on the oppressor's head. But for that intervention, self-accusation before that dread tribunal would have been needless. On that awful day the blood of a poor, ignorant, friendless, unlettered German, murdered under the semblance and color of law, sent without pity to the scaffold, would have risen in judgment at the Throne of Grace, against the unhappy man arraigned at your bar. But the President of the United States by a well-timed act, at once of justice and mercy, (and mercy, like charity, covereth a multitude of sins,) wrested the victim from his grasp, and saved him from the countless horrors of remorse, by not suffering the pure ermine of justice to be dyed in the innocent blood of John Fries.

The Managers proceeded to the examination of witnesses in support of the prosecution.

Mr. Dallas, Mr. W. Ewing, and I were counsel for John Fries, at his request, and I believe by the assignment of the court, on his trial in the year 1799. It was conducted, I believe, in the usual manner, and we were certainly allowed all the privileges that were customary on such occasions. The trial was had before Judges Iredell and Peters. He was convicted, and a new trial was ordered, because one of the jurors had manifested a prejudice against the people in general concerned in the insurrection, and against Fries in particular. This trial took place partly in April and partly in May, 1799. At October session following, Mr. Dallas and I attended at Norristown, expecting the trial would again take place; but it did not. The proceedings on the first indictment were quashed by the District Attorney, and a new bill was found at April term, 1800, at which Judges Chase and Peters presided. Mr. Dallas and I appeared again as the counsel of Fries, at his request, and I believe we were assigned by the court, but of this I am not certain. On the morning of a certain day, which I do not now recollect, I entered the court room when the judges were on the bench, and, if I recollect rightly, the prisoner was in the bar; but if he was not then there, I feel very sure that he soon was. The list of petit jurors was called over, and many of them answered. Whether his trial had been appointed for that day, I do not recollect; nor can I say whether he was brought up in consequence of such appointment or not. I will now state, as accurately as is in my power, what took place on the occasion, premising that, although my memory is a remarkably accurate one for a short time, it is far from being so after a considerable lapse of time. I will not, therefore, undertake to state the precise words used in the altercation which took place; but I am very confident that I shall not vary from the substance. When I say that I am thus confident, I beg to be understood as not undertaking to distinguish positively in all respects between what took place on the first or on the second day.

Almost immediately after the jurors were called over, Judge Chase began to speak. At this time Mr. Dallas had not come into court. Judge Chase said, he understood, or had been informed, that on the former trial or trials, for it was impossible for me to know whether he alluded to the case of Fries only, or of him and others, there had been a great waste of time in making long speeches on topics which had nothing to do with the business, and in reading common law cases on treason, as well as on treason under the statute of Edward the Third, and also certain statutes of the United States, respecting the resisting of process, and other offences less than treason. He also said, that to prevent this in future, he or they, I do not precisely recollect which, had considered the law, had made up their minds, and had reduced their opinion to writing on the subject, and would not suffer these cases to be read again; and in order that the counsel (but whether for the prisoner, or the counsel on both sides, I cannot say) might govern themselves conformably, he had ordered three copies of that opinion to be made out, one to be delivered to the prisoner's counsel, one to the counsel in support of the prosecution, and the other, as soon as the case was fully opened, or gone through, I cannot say which, to be delivered by the clerk of the court to the jury. I rather think that the expression was, fully gone through.

Mr. Randolph. And this, sir, before the counsel had been heard?

Mr. Lewis. I have said Mr. Dallas had not yet come into court, and as to myself I had not at this time said a single word. I think it was at or about this time, that Judge Chase handed, or threw down to Mr. Caldwell, clerk of the court, one or more papers; but whether I saw them pass immediately from the hands of one to the other, I am not certain. Mr. Caldwell reached one of the papers towards me. If I took it in my hand, I did not read a single line of it. I remember well that speaking aloud, but whether addressing myself to the court or not, I am not positive, and either waying my hand, or throwing the paper from me, I used this expression: "I will never permit my hand to be tainted with a prejudged opinion in any case, much less in a capital one." If Judge Peters made use of a single expression on the first day, I either did not hear him or do not recollect it.

Judge Chase, when speaking of the authorities

at common law, and those under the statute of Edward III., and, I believe, of the acts of Congress, said he would not suffer them to be read again. I am sure he said he would not suffer the decisions at common law, or under the statute of Edward III., to be read. I am not altogether certain whether he did or did not say the same thing as to the statutes of the United States; but I am perfectly sure that he did say they had nothing to do with the question, and that he expressed himself in strong terms of disapprobation either at their having been read or permitted to be read on the former trial. I am not certain whether some parts of this as well as that which I am about to mention occurred on the first or the second day. Judge Chase said, I think on the first day, that they were judges of the law, and if they did not understand it they were unworthy of their seats, or unfit to sit there; and that if the prisoner's counsel had anything to say, to show that they had mistaken the law, or that they were wrong, the counsel must address themselves to the court for that purpose, and not to the jury. I made some observations in answer, which it is impossible for me in all respects particularly to recollect, as having passed at this time, since some parts of it may perhaps have taken place in other stages of the business. At this time, Mr. Dallas was not in court. I was struck with what appeared to me to be a great novelty in the proceedings, and as I was extremely anxious to be of service to Fries, I was desirous that Mr. Dallas might be present. I think I went out of the bar to get somebody to go for him, and while I was out of the bar, he entered the room. I briefly stated to him what had taken place, or some parts of it; but, I believe, not the whole. We came forward, and we made some remarks, which I am unable to repeat. I was early struck with the idea, that as the court had made up their minds, and decided the question of law, before the jury was sworn, or the witnesses or counsel heard, it was not likely we should alter that opinion by anything we might say, and that we should probably render Fries more service by withdrawing from his defence, than by engaging in it. We told him so, and earnestly recommended to him to pursue that course. He appeared greatly alarmed and extremely agitated, and much at a loss what determination to come to. We, however, told him that, if he insisted on it, we would proceed in his defence at every hazard, and contend for what we deemed our Constitutional rights as his counsel, until stopped by the court; or we used expressions to this effect. His state of alarm and apprehension scarcely left him the power to decide for himself. After some time he acquiesced in our advice; said he had nobody to depend on but us; that he was sure we would do our best for him, and he would leave us to do for him as we pleased. Being very anxious for him, we told him we would call upon him at the jail, and satisfy his mind as to the course which we wished him to pursue. He finally agreed to our proposal to withdraw; but as we were apprehensive that the court might assign him other counsel in our place, and that our views might be defeated by such an arrangement, we advised him against accepting any, and I understood that he afterwards did refuse to accept of any other counsel. I will not assign my reasons for giving this advice, as it might, perhaps, be improper, unless I am directed by the Court.

Mr. Martin asked what those reasons were?

The President desired the examination to proceed on the part of the House of Representatives, and said when that was closed, the witness might be examined by the counsel for Judge Chase.

Mr. Lewis. It being thus determined that we should withdraw, and that Fries should not accept any counsel that might be assigned him, I left the court, expecting to have little or nothing more to say, as we were no longer counsel for the prisoner. The next morning, soon after the court was opened, and, I believe, when the prisoner was in the bar, Judge Chase addressed Mr. Dallas and myself, and probably Mr. Rawle, and asked us if we were ready to proceed? I answered that I was not, or that we were not any longer counsel for the prisoner. He asked our reasons for this; and I began to answer by mentioning what had taken place the day before; on which he and Judge Peters certainly manifested a strong disposition that we should proceed in the prisoner's defence, and that they would remove every restriction which had been previously imposed. I was stopped in what I was about to say by Judge Chase telling us to go on in our own way, and address the jury on the law as well as the facts, as we thought proper; but, at the same time, he said it would be under the direction of the court; and at our own peril, or the risk of our characters, if we conducted ourselves with impropriety. This had rather a contrary effect on my mind than that of inducing me to proceed, as I did not know that there had been anything in my conduct so indecorous as to make it necessary to remind me that, if I proceeded, it should be at my own peril and risk of character; and this expression, therefore, rather strengthened than lessened the determination which I had taken.

I have said if Judge Peters made use of a single expression on the first day I did not hear it, or have forgotten it. On the second day he spoke, and joined Judge Chase in urging us to proceed in the prisoner's defence. He told us that we might take as large a scope as we pleased; said he knew the Philadelphia bar would take the stand, and asked, if they (the judges) had committed an error, or got into a scrape, would we not permit them to get out of it? I mentioned in this or some other stage of the business, that I deemed it the Constitutional right of the prisoner to be heard by himself or counsel in his defence. That it was the Constitutional right of the jury to hear counsel on the law as well as the facts; that it was their Constitutional right to pass between the prisoner and his country on both, and that it was the Constitutional right of counsel to be heard by the jury on the law as well as the facts. If I did not deliver myself in these precise words, I am confident that the substance is the same, and that there is no material difference in the sense. I also mentioned that I considered this a great Constitutional right, which should never be surrendered or sacrificed by me. Of this expression I am sure. And I added, that I never had, nor ever would, in a criminal prosecution address a court either on the law or the facts: In this, however, I find that I was mistaken; for I since recollect, though from the hurry of the moment, I did not then, an instance where, in a criminal case, I did address the jury on a point of law, which was separate and distinct from the facts. Judge Peters remarked that no harm could arise from the papers, (containing the opinion of the court,) as they, or the copies, had been called in or collected, and either burnt or destroyed. To this I answered, that although the papers were or might be destroyed, the opinion which the court had formed, without hearing the prisoner's counsel, still remained, and could not be erased from their minds, and would be as injurious to my client (the jurors being present and having heard what had passed) as if the papers had not been destroyed.

When Judge Chase said that we should read no common law authorities, or decisions under the statute of Edward III., before the Revolution in England, I said that we meant to contend what was the law of treason in England under the head of "levying war," was not in all respects law here; that we did not mean to cite any cases before the English Revolution to prove what the law of treason was, or for any other purpose than to show the dangerous lengths that the judges had gone while they were corrupt and dependent on the Crown; that although since the Revolution in England the judges had been independent and upright, they had, in a variety of particulars, held themselves bound by a train of former decisions which had taken place in bad times; but that the judges in this country in the construction of a new instrument of our own, defining the offence of treason, were not bound by any of the decisions or constructions which had taken place in England under the statute of Edward III.; and that the authorities we meant to cite were intended as a guard against the dangerous constructions which had prevailed in that country. It was not, therefore, to show what the law was, but to guard against the danger of constructive treason; and to show that our judges were not bound by the English decisions, that we had read them before, and intended to read them again. This principle we contended for before, and meant to contend for again; and we were principally led to it, from Mr. Sitgreaves, who had assisted the District Attorney on the former trial, having begun by stating "that the words of our Constitution respecting treason are taken from the 25th Edward III., and, therefore, the people of this country had, by adopting the words of that statute, adopted all judicial determinations under it." This position we could not agree to, and the cases which had been read were merely intended to show and guard against the dangerous lengths to which we should be carried, if it were admitted to be true. Judge Chase asked if the counsel offered to read cases from any foreign country, (mentioning several with whom we had never been connected,) was the court to permit them? We, in reply, said that we had not cited such cases on the former occasions, and it was not likely that we should attempt it now.

Finding that Mr. Dallas and I were determined not to proceed in the prisoner's defence, Judge Chase said, if we intended to embarrass the court we should find ourselves mistaken, as they would proceed without us, and, by the blessing of God, render the prisoner as much justice as if he had the aid of our counsel or assistance. Both the judges, therefore, on the second day, even took pains to induce us to proceed in the defence, with liberty to go through the whole question as well in relation to the law as the facts; but we absolutely refused, believing it not likely that any arguments we could urge would change the opinion of the court already formed, or destroy its effects, and also believing that, after what had taken place, the life of Fries, even if he should be convicted, would be exposed to less jeopardy without our aid than it would be if we should engage in his defence.

Mr. Nicholson. You say that, on the first trial of Fries, you were allowed the usual latitude. What do you mean by usual latitude?

Mr. Lewis. We were allowed to address the jury on the law as well as on the facts. We were allowed the privilege of reading to the jury all such law authorities as we thought applicable, and as might, under the direction of the court, tend to satisfy them, that the doctrine contended for on the part of the prosecution was not well founded. We met with no restraint or interruption, not having, that I know of, given occasion for either.

Mr. Nicholson. Were you, on the first trial, allowed to read the statutes of the United States?

Mr. Lewis. Unquestionably; I have the notes in my pocket from which I spoke on that occasion, which I can produce if desired.

Mr. Nicholson. Were you allowed to read cases before the Revolution as well as since?

Mr. Lewis. We were; we did it to show the extravagant lengths to which constructive treason had been carried, and not what the law actually was.

In answer to an interrogatory,

Mr. Lewis said that he did not read the opinion of the court which had been handed or thrown down; that he had never read it in his life.

Mr. Randolph. If not the oldest, are you not an old practitioner at the bar, and have you not been frequently employed in criminal cases?

Mr. Lewis. I was admitted to practice in the court of common pleas, in November, 1771, and in the Supreme Court, in April, 1774, and I have been employed in a pretty extensive practice almost ever since. Immediately after the British left Philadelphia, in 1778, I was engaged for one hundred and fifty-three persons charged with treason or misprision of treason. I defended almost every man of them that was tried; and, since that time, I have been concerned in perhaps more capital cases, particularly for treason, than any other gentleman in Pennsylvania, compared with our business in other respects.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever see such a proceeding as that which took place on the bench in the case of Fries; or did you see anything before, to induce you to abandon the defence of your client?

Mr. Lewis. This question seems to be a pretty general one, but if—

Mr. Key. If I understand this question, it is calculated to draw from the witness an opinion, instead of a narration of facts.

The President desired Mr. Randolph to reduce his question to writing.

While Mr. R. was engaged in penning it,

Mr. Chase said he had no objection to the question being put.

In the mean time the question in writing had been handed to the Chair, and been read by the Clerk.

The President said, the objection being withdrawn, the question would be put unless objected to by any member of the Senate.

No objection being made,

Mr. Lewis answered. No, I did not. It was entirely novel to me.

Mr. Randolph. And yet you have been present at criminal trials, at trials for treason, when there was a vast number of civil actions on the docket?

Mr. Lewis. Criminal trials for capital offences are generally tried before the court of oyer and terminer, in Pennsylvania, where there is seldom much interference in civil suits.

At the circuit court of the United States, in 1794, there were, I believe, many civil cases. Judges Iredell and Peters presided. I do not know, or believe, that the circumstance of their being civil cases occasioned the least variation in the mode of procedure in the criminal cases.

Mr. Lewis said he had one thing further to state, that Mr. Dallas and he withdrew from a desire to save the life of John Fries, and because they thought it most likely that it would be effected by doing so, and not because they were influenced by any other considerations, and that had it not been for this consideration, he would have persisted in the exercise of what he deemed his professional rights, until he was actually stopped by the authority of the court.

Mr. Harper. Did you not appear for Vigol?

Mr. Lewis. I did.

Mr. Harper. With what overt acts was he charged?

Mr. Lewis. The overt act was levying of war, particularizing the time and place.

Mr. Harper. I will ask you whether on the trial of John Fries, in 1799, in which Mr. Dallas and you appeared as his counsel, you did not make this point of law; that, to resist by force the execution of a particular law of the United States does not amount to treason, but to riot only? Or what was the point of law?

Mr. Lewis. On the first trial of Fries we made this point of law. Before the trial before Judges Chase and Peters came on, I had considered the subject with great deliberation, and my determination was to insist that, although resisting the laws generally, or even a particular law respecting the regular forces or militia of the nation was treason, yet that resisting any other particular law was not treason.

Mr. Harper. Was not the same point made on the first trial?

Mr. Lewis. It was.

Mr. Harper. Was it not ruled by the court that such acts amounted to treason?

Mr. Lewis. It was.

Mr. Harper. When then the court granted a new trial did they not express doubt on this point, or was it not granted on a collateral point?

Mr. Lewis. The new trial was granted solely on a collateral point.

Mr. Harper. How long did the trial last?

Mr. Lewis. I cannot tell; but it was a very long trial. The point of law was argued to the fullest extent, and we quoted all the authorities we thought relevant. I was assisted by Mr. Dallas. We spoke very fully, and were laid under no restriction. At the last trial we meant to have also taken other ground, and to have contended that the trial could not take place in Philadelphia, but must be in the county in which the offence had been committed, according to a law of the United States, which provides that in capital cases trials shall take place in the county where the crimes are committed, unless this cannot be without great inconvenience. This we had before contended; and had been then overruled because it was alleged the county in which the offences had been committed was not free from a state of insurrection or the effects of it. At the time of the last trial, there was no insurrection in the county where the offences charged against Fries had been committed, and we believed him, therefore, entitled to a trial in that county.

Mr. Harper. Did any part of Judge Chase's written opinion go to this point?

Mr. Lewis. It was not mentioned to the court, as Mr. Dallas and I determined to have nothing further to do in the case.

Mr. Harper. Why did you abandon that part of your client's case? It was a new point, upon which you might have had the decision of the court.

Mr. Lewis. I did not wish to have anything more to do with the case, after the manner in which we had been treated by the court.

Mr. Hopkinson. Did not the court ask Fries whether he would have counsel assigned him?

Mr. Lewis. I believe there is no doubt of the fact.

Mr. Randolph. I understand you to say that by withdrawing from the defence of Fries, and the not having counsel assigned him, you expected to serve your client. Wherefore did you think the cause of your client would thereby be served?

Mr. Lewis. It appeared to me that the conduct of the court justified us in withdrawing, after not being suffered to go on in the usual manner, and I thought it more probable that a man, thus convicted, would be pardoned by the President, than that we should be able, by anything we could say, to alter the opinion of the court.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Nicholson. Were the jurors present?

Mr. Lewis. They were. They were called over as usual, but I do not know that they were called for the trial of Fries. It was, I believe, usual to call over the list on the morning of each day.

Alexander J. Dallas, sworn.

Mr. Dallas. I will endeavor to be correct in the statement which it is my duty to give; and I am sure that I shall be substantially so, though I cannot promise to place the facts precisely in the order of time in which they occurred; nor to recite the very words that were used by the several parties in the course of the transaction.

When the northern rioters were brought to Philadelphia, in the spring of 1799, some of their friends applied to Mr. Ingersoll, and to me to undertake their defence. Mr. Ingersoll was then Attorney General of Pennsylvania; and on consideration, I believe, declined the task. Mr. Lewis, either before or after this application, was also requested to act as counsel for the prisoners; and upon his acquiescence, we repaired to the prison to make the necessary arrangements preparatory to a trial. Mr. William Ewing had been engaged by several of the rioters, and we agreed to unite in the defence, as the same general facts in law, applied to all the cases.

In April term, 1799, the first trial of Fries took place. It was conducted with great propriety throughout, by the court, and by the prosecuting officer; and the counsel of the prisoner were permitted to address the jury at large, on the law and the facts, as well as to cite every authority which they thought proper. Fries was convicted; but on a motion made by Mr. Lewis and me, the verdict was set aside, and a new trial awarded.

The second trial of Fries, upon a new indictment (the first having been discontinued by Mr. Rawle) occurred in May, 1800. Mr. Lewis and I had again, at his request, been assigned by the court to defend him. On the morning fixed for the trial, I entered the court room sometime after the court had been opened. Fries was standing in the prisoner's box, the jurors of the general panel appeared to be in the jury boxes, and the hall was crowded with citizens. On my entrance, I perceived Mr. Lewis and Mr. E. Tilghman engaged eagerly in conversation, and the gentlemen of the bar, generally, seemed to be much agitated. As soon as Mr. Lewis saw me, he hastened towards me on the outside of the bar, and told me, in effect, that a "very extraordinary incident had occurred; that Mr. Chase, after speaking in terms of great disapprobation of the defence at the former trial, declared that the court, on mature deliberation, had formed and reduced to writing, an opinion on the law of treason involved in the case; and that he should direct one copy to be delivered to the attorney of the district, another to the prisoner's counsel, and a third (after the opening for the prosecution) to the jury, to take out with them."

Here Mr. Harper rose, and said—Mr. President, surely it is improper that the witness should repeat what Mr. Lewis told him, not in court, nor when the judge was present.

Mr. Dallas, turning to Mr. Harper, said, "Sir, I know the rules of evidence, and I mean to conform to them." Then turning to the Vice President, he continued, "If, Mr. President, the counsel's patience had lasted for a minute, he would have heard that I repeated Mr. Lewis's communication to the court, and that it was not contradicted. What I have said was necessary to introduce that fact; and, surely, it is strictly within the rules of evidence."

Mr. Lewis and I exchanged an opinion on the impropriety of the conduct of the court; we determined (as I thought, when first recurring to my memory for the facts, and as I still think, though I wish not to speak positively) to withdraw from the defence; and we entered the bar together. When there, something occurred which called the attention on our part, and Mr. Lewis informed the court, in effect, "that there was little dispute about the facts in the cause, and that as the court had deliberately prejudged the law, he could not hope to change their opinion, nor to serve his client; while a submission to such a proceeding would be degrading to the profession." It was then, I think, that I stated to the court, the information which I had received from Mr. Lewis, (but certainly it was either then, or, as it has been suggested to me by a respectable gentleman of the bar, at the opening of the court on the next day,) and I paused, to give an opportunity for contradiction or explanation; for, although I had no doubt of Mr. Lewis's intention to deliver a correct representation of what had passed, it was possible, and I might myself have mistaken the import of his communication. I cannot now state all that Mr. Lewis told me, but I am confident that I then repeated it all to the court. No remark being made in consequence of the pause, I proceeded to state a few comparative observations on the province and rights of the judge, and the province and rights of the advocate; and concluded with declining to act any longer as counsel for the prisoner. The court was soon afterwards adjourned. These are all the material occurrences of the first day, which I recollect; except, perhaps, that soon after I came into court, I heard Mr. Peters remark to Mr. Chase, "I told you what would be the consequence. I knew they would take the stud."

On the next day, the court was opened, Fries was placed in the prisoner's box, the jury attended, and the number of spectators was increased. Silence being proclaimed, Mr. Chase asked, "if the prisoner's counsel were ready to proceed on the trial?" and Mr. Lewis and I, successively, declared, that we no longer considered ourselves as the counsel of Fries. Mr. Peters then, as well as at other times, expressed a great desire that we should overlook what had passed; he told us that the papers delivered the day before had been withdrawn, and that he did not care what range we took, either on the law, or the fact. Mr. Chase also said: "The papers are withdrawn, and you may take what course in the defence you please; but it is at the hazard of your characters." I thought the expression was in the nature of a menace; that it was unkind, improper, and unnecessary. Mr. Lewis observed, in effect: "You have withdrawn the papers; but can you eradicate from your own minds the opinion which you have formed, or the effect of your declaration on the attending jurors, a part of whom must try the prisoner?" Mr. Chase said: "If you think to embarrass the court, you will find yourselves mistaken." He then asked Fries if he chose to have other counsel assigned? Fries answered, that he did not know how to act, but that he thought he would leave it to the court and the jury. On which, Judge Chase exclaimed, "Then we will be your counsel; and, by the blessing of God, do you as much justice as those who were assigned to you." Mr. Lewis and I had visited Fries in prison during the preceding afternoon; we had told him our determination to withdraw from his defence, unless he and his friends wished us to resume it; and we declared it to be, in our view of the case, his best chance to escape, as we could entertain no hope of changing the opinion of the court. He finally left the matter to us; and I think Mr. Lewis in my hearing, with my concurrence, advised him not to accept other counsel, if the court should offer to assign them. The rest of the facts, as stated by Mr. Lewis, correspond so precisely with my recollection, that I presume, after this recognition, it is unnecessary to repeat them. I wish it, however, to be properly understood that, on the second day, both the judges were extremely anxious to prevail on us to proceed in the defence; and, as I understood, withdrew all the restrictions of the preceding day. We persisted, however, in our determination; because, after what had happened, we deemed it the best chance to save our client's life, and not because we wished, as has been insinuated, to bring the court into disgrace or odium. Fries, was accordingly tried and convicted without counsel.

It is proper, perhaps, to state what passed on the first trial of Fries, as it has been much misunderstood or misrepresented. The general course of argument, on the facts, was, an attempt to show that the acts of Fries and his companions amounted to nothing more than a riotous opposition to the direct tax officers, or obstruction of the marshal in the execution of process, and the rescue of a particular description of prisoners whom the marshal had arrested. We drew to our aid, in this part of the discussion, the sections of the penal law, and the sedition act, which provided for the punishment of such offences, distinct from the crime of treason. The general course of our argument, on the law, was, an endeavor to show that the offence did not amount to an act of levying war against the United States. The Constitution defines that to be the only treason that can be committed; and neither the Legislature, nor the courts, can amplify or alter the definition. The words of the Constitution, however, require a practical exposition. This exposition can only be obtained by a consideration of the natural, the familiar, and the reasonable import of the words themselves, or by reference to a glossary of the English decisions on the same branch of treason, expressed in the same terms, in the English statute of Edward III. The glossary of the English decisions ought not to be relied on. It is true, that since the English Revolution of 1688, and particularly since the statute of William III., (which first gave judicial freedom to the English bench,) the judges of England have been independent, as well as wise and virtuous; and implicit confidence may be reposed in their judgments, upon all matters originally submitted to their jurisdiction. But the English judges, since the Revolution of 1688, are bound to administer the law, according to the precedents established by the English judges before that Revolution; although either in criminal, or in civil matters, if the question were res integra, they would, themselves, have decided in a different way. Hence, the counsel of Fries were induced to cite common law authorities, and authorities under the statute of Edward III., to show (not what the law of England was, or ought to be, not what the law of the United States was, or ought to be, but) what had been the extravagance of dependent judges in setting the precedents which the independent judges of England were bound to follow. Among other books they read Blackstone's Commentaries, where, in illustration of a positive or imputed treason, the commentator cites the cases (under the statute of Edward III.) of one man being hung as a traitor, for saying that his son was heir to the Crown, because he was himself the owner of a tavern with the sign of the Crown; and of another man's meeting the same fate, because he wished the horn of his buck, which had been killed by the king, in the belly of the monarch. These were, indeed, the illustrations of Blackstone, and not of Fries's counsel; but what professional man need be ashamed to be supposed capable of resorting to the same authorities to enforce an argument, which Blackstone had employed? Fries's counsel contended that American judges were not under the same obligation, and that the era of our Federal Constitution furnished a favorable opportunity to emancipate ourselves from the trammels of constructions given to the words of our Constitution by corrupt and dependent courts, before the English Revolution. Resorting then, to the natural, familiar, and reasonable import of the words, it was urged in defence of Fries, on the first trial, that it was not a case of treason, but of riot, obstruction of process, and rescue of prisoners; that the discrimination in the offences was marked by the very distinct nature of the actions; and that the sedition act having treated the latter case as a case of misdemeanor, it was a Legislative construction that it was not a case of treason. There was still ground enough for the Constitutional provision to occupy, (an attempt by force to subvert the Government, to defeat the legitimate operation of its principal departments, to attack or to resist its military power, &c.,) and, after the passing of the sedition act, it might be presumed such ground alone was intended to be occupied.

On this course of argument, we could not ascertain the opinion of the court, nor how far the case of the Western insurrection would be deemed to apply, till the charge was pronounced. But, after hearing the charge, and after a new trial was granted, I confess the whole force of my mind was bent to show, on the new trial, the strong distinction between the cases of 1794 and those of 1799; and that even in England, there was no authority since the Revolution of 1688, for construing the offence of Fries to be treason, unconnected with the obligation of the judges to conform to the previous adjudications.

The President. Both you and Mr. Lewis have stated that the jury were present when the written opinions of the court were handed to the clerk: Could they hear what passed on the occasion?

Mr. Dallas. Undoubtedly, sir. I do not mean, however, the jury who tried Fries, but the general panel of jurors, from whom Fries's jury might have been taken.

The Court rose about four o'clock.

MONDAY, February 11.

The Court was opened at 12 o'clock.

Present: the Managers, attended by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel.

Mr. Randolph observed, that it was the wish of the managers that there should be no departure from the ordinary rules observed in examining witnesses, and that immediately after their examination on the part of the prosecution, they might be cross examined by the counsel for the accused.

Mr. Harper hoped, that no absolute rule would be adopted to this effect, as circumstances might arise that would justify a departure from it. The counsel for the respondent would without any special rule endeavor to conform to the mode suggested. After a few further remarks from Mr. Martin and Mr. Nicholson, it was agreed to waive any specific motion.

Mr. Lewis was called in; when

Mr. Harper put to him the following question: Did you at the first trial of Fries make a distinction between resistance to a particular law, and the general law of the United States, or some special laws of a particular nature, and state your intention to argue that point on the second trial.

Mr. Lewis. I was not able to answer the question the other day precisely. But having since looked at my notes, I find that that distinction was made and urged.

I was present at the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Pennsylvania, held on the 22d day of April, 1800. A very short time after the opening of the court (whether the general panel of jurors had been called over or not, I do not recollect) Judge Chase declared that the court had maturely considered the law arising on the overt acts charged in the indictment against John Fries; and that they had reduced their opinion to writing; he mentioned that he understood that a great deal of time had been consumed on a former trial, and that in order to save time, a copy of the opinion of the court would be given to the attorney of the district; another to the counsel for the prisoner, and that the jury should have a third to take out with them. I took no notes of what passed either on the first or second day. Fries was tried on the third day, and having been appointed, with Mr. Levy, counsel for Heany and Getman, indicted for treason, and who were actually tried on the 27th or 28th, I deemed it my duty to attend the trial of Fries, to take notes of the evidence, the arguments, and the charge of the judge. I do not recollect that Judge Chase said any more on the first day than what I have mentioned previous to his throwing a paper or papers on the table round which the bar usually sit. The moment the paper or papers were thrown on the table, Judge Chase expressed himself in these words; "Nevertheless, or notwithstanding this, (I cannot recollect which expression he used) "counsel will be heard." The throwing of the papers on the table and the address of the judge caused some degree of agitation at the bar; in a short time after the judge used the last expression, I looked round and saw Mr. Lewis walking from under the gallery, towards the bar: I stepped towards Mr. Lewis, and met him directly opposite the entrance into the prisoner's bar. The prisoner, as well as I can recollect, not being then in court, but being brought into court some time that morning, I entered into conversation with Mr. Lewis, and as well as I can recollect, during that conversation, Mr. Dallas came into court. Mr. Dallas and Mr. Lewis had some conversation in my hearing, after which they came forward to the bar; the paper, as well as I can recollect, was then handed by Mr. Caldwell, the clerk of the court, to Mr. Lewis. Mr. Lewis cast his eye on the outside of the paper, and looked down, as if he was considering what to say. He threw the paper from him, as it appeared to me, without reading it, and the moment he threw the paper down, said, "my hand shall never be stained by receiving a paper containing a prejudged opinion, or an opinion made up without hearing counsel." I cannot recollect which was the expression, but this was the substance. I have not the least recollection that anything passed on the third day, between the counsel for the prisoner and the court; for when Mr. Lewis used these expressions, his face was not turned to the court, and he spoke with considerable degree of warmth; the court sat in the south part of the room, and Mr. Lewis (I think) turned his face full to the westward, when he used these expressions. The paper lay on the table a considerable time; after which some gentlemen of the bar took it up, and I for one copied it. Whether I took the whole of it, and all the authorities cited, I cannot say. The prisoner having been brought into court, his counsel had a good deal of conversation in my hearing, on the subject of supporting or abandoning his defence; that conversation appears to me to have been accurately stated by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas. I do not recollect why the prisoner was not put on his trial that day, but the court adjourned between 12 and 1 o'clock. I went home, and after taking a walk, on returning, I saw the district attorney on my steps. He asked me whether I would have any objection to delivering up the copy which I had taken of the opinion of the court. I said I had no objection, and gave it to him. That paper was not read on the first, or on any other day by the court, or anything stated by the court, as the substance of it. On the next morning, to wit: the 23d, the prisoner was brought into court. The court asked the prisoner's counsel, if they were ready to proceed to the trial. Mr. Lewis rose and uttered a few words, in order to show that they did not mean to proceed with it. Judge Chase here interrupted Mr. Lewis—the particular expressions of the judge I do not recollect; the substance of them was, that the counsel were not to consider themselves bound by the opinion which the court had reduced to writing the day before; that the counsel were at liberty on both sides to combat that opinion. Judge Chase as well as Judge Peters appeared to be very anxious that the counsel should undertake the defence of the prisoner. Judge Chase said, the cases at common law before the statute of Edward the Third, ought not to be read to the court: he mentioned the case of a man whose stag the king had killed, and who said he wished the stag's horns were in the king's belly; he also mentioned the man who kept a public house, with the sign of a crown, and said he would make his son heir to the Crown. He said such cases as these must not, shall not be cited; and I think he made use of these expressions: "What! cases from Rome, Turkey and France!" That the counsel should go into the law, but must not cite cases that were not law.

He said that he had an opinion in point of law as to every case that could be brought before the court, or else he was not fit to sit there. He said something (but the precise words I do not pretend to recollect) as to the counsel proceeding according to their consciences; he said that the gentlemen would proceed at the hazard of their character, and when it appeared pretty plain, that the gentlemen would not proceed in defence of the prisoner, he said, you may think to put the court to difficulties; but if you do, you miss your aim, or words in substance to that effect. Judge Peters addressed the counsel, and said if an error has been committed, why may it not be redressed? the paper has been withdrawn—and I think both the judges concurred in expressing the sentiment that matters were to be considered as if the paper had never been thrown on the table. When Judge Peters mentioned that the paper had been withdrawn, Mr. Lewis answered, the paper, it is true, is withdrawn, but how can the court erase from their minds an opinion formed without hearing counsel. A good deal more passed which I do not recollect, having taken no notes. Mr. Dallas addressed the court, but I have no recollection of what he said. The counsel continued firm in their determination to abandon the prisoner: the court took great pains to induce them to act as counsel for the prisoner, and before Fries was remanded to jail, expressed their hope that the counsel would think better of it, and appear in his defence. I recollect nothing more of what happened on the second day. Should any questions be put to me, they may awaken a recollection of what does not now occur to me.

On the third day when the prisoner was brought to the bar, he was asked if he had any counsel, (I think on the second day, the court had mentioned to him that he might have other counsel,) he said no, he would depend on the court to be his counsel. Judge Chase said, the court will be your counsel, and by the blessing of God, will serve you as effectually as your counsel could have done. The trial proceeded, and after the testimony was given and a short statement of the case made by the district attorney, the judge charged the jury; he told them they were judges of the law as well as the fact. He stated to them that cases determined in England, before their Revolution, should not be received by the court. I have my notes of the charge; he stated the law very much in the manner as it was stated by Judge Paterson in the trial of Mitchell for whom I was counsel. I cannot undertake to recollect anything further than I have already stated.

Mr. Randolph. I understood you to have stated that the written paper thrown or handed down by Judge Chase on the table produced a considerable degree of agitation at the bar.—From what do you conceive that agitation arose?

Mr. Harper said he would take the opinion of the court, at some stage of the business, as to what was proper testimony. On Saturday there had been an opinion and argument interwoven in the testimony given. He paid great deference to the opinion of the witness, but he submitted it to the decision of the court whether it was proper to require it.

The President. The gentleman may vary the question, so as to attain his object, by inquiring as to the facts that took place.

Mr. Randolph then said, I ask, with the permission of the court, whether in the course of your practice, which I understand to have been long and extensive, you have ever witnessed a similar proceeding.

Mr. Key. I shall object to that question. I pray the opinion of the court, whether, in order to abridge time—

The President desired that the question might be in the first instance reduced to writing.

It was accordingly reduced to writing as follows:

Question 1st. You say that when the written opinion of the court was thrown on the table, it produced considerable agitation among the gentlemen of the bar. What did you conceive to be the cause of that agitation?—Which being read by the Secretary,

Mr. Bayard moved that the Senate should withdraw.—The motion was lost on a division.

The question was then taken on receiving the proposed question, and passed in the negative by an unanimous vote.

Mr. Randolph then submitted in writing,

Question 2d. In the course of your practice, which is understood to have been long and extensive, did you ever witness a similar proceeding on the part of the court?

Trial of Judge Chase.

To the putting of this question, Mr. Martin withdrew the objection, which had previously been made.

Mr. Tilghman answered: I have been in the practice of the law for thirty-one years, and have no recollection of a similar proceeding.

Mr. Randolph. When Mr. Chase, after throwing or handing down the papers, went on to say that counsel would be heard, did he go on to say, or not, that counsel, when heard, must address themselves to the court and not to the jury?

Mr. Tilghman. I am confident that at that time he said nothing of the sort, nor do I recollect that he said any such thing at any other time. If he did it escaped my recollection, which is very strong, as to what was said by the judge when he threw down the paper or papers.

Mr. Harper. You have said that you are perfectly clear, that when the paper was delivered or thrown down, the court did not say the counsel must address themselves to the court and not to the jury, and I understand you also to say that you have no recollection that they said any such thing at any other time.

Mr. Tilghman. I have no recollection that they did.

Mr. Harper. Have you any recollection that the court, at that time prevented the counsel from proceeding?

Mr. Tilghman. I have not.

Mr. Harper. Did the court forbid them during the proceedings, or on the trial, to cite cases?

Mr. Tilghman. There were no counsel at the trial.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase at any time say that they would prohibit their reading the acts of Congress to the jury?

Mr. Tilghman. I do not recollect that he did.

Mr. Harper. Was anything said about the sedition law, and the act—

Mr. Tilghman. I do not recollect that there was.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase express any disapprobation of the conduct of the circuit court on a former trial in suffering those acts to be read?

Mr. Tilghman. I do not recollect that he did.

Mr. Hopkinson. I think you have stated that you attended the trial of John Fries throughout?

Mr. Tilghman. I did.

Mr. Hopkinson. Did you see any disposition, or act, or conduct of the court, calculated to oppress the prisoner?

Mr. Nicholson objected to this question being put, and Mr. Hopkinson said, that to avoid all difficulty, he would waive it.

Mr. Martin. Has it been the usual practice in the courts of Pennsylvania for the judges to declare to the jury what is the law in criminal cases?

Mr. Tilghman. They always in their charge to the jury state the law and the evidence, and apply the law to the evidence.

To an interrogatory offered by Mr. Martin,

Mr. Tilghman answered. The court generally hear the counsel at large on the law, and they are permitted to address the jury on the law and the fact; after which the counsel for the State concludes; the court then states the evidence to the jury, and their opinion of the law, but leaves the decision of both law and fact to the jury.

To another interrogatory of Mr. Martin, as to the practice of the courts, Mr. Tilghman replied, that counsel generally take that course which they consider best calculated to benefit their clients. In capital cases, he did not recollect the court stopping gentlemen of character in any course they thought fit to adopt.

Mr. Nicholson. In your practice in Pennsylvania, or Delaware, where I understand you have practised, did you ever hear the court undertake to inform the jury of their opinion of the law before the prisoner's counsel had been heard?

Mr. Tilghman. I do not recollect I ever did.

In answer to a question,

Mr. Tilghman said, in the charge to the jury, the contents of the paper containing the opinion of the court, and which had been withdrawn, were never alluded to; nor in the least alluded to when it was thrown down or delivered.

Mr. Nicholson. You have stated that the opinion was not read to the jury. I ask whether when this paper was laid on the table the jury was sworn?

Mr. Tilghman. No. They were not sworn till the next day but one.

Mr. Nicholson. Were the general panel then in court?

Mr. Tilghman. According to my recollection the general panel attended with great punctuality. I this morning looked over my notes and I took down those that were challenged by Fries, and those that tried him, in order to assist me in making my challenge in the case of Heany and Getman. But I do not know that I then saw the face of any of them. It is proper to state that the common jury as soon as the court is opened generally walk forward into the jury box, which holds only eleven, a chair being placed for the twelfth—the other jurors take their seats behind those, in another box, or remain in the hall of the court.

Mr. Nicholson. The judge declared that the counsel for the prisoner might proceed at the hazard of their characters?

Mr. Tilghman. I think those were the words he used.

Mr. Nicholson. Were the general panel, at this time, in a situation to hear what was said?

Mr. Tilghman. Certainly, sir, this was on the second day.

Mr. Randolph. Before the written opinion was handed down, did not Mr. Chase or the court declare that the question of law had been settled in the case of Vigol and Mitchell?

Mr. Tilghman. On the trial of Fries they did cite this case and rely upon it. If the court will indulge me I can turn to my notes. Judge Chase stated the opinion of the court in his charge to the jury to be the same as in the case of Vigol and Mitchell.

Mr. Randolph. Did he say that the opinion in the case of Vigol and Mitchell was the opinion contained in that paper?

Mr. Tilghman. I do not remember. Many things might have happened, of which I have no recollection, as I did not take notes at the time.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Campbell. How many of those papers were thrown down or given to the clerk?

Mr. Tilghman. I cannot say with perfect certainty. But I stated before, that one was handed to the attorney of the district, another to the counsel for the prisoner, and the third to the jury, to take out with them.

Mr. Campbell. Was there sufficient time before the papers were withdrawn, for the jurors or other persons to have read them?

Mr. Tilghman. I stated before that the court rose between twelve and one o'clock. The jury were not in a situation to have access to the bar table. After the paper lay for some time, several of the bar employed themselves in copying it. I have no recollection that any one of the papers were handed into the jury box.

President. At what hour were they withdrawn?

Mr. Tilghman. I think on the same day, between one and two o'clock, that the district attorney called on me. I am pretty certain that the papers thrown down were not taken away, but remained in the hands of the court.

Mr. Campbell. Can you say how many copies were taken?

Mr. Tilghman. Not precisely. I took one, and Mr. Thomas Ross another. I believe we copied them at the same time. But I do not know of my own knowledge that any person transcribed them. Now I recollect, I think I saw one or two others also taking copies.

Mr. Campbell. Do you know whether all those taken were withdrawn?

Mr. Tilghman. I do not. I only know that mine was withdrawn.

Mr. Nicholson. Did you hear the subject spoken of generally that day?

Mr. Tilghman. Those who copied the paper spoke on the subject to each other.

Mr. Nicholson. I ask whether it was a subject of general conversation?

Mr. Tilghman. Very much so, among the gentlemen of the bar.

Mr. Nicholson. You have said that it is a usual thing in the courts of Pennsylvania for the judge to charge the jury after the counsel on both sides have spoken. Do you recollect to have seen a court reduce their charge to writing, and give it to the jury?

Mr. Tilghman. Never.

William S. Biddle, sworn.

Mr. Randolph. Were you present at the trial of John Fries?

Answer. I was.

Mr. Randolph. Were you present when the written opinion of the court was handed down?

A. From the length of time which has passed I have not a very distinct recollection of the circumstances that occurred.

Mr. Randolph. Did you take a copy of that opinion, and was that copy the whole or a part of it?

A. I did take a copy in part; I took the substance in regard to the point of treason, but I believe I did not copy the whole.

Mr. Randolph. Were there other copies taken?

A. I know of one taken by Mr. Rawle.

Mr. Randolph. Was any application ever made to you to deliver up the copy in order to destroy it?

A. Never.

Mr. Randolph. Did you communicate to any person the substance of the copy?

A. Never, until during the last session of Congress, in conversation with Mr. Dallas, I mentioned my being possessed of it, and he expressing a desire to see it, I stepped over to my office and brought it.

Mr. Randolph. Although you did not take a copy of it verbatim, did you take the substance of it?

A. I did.

Mr. Randolph. Would you know that copy?

A. I subscribed my name to it.

Mr. Randolph. Is that the paper? (showing him a paper.)

A. Yes, it is.

Mr. Randolph. Did you hear much conversation about the paper at that time?

A. I have no distinct recollection; I attended the trial of Fries and others for treason, but I do not recollect any conversation about it.

Mr. Randolph. Can you tell whether the contents became known to any of the jurors?

A. I cannot.

Mr. Harper. I observe the paper contains notes and references to authorities; were they taken from the paper handed down by the court, or were they made by yourself?

A. I cannot say as to those at the bottom; those at the end were all my own.

Mr. Martin. Do you know whether the judges or the district attorney knew you had a copy?

A. I do not.

The circuit court of the United States sat in Philadelphia in April, 1800. As the former proceedings in relation to the prisoners indicted for treason were considered at an end, except from the intervention of an act of Congress, it appeared to me most regular to quash all the previous proceedings. I made a motion to this effect, which was granted. On the same day the court charged the grand jury, and I sent to them bills against John Fries, and other persons charged with treason and other offences. The bill against John Fries was returned on the 16th a true bill, and he was immediately brought up, arraigned and pleaded not guilty. Messrs. Lewis and Dallas appeared as counsel for Fries. Copies of the indictment, and lists of the jurors and witnesses were furnished to Fries as directed by law. The bringing on the trial was postponed on account of the absence of George Mitchell, whom I deemed to be a material witness. According to my best recollection it was not intended that John Fries should be tried on the 22d, the first day alluded to. I cannot say that John Fries was then at the bar. That circumstance does not appear on the minutes of the clerk of the court. It was certainly not my intention that he should have been brought up, but he may possibly have been brought through mistake. Shortly after the court met, Judge Chase observed, that as much time had been lost on the former trial or trials, the court had determined to express their opinion in writing, on the point of law, that they might not be misunderstood; that they had therefore committed that opinion to writing, and that the clerk had made copies of it, one of which should be given to the district attorney, one to the counsel for the prisoner; and one the jury should take out with them: as these words were pronounced, several papers, I think three, were handed down or thrown down, as it were; my back was to the court, and whether this was done by Judge Chase or the clerk, I know not. I immediately took up the one intended for me and began to read it, but casting my eyes to the opposite side of the table, I saw Mr. Lewis with another copy before him, looking as it, apparently with great indignation, and then throwing it on the table. I am pretty clear nothing passed between the court and the counsel in the course of that morning. I observed much agitation among the gentlemen of the bar, who were conversing with each other with apparent warmth; but having at that time a very great burden of criminal prosecutions on me, my attention was much engaged, and I did not hear distinctly what was said, nor did I know, until the court rose, that there was a probability of the counsel for John Fries declining to act. I think that twenty-one persons were that day brought before the court charged with seditious combinations, and who submitted to the court. The court rose pretty early in the morning, and intimated that I should not call any witnesses in relation to the submissions until the trials for treason were over. When the court rose I learnt from several gentlemen, that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas were disgusted with the conduct of the court, and meant to decline acting as counsel for Fries, and I have an indistinct recollection that I heard something of this kind drop from Mr. Dallas himself. I went home, and had been there but a few minutes, when Judge Chase and Judge Peters came in. We went into another room, and Judge Peters began by expressing a good deal of uneasiness, from an apprehension that the gentlemen assigned as counsel for John Fries would not go on. Judge Chase said he could not suppose that that would be the consequence. I supported the idea which Judge Peters had expressed; I told him the gentlemen of the Philadelphia bar were men of much independence and character, and that unless those papers were withdrawn, and the business conducted as usual at our bar, they probably would desist from conducting the defence. My recollection at this distance of time cannot be very distinct, but I am pretty well satisfied that Judge Chase expressed his regret that the conduct of the court should be so taken, and said, that he did not mean that anything which he had done should preclude the counsel from making a defence in the usual manner. Judge Peters asked if I would consent to go out, and undertake to recover the papers; I said I had no objection, and both the judges concurred in requesting me to do so. I recollected seeing Mr. Edward Tilghman and Mr. Thomas Ross engaged in making copies. I did not recollect to have seen any others so engaged. I went to their houses and asked for the copies, which were readily given, and took them to Mr. Caldwell, clerk of the court. I asked him if he had noticed any others to have been taken? He said, he thought a copy had been taken by Mr. William Meredith. I desired him to go to him and endeavor to recall it. I did not know that Mr. Biddle, who was then a student in my office, had taken a copy in part, or I should have desired him to give it up. From some circumstances which I do not recollect, I find that I did not hand my own copy to Mr. Caldwell. I now have it in my possession. The paper was not read, I think, by any but those who transcribed it, and I entertained an anxious hope, after what had taken place, that the gentlemen would proceed with the defence of the prisoner. I shall now take the liberty of referring to some original notes made by me at the time—from which I can state what passed the following morning. So far as they go I believe them accurate, though they may not enable me to relate all that was said. On the 23d April, John Fries was brought and put to the bar, Messrs. Lewis and Dallas attending. The court asked if we were ready to proceed. Mr. Lewis rose and said—If employed by the prisoner, I should think myself bound to proceed, but being assigned—he was here interrupted by Judge Chase, who said, “you are not bound by the opinion delivered yesterday you may contest it on both sides.” Mr. Lewis answered—I understood that the court had made up their minds, and as the prisoner’s counsel have a right to make a full defence, and address the jury both on the law and the fact, it would place me in too degrading a situation, and therefore I will not proceed. Judge Chase answered with apparent impatience—“You are at liberty to proceed as you think proper, and address the jury and lay down the law as you think proper.” Mr. Lewis answered, with considerable emphasis, I will never address the court in a criminal case on a question of law. He then took a pretty extensive view on the propriety of going into cases decided before the Revolution, and said, if he was precluded from showing that the judges since the Revolution in England had considered themselves bound by the decisions before the Revolution, which ought not to be the doctrine in this country, he must decline acting as counsel for the prisoner. Judge Chase answered, sir, you must do as you please. Mr. Dallas then addressed the court. He contended that the rights of advocates had been encroached upon by the proceedings of the day before. He went into a general view of the ground taken by Mr. Lewis, and concluded with his determination not to proceed as counsel for John Fries.

Judge Chase then observed, no opinion has been given as to facts in this case. I would not let the witnesses be examined in the combination cases, because I would not let the jury hear them before the trial of Fries came on. As to the law, I knew that the trial before had taken nine days; that many common law cases were cited, such as wishing a stag's horns in the King's belly, and that of a man's saying he would make his son heir to the Crown; such cases ought not, shall not go to the jury. No case can come before me on which I have not a decided opinion as to the law, otherwise I should not be fit to preside here. I have always conducted myself with candor, and I meant, gentlemen, to save you trouble. It is not respectful, nor is it the duty of counsel, to say they have a right to offer anything they please. What! decisions in Rome, France, Turkey? No lawyer will say that common law cases are law under the statute of Edward the Third, nor justify those judges who overrode the statute of William, and overrule the necessity of having two witnesses to one overt act, and to admit hearsay testimony to prove matters of fact. It is the duty of counsel to lay down the law, but not to read cases that are not law. Having thus explained the meaning of the court, you will stand acquitted or condemned to your own consciences, as you think proper to act. But, gentlemen, do as you please. The course will be, the District Attorney will open the law, state his case, and produce his witnesses. You are at liberty to controvert the law as to the matter, but the manner must be regulated by the court. Judge Peters said you are to consider every everything done yesterday as withdrawn. Mr. Lewis replied, true, sir, the papers are withdrawn, but the sentiments still remain, I shall not therefore act.

Mr. Dallas expressed the same determination, which I did not take down.

A pause for a few moments took place, when Judge Chase said, you cannot put the court into a difficulty by this conduct, gentlemen; you do not know me if you think so; and desiring the persons between him and the prisoner to stand aside, and addressing himself to John Fries, he asked, are you desirous of having other counsel assigned you, or will you go on to trial without? John Fries, after a pause, said he did not know what to do; he would leave it to the court. Under these circumstances I felt a repugnance to go on with the trial, not wishing to act in a case so extremely singular. I therefore moved to postpone the trial to the next day; the court readily concurred, and Fries was remanded to jail.

On the 24th, Fries was brought to the bar again. Judge Chase asked him if he had any counsel. He told the court that he relied on them as his counsel, and he expressed himself with a degree of firmness and composure that convinced me that his decision was formed on mature reflection. Then, Judge Chase answered, by the blessing of God we will be your counsel, and do you as much justice as those assigned you.

The jury were then called over, and the court took pains to inform Fries of his right to challenge thirty-five without cause, and as many others as he could show cause against. In every instance they appeared extremely anxious that he should defend himself. There were one or two friends near him, I believe, to assist him in his challenges. After the jurors had been severally passed by him, and before they were sworn, the court directed that they should severally be asked whether they had delivered an opinion on the subject. The first juror said he had not, and was sworn; the second said he had; he was then sworn to make true answers; and he declared that he had in a conversation said that these men ought to be punished; the court directed this person to be set aside, and he was not sworn on the trial.

The court afterwards directed the question to be somewhat altered: "Have you formed or delivered an opinion," &c. &c.? Before this question was put to more than three persons, it was again altered, and put in these words: "Have you formed and delivered an opinion?" Three, including the one already mentioned, answered affirmatively, and were set aside. The prisoner challenged, without cause, thirty-four of the panel. Twelve jurors were then sworn, and I opened the case in a very brief manner, laid down the law, and adduced the testimony. The trial lasted till the afternoon, and till the next day; the court retired twice for refreshment and repose. John Fries called no witnesses. But at the end of the examination of each witness called on the part of the prosecution, Judge Chase reminded him that he had a right to put any question to the witness that he thought proper, and told him to be cautious not to put any question the answer to which might injure him. When the evidence on the part of the prosecution had closed, John Fries expressed his determination to call none on his part. I then addressed the jury in as brief a manner as I could, consistent with the duty I had to perform, for I severely felt the unpleasantness of the situation in which I stood, acting against a man tried on a capital charge without professional assistance. The court then charged the jury, who retired, and in about half an hour returned with a verdict of guilty. These are all the general facts I recollect in relation to the trial.

Mr. Randolph. Did you on the first day, the 22d of April, hear Mr. Lewis express in court any sentiments in regard to the paper which you say he viewed with such indignation?

Mr. Rawle. I have no recollection of hearing Mr. Lewis say one word on that day.

Mr. Randolph. You stated that on the next day Mr. Lewis, when told by the court to proceed as he thought proper, answered that he never would address the court in a criminal case on a point of law, and urged the propriety of citing cases before the Revolution, to show that the English judges since the Revolution thought themselves bound by cases before the Revolution, which ought not to be the law in this country, and that if he was not permitted to do this, he would be obliged to abandon the defence?

Mr. Rawle. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. Did you hear any opinion given by the court which warranted Mr. Lewis in the opinion that he was precluded from citing such cases?

Mr. Rawle. On the 23d, I did understand the court to say that such cases should not be cited, because they tended to mislead the jury. But at no time did I hear the court say that counsel were precluded from addressing the jury on the law, but it was said that as to the authorities cited, it must be determined by the court whether they were admissible or not.

Mr. Randolph. You stated that both the judges after the adjournment came to your house. Was your house their place of abode?

Mr. Rawle. No, sir.

Mr. Randolph. At what hour did they call?

Mr. Rawle. About ten o'clock.

Mr. Randolph. And that Judge Peters expressed an apprehension that Messrs. Lewis and Dallas would not go on?

Mr. Rawle. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. On what grounds did he express this apprehension?

Mr. Rawle. I do not know.

Mr. Randolph. Have you any recollection of any grounds for such an apprehension, except that which arose from the general character of the bar?

Mr. Rawle. I have already stated that I understood there was a measure of that kind in contemplation. I have a faint recollection of having heard something of that kind fall from Mr. Dallas.

Mr. Randolph. Did you express to the judges that your opinion was drawn from any other source than your general knowledge of the bar?

Mr. Rawle. I do not recollect that I did.

Mr. Randolph. Mr. Chase expressed his regret, and said he did not mean to preclude the counsel from proceeding in the trial in the usual manner. Was the course pursued in the case of Fries in the usual manner?

Mr. Rawle. I never saw a similar circumstance take place at our bar during the whole course of my life.

Mr. Randolph. Is it usual for the court to give a general opinion on the law before counsel are heard?

Mr. Rawle. Never, except on their general charge to the grand jury. They sometimes inquire of the gentlemen who prosecute, what are the offences likely to be presented, in order to inform the grand jury what it is their duty to do, and to make their charge more pointed.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever hear of its being done in a particular case before the court?

Mr. Rawle. Not that I recollect.

Mr. Randolph. Do you know whether much conversation took place at the bar on this novel opinion thrown down on the table?

Mr. Rawle. I stated before that I had a great burden of criminal cases to manage; as I was situated it was not in my power to keep up the usual colloquial intercourse, and I cannot recollect any conversation until that which I have mentioned.

Mr. Randolph. Do you suppose that the act of delivering the opinion in writing was so public as to attract the notice of the jurymen that were attending?

Mr. Rawle. From the number of the jurymen, and from the construction of the court-room, I think that a considerable proportion must have paid attention to the transaction.

Mr. Randolph. If you heard Mr. Lewis use no language on the opinion of the court, whence do you infer his indignation?

Mr. Rawle. From his countenance, and the manner of his throwing down the paper.

Mr. Randolph. Was it such as to attract the attention of those in court?

Mr. Rawle. If they saw him, they must have been struck with the manner in which he expressed his indignation. It was very strong.

Mr. Randolph. Did you hear Mr. Chase say, that if the prisoner's counsel had any objection as to the law, as laid down by the court, they must address the court and not the jury?

Mr. Rawle. I have no recollection of hearing such an expression fall from Judge Chase at any time.

Mr. Nicholson. You stated much of your testimony from your notes. I would ask, sir, were those notes taken at the time, and in the order they stand arranged?

Mr. Rawle. Precisely so, sir. I made my notes in court.

Mr. Nicholson. What was there in the conduct of Judge Chase that induced the counsel to infer that they would be precluded from citing the statutes of the United States which have been referred to?

Mr. Rawle. I cannot say from what circumstance, unless from a recollection of the strenuous opposition made on a former trial on the part of the prosecution to the course then adopted.

Mr. Nicholson. Judge Chase also declared: "No case can come before us on which I have not an opinion as to the law, otherwise I should not be fit to preside here." Was there anything which took place prior to this on which Mr. Lewis founded the opinion that he would be compelled to address the court and not the jury?

Mr. Rawle. It appeared to me that it arose altogether from misapprehension. Nothing fell from the court in my hearing, either in public or in private, which tended to control the counsel from speaking, or to withdraw the consideration of the law from the jury. There appeared to be much misapprehension; and I observed that the court did not set him right as explicitly as might have prevented part of this misapprehension.

Mr. Randolph. I think you said that you entertained at the time of your conference with the judges an anxious hope that the gentlemen would be induced to proceed. If there is no impropriety in the question, I wish to know the cause of the great anxiety you felt on that subject, which induced you to become the agent of calling in the papers containing the opinion of the court?

Mr. Rawle. My reasons arose from an anticipation of those unpleasant sensations, which I would never wish my greatest enemy to feel, that of conducting a trial, in a capital case, and standing alone against a man without counsel. It is easy to conceive that my hopes may have been anxious that I might not be placed in such a painful situation.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Nicholson. I will ask you whether you took notes of what passed on the first day?

Mr. Rawle. I did not.

Mr. Harper. Inform the court whether Judge Chase did, at any time during the proceedings, say that he would restrict the counsel of Fries from citing any statutes of the United States to the jury, and especially the sedition law?

Mr. Rawle. I do not recollect that he did.

Mr. Harper. Did he say that he disapproved of the conduct of the former circuit court in permitting the statutes of Congress to be read?

Mr. Rawle. He did not. I never heard any such expression from Judge Chase in relation to the statutes.

Mr. Harper. Have you the paper in your possession which was thrown down on the table?

Mr. Rawle. I have it in my pocket.

Mr. Harper. Will you please to produce it?

Mr. Rawle. This is it, (handing it to Mr. Harper.)

Mr. Harper. Do you know in whose handwriting it is?

Mr. Rawle. In that of the assistant clerk of the court, Mr. Bond.

Mr. Harper. We will offer this paper in evidence.

Mr. Harper then read the paper, as follows, being exhibit No. 2:

"The prisoner, John Fries, stands indicted for levying war against the United States.

"This Constitutional definition of treason is a question of law. Every proposition in any statute (whether more or less distinct—whether easy or difficult to comprehend) is always a question of law.

"What is the true meaning and true import of the statute, and whether the case stated comes within the statute, is a question of law and not of fact. The question in an indictment for levying war against (or adhering to the enemies of) the United States, is 'whether the facts stated do not amount to levying war.'

"It is the duty of the court in this, as in all criminal cases, to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury are to decide on the present, and in all criminal cases, both the law and the facts, on their consideration of the whole case.

"The court heard the indictment read on the arraignment of the prisoner, some days past, and just now on his trial, and they attended to the overt acts stated in the indictment.

"It is the opinion of the court that any insurrection or rising of any body of people, within the United States, to attain or effect, by force or violence, any object of a great public nature, or of public and general (or national) concern, is a levying war against the United States, within the contemplation and construction of the Constitution of the United States.

"On this general position, the court are of opinion that any such insurrection or rising to resist or to prevent by force or violence the execution of any statute of the United States, for levying or collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises; or for calling for the militia to execute the laws of the Union, or for any other purpose, (under any pretence, as that the statute was unequal, burdensome, oppressive, or unconstitutional,) is a levying war against the United States within the Constitution.

"The reason for this opinion is, that an insurrection to resist or prevent by force the execution of any statute, has a direct tendency to dissolve all the bonds of society, to destroy all order, and all laws, and also all security for the lives, liberties, and property of the citizens of the United States.

"The court are of opinion that military weapons (as guns and swords, mentioned in the indictment) are not necessary to make such insurrection or rising amount to levying war, because numbers may supply the want of military weapons; and other instruments may effect the intended mischief. The legal guilt of levying war may be incurred without the use of military weapons or military array.

"The court are of opinion that the assembling bodies of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for purposes only of a private nature, is not treason, although the judges and peace officers should be insulted or resisted; or even great outrage committed to the persons and property of our citizens.

"The true criterion to determine whether acts committed are a treason or a less offence, (as a riot,) is the quo animo the people did assemble. When the intention is universal or general, as to effect some object of a general public nature, it will be treason, and cannot be considered, construed, or reduced to a riot. The commission of any number of felonies, riots, or other misdemeanors, cannot alter their nature so as to make them amount to treason; and, on the other hand, if the intention and acts combined amount to treason, they cannot be sunk down to a felony or riot. The intention with which any acts (as felonies, the destruction of houses, or the like) are done, will show to what class of crimes the case belongs.

"The court are of opinion that if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection, to resist or oppose the execution of any statute of the United States by force, that they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor; but if they proceed to carry such intention to execution by force, that they are guilty of the treason of levying war, and the quantum of the force employed neither lessens nor increases the crime; whether by one hundred or one thousand persons is wholly immaterial.

"The court are of opinion that a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution; some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war, but that it is altogether immaterial whether the force used is sufficient to effectuate the object; any force, connected with the intention, will constitute the crime of levying war."

Mr. Harper. I will ask you one question. Do you recollect whether, after the verdict of guilty was brought in against John Fries, the court gave him information of his right to make a motion for an arrest of judgment?

Mr. Rawle. When the verdict was brought in, the court briefly told him he might be heard then or at a future day. When he was afterwards brought up for sentence, they told him, if he, or any person for him, could point out any error or irregularity in the course of the proceedings, they should be patiently heard; and in like manner Judge Chase addressed the other prisoners; the same question was put to all that were found guilty. They answered, that they had nothing to say.

Mr. Hay being called, and not immediately appearing—

Mr. Harper observed this witness was called on an article subsequent to that on which the witnesses already examined had testified. He would submit a proposition to the honorable Managers, to go through at one time the whole of the testimony on each article. It might not be the regular course, but if gentlemen assent to it, said Mr. H., we shall prefer it; it will be convenient to the witnesses, many of whom may be discharged before the whole of the testimony is gone through.

Mr. Randolph. Though this mode may have its advantages, it is attended with its difficulties. A witness may be found to support more than one article. With regard to the first article, I have no objection to this course; but with regard to the subsequent articles I have.

President. If the gentlemen are agreed, I will take the sense of the Senate on the course to be pursued.

Mr. Randolph. It is the wish of the Managers not to depart from the usual course.

Mr. Harper. We do not claim it as a right.

The greater part of the evidence I am to deliver relates to what was said by me as counsel for J. T. Callender, who was indicted for a libel on the President of the United States, and what was said by one of the judges; for I do not recollect to have heard the voice of Judge Griffin at any time during the trial. In order to make this statement as accurate as possible, as my memory is not strong, it is necessary to resort to a statement made by myself and the counsel associated with me in the defence of J. T. Callender, which I now hold in my hand, and every part of which, according to my best recollection, is correct.

Mr. Harper here interrupted Mr. Hay, and said, the witness may refer to anything done by himself at the time the occurrences happened which he relates. But I submit it to the Court how correct it is to refer to what was not done by him, or done at the time.

The President asked Mr. Hay whether the notes were taken by him.

Mr. Hay. The statement was made by different persons. Some parts were made by myself, perhaps the greater part; the rest by Mr. Nicholas and Mr. Wirt. I believe I shall be able to state from it every material occurrence which took place at the time. With regard to those parts of the statement not made by me, a reference to them will call to my recollection the facts mentioned in such parts. If I state anything which I do not distinctly recollect, upon adverting to the statement, I will explain the actual situation of my mind on that point.

Mr. Nicholson. If I understand the witness, it is not his intention to give the paper in his hand as evidence, but merely to refer to it for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

Mr. Harper. I do not understand the way in which it is meant to use the paper. I apprehend that it is a rule of evidence that nothing but notes made at the time of the transactions related can be received as evidence. I therefore am of opinion that a reference to this statement is inadmissible, because a part of it is made by others, and none of it made at the time.

Mr. Rodney. When we advert to what has been stated by the witness, who says he does not mean to state in evidence anything in the paper of which he has not, independently of it, a distinct recollection, I think it is within the law to admit him to avail himself of it. I apprehend that had I attended the trial of Callender, and taken minutes, and others had attended and not taken notes, if by recurring to my notes there should be recalled to their recollection facts so distinctly that they could swear to them before the court, it would be competent to admit their reference to such notes.

Mr. Campbell inquired whether the objection were not confined to that part of the statement not made by the witness?

Mr. Harper said the objection related to the whole of it.

Mr. Campbell believed that a witness might use any memorandum to refresh his memory; and that it was not necessary that it should be made at the point of time when the events happened. It is sufficient if made at a time when his remembrance of the facts was correct. With regard to that part not taken by himself, if he perused it at a time so shortly after the events related, as to be able to determine it accurate, and now recognises the memorandum to be the same, it is sufficient.

Mr. Martin said he had been many years in the practice of the law. The rules of evidence were probably different in different States. But he had always supposed that a witness could not be permitted to use any memorandum not made by himself, or at the time of the events related, or near it. He may, before he comes into court, consult any memorandum for the purpose of refreshing his memory, but not in court.

The President. The witness proposes to make use of a memorandum under the circumstances which he has stated. The question is, shall the witness be permitted to make use of it?

Mr. Adams. I am not prepared to answer that question at present, not knowing the nature of the minutes the witness proposes to use. I therefore move that the Senate retire before the question is taken.

Trial of Judge Chase.

The question on retiring was taken, and, on a division, lost.

Mr. Adams said he wished to see the paper before he voted.

The President asked Mr. Hay whether it was in his own hand-writing?

Mr. Hay replied that it was not; but that it was written by a clerk from a printed statement.

President. Have you the parts made by yourself separate?

Mr. Hay said he had not.

The President then put the question, whether the witness should be permitted to use the paper? and, the question being taken by yeas and nays, passed in the negative—yeas 16, nays 18.

Mr. Randolph asked the witness to state to the Court the circumstances which took place during the trial of James T. Callender, and particularly what respected the excuse and testimony of John Basset.

Mr. Hay. I will state as well as I can what fell from the judge, and which appeared to me to be material. After some previous observations, the counsel for the traverser claimed for their client his Constitutional right to be tried by an impartial jury. I cannot pretend to relate precisely either the course of proceeding or the exact words which were used, since I am deprived of the aid of those notes which I know to be correct. I shall not, therefore, recite the precise words, but I shall give the substance of them, and the words themselves as nearly as possible. According to my best recollection Judge Chase's declaration on that point was, that he would see justice done to the prisoner in that respect. In order to obtain the object which the counsel for Callender had in view, we pursued this course. Believing that a majority of the petit jury, if not all of them, were men decidedly opposed to J. T. Callender, in political sentiments, and thinking it probable, from the state of parties at that time, that they had made up their minds, we wished to ask every juror, before he was sworn, whether he had ever formed an opinion with respect to the book called "The Prospect Before Us." According to my best recollection, Judge Chase interfered, and told us it was not the proper question. He said he would tell us what the proper question was. He then went on to state that the proper question was this: "Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion concerning the charges in this indictment?" Though I have but little dependence on my memory, in general, yet in this I am certain, that I not only give the substance, but the identical words used. To this question an answer was necessarily given in the negative.

Mr. Key. Who answered?

Mr. Hay. A juror.

Mr. Key. The whole, or what jurors? Was it the answer of John Basset? no other juror is mentioned in the second article. The moment any attempt is made to extend the inquiry beyond the precise object of these second article, I will object to it.

Mr. Randolph. We have no objection to that course being pursued, as we can get all we want from the fourth article.

Mr. Rodney. We are examining a witness who may be able to give testimony on the second, third, or fourth articles.

President. Will the gentleman read the article on which the witness is called?

Mr. Randolph. I do not know that we are bound to do so.

President. The Senate desire it.

Mr. Randolph. I beg pardon. I thought it was desired on the other side.

Mr. Rodney then read the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth articles.

Mr. Harper. Our wish is to confine the witness to the matter charged. We only object to the opinion of the witness being given.

President. It is probable, gentlemen, that nothing will arise in what the witness states, that will occasion difficulty. He will please proceed.

Mr. Hay. What I was about to mention was not so much opinion as fact. I was proceeding to relate the facts which constitute the basis of the second article. When Mr. Basset was called by the marshal, he manifested some repugnance to serving on the jury. He said, according to my best recollection, that he was unwilling to serve, because he had made up his mind as to that book. I do not pretend to say that the words used were precisely those I state. He may have expressed himself in the words ascribed to him by the stenographical statement given of the trial. The objection, thus made by Mr. Basset, was overruled by Judge Chase, who asked him whether he had ever formed and delivered an opinion concerning the charges in the indictment. He was sworn to answer this question. Like the other jurors, he answered in the negative, and the judge ordered him, like the other jurors, to be sworn on the jury. He was sworn, and did serve.

Mr. Harper. Was the word used by the judge, and or or?

Mr. Hay. I am perfectly clear it was and, and not or.

In the state of things at that time, and seeing the temper that was manifested on the trial, I would not, and did not, ask the juror a single question without submitting it to the court, and soliciting their permission to ask it. I solicited the leave of the court to ask a question. The reply of the judge was this—the difficulty I experience at this moment in stating the precise words, furnishes the reason I had for wishing to have recourse to the statement I had in my hand; since I am denied that indulgence, I will not pretend to state literally what was said, but I will state the substance. I told the judge I wished to ask a question. "What, said the judge, is the question you want to put?—state it. If I think it a proper question, or if I choose it, you may put it. Come, what is your question?" Notwithstanding the humiliation I felt at being addressed in such a way before a crowded audience, I asked, "have you formed (leaving out, "and delivered") an opinion concerning the book from which the charges in the indictment are taken?" The reply of Judge Chase was, "no, sir, no, you shall ask no such question." And the question was not asked. This is all I recollect at this moment respecting Mr. Basset, and the occurrences connected with that part of the trial.

It was stated by Callender, in his affidavit, that Colonel Taylor, of Caroline, was a material witness; but of this I am not certain, because I have not read the affidavit since the trial. In the interval that elapsed between the day on which the first motion was made, and that on which the trial took place, Tuesday, Colonel Taylor was summoned. When he came to town, I know not. I have no recollection of having seen him until he came into court. I had, therefore, no opportunity of ascertaining whether it would be in his power to furnish the accused with the evidence he expected to derive from him. After the witnesses on the part of the United States had been adduced to prove the fact of publication, and after the attorney of the United States had opened the case, and stated the law arising upon the evidence, Colonel Taylor was offered to the court as a witness. He was sworn; and, immediately after, or probably while he was swearing, Mr. Chase asked the counsel of Callender what they expected to prove by him. If I recollect rightly, Mr. Nicholas, one of my associates, observed that we did not know distinctly what could be proved by Colonel Taylor; but that we expected to prove what would amount to a justification of one of the counts in the indictment; that we expected to prove that Mr. Adams, the then President of the United States, had avowed, in conversation with Colonel Taylor, sentiments hostile to a republican Government; and that he had voted in the Senate of the United States against the law for sequestering British property in this country, and against the law for suspending commercial intercourse between the United States and the Kingdom of Great Britain. I do not recollect precisely the words which were used by Mr. Nicholas, in making the observations that accompanied this statement; but I think he said he hoped that it would be understood that he was not tied down to these particular points, saying that probably the answers given by Colonel Taylor might suggest other questions proper to be put. Nor do I use the precise words in which Judge Chase made an objection; but I do remember that the objection was made. The principle upon which he founded his objection was this, that Colonel Taylor's evidence did not go to a justification of any one entire charge; and he declared Colonel Taylor's evidence to be inadmissible on that ground. The judge was then asked by Mr. Nicholas whether we might not prove part of a charge by one witness, and the other part by another. The judge answered him, that he desired him to understand the law as he had propounded it; and the law was this: that this could not be done; that Colonel Taylor's evidence related to only one part of a charge, and that he could not prove one part by one evidence, and one part by another. I then observed to the judge that I thought Colonel Taylor's evidence admissible even on the principle laid down by the court; that I thought his testimony would go to prove both members of the sentence.

The one asserted that Mr. Adams was an aristocrat, the other, that he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest; and that he could prove that he had heard Mr. Adams make the remarks already stated; and that he had proved serviceable to Great Britain in the way mentioned by the author, that is, in giving the two votes in the Senate, alluded to in the work. The judge did not say in express terms that the position taken at the bar was wrong, but he said that the evidence of Colonel Taylor was inadmissible, and that the counsel knew it to be so; and I believe it was at the same moment of time, he said that our object was to deceive and mislead the populace. I remember these expressions as well as if I had heard them yesterday. Finding that the attempt I had made to render a service, not to the man, but to the cause, instead of affording service to the cause, only brought on me the obloquy of the court, I felt myself disgusted, and said no more on the subject.

I recollect that we were requested by the judge to reduce to writing the questions that we wished to propound to Colonel Taylor. I thought the measure so novel and unprecedented that I was not disposed to comply with this desire. The questions were, however, stated in writing by Mr. Nicholas, who observed that he hoped we would not be confined in the examination of the witness to the questions thus stated in writing. If I mistake, not, before the questions were reduced to writing, Mr. Nicholas made some observations about the mode pursued by the court in reference to the attorney for the United States, and that exercised towards the counsel for the prisoner; that the attorney for the United States had not been required to state in writing the questions he wished to ask. When this remark was made to the judge, he said that the attorney for the United States had stated in the opening of the case all that he expected to prove; "but though this were done, we were not bound to do it." My impression is that that word escaped the judge several times.

Nr. Nicholson. What word?

Mr. Hay. The word "we."

Mr. Nicholson. Did it refer to the court as well as the attorney?

Mr. Hay. So, sir, I understood it.

The fourth article relates to the refusal of the judge to postpone the trial on the affidavit of Callender; on which I can only say that the affidavit was filed, but whether regularly drawn or not I do not know. This affidavit, according to my best recollection, stated the absence of material witnesses.

The next article relates to a subject, that it is very unpleasant to me to make any remarks upon, because I feel myself to be a party concerned. The judge is charged with—

[Mr. Hay here read the third, fourth, and fifth clauses of the fourth article.]

There were many expressions used by Judge Chase during the trial which were uncommon, and which I thought, and still think to be so. With respect to the asperity with which he censured me, I shall not—

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Harper interrupted the witness, and desired him to state the expressions, and let the court judge for themselves.

Mr. Hay. The first expression, which made a very strong impression on my mind, was this: In the course of the argument, urged by me in support of the motion for a continuance to the next term, I assumed it as a clear position, that the law of the State of Virginia, which directs that the jury shall assess the fine, would govern in this case. As soon as I got to that part of the argument the judge interrupted me, and gave me to understand that I was mistaken in the law, and added, the assessment of the fine by the jury may be conformable to your local and State laws, but when applied to the federal courts, it is a "wild notion." In the case of Colonel Taylor's evidence, which I have already stated, the judge said that we knew the evidence to be inadmissible, though we pressed it upon the court, and then the expression followed which has been already mentioned, that we were endeavoring to mislead and deceive the populace. At another time he was pleased to observe, Gentlemen, you have all along been in error in this cause, and you persist in pressing your mistakes on the court. On more occasions than one he charged the counsel with advancing doctrines they knew to be wrong. I endeavored in one part of the cause to satisfy the court that the book called the Prospect Before Us, could not be given in evidence in support of the indictment, because the title of the book was not mentioned in the indictment. In support of my argument, I observed to the court that if the indictment mentioned the book from which the charges were formed, and any subsequent prosecution should afterwards be instituted, the traverser would have nothing more to do than to produce a copy of the record, and plead in bar of a subsequent prosecution; but that according to the opinion of the court, the situation of the traverser would be more precarious than according to the doctrines for which I contended; for that the traverser, if he should plead a former prosecution in bar, would not be able to prove the fact by comparing the record with the indictment; but must resort to extraneous evidence to prove that the subsequent prosecution was founded on the same publication that gave rise to the first. The judge was pleased to observe, without seeming to understand the distinction that I had endeavored to draw, that I knew the present prosecution could be pleaded in bar. I certainly did know it, and was endeavoring at that very time to show by my argument that the better mode of proving the truth of the plea would be by a copy of the record, rather than by an appeal to parole testimony. Judge Chase again interrupted me, and said, I knew that this prosecution might be pleaded in bar.

In the course of the same argument, which I addressed to the judge, for the purpose of showing the truth of the positions we had stated, I observed that according to the established doctrine, the words "tenor and effect," in an indictment for a libel, bound the party to the literal recital of the parts charged as libellous. In support of that opinion I quoted several authorities that satisfied my mind. The judge was pleased to tell me, I was mistaken in my application of them; but I do not remember his precise words. He said the words "tenor and effect" did not oblige the prosecutor to give more than the substance of the paper meant to be recited. It is contended, said he, that the book ought to be copied verbatim et literatim, I wonder, he continued, they do not contend for punctuatim too.

Mr. Nicholson. Was this observation addressed to the bar?

Mr. Hay. It appeared to me to be intended for the people; for he looked round the room when he said, with a sarcastic smile, I wonder they do not contend for punctuatim too. I recollect also, that when Mr. Wirt, who was associated with me as counsel for the traverser, was addressing the court, he was ordered by Judge Chase, to sit down—in this precise language, sit down. The judge also declared that the counsel on the part of Callender should not address any observations to the jury concerning the unconstitutionality of the second section of the sedition law, in respect to prosecutions for libellous publications.

Mr. S. Smith, at this stage of the examination of the witness, moved an adjournment of the Senate to their legislative apartment.

The motion not being agreed to;

Mr. Hay proceeded.—When Mr. Wirt was arguing from a proposition he had laid down, he said the conclusion which followed was perfectly syllogistical. The judge bowed to him in a manner I cannot describe, and said "A non sequitur, sir." I do not remember any other expression used by the judge calculated to deter the counsel from proceeding in the defence of J. T. Callender. But I do remember that I was more frequently interrupted by Judge Chase on that trial, than I have ever been interrupted during the sixteen years I have practised at the bar. I do not state how often I was interrupted, because I do not recollect; but I know the interruptions were frequent, and I believed them to be very unnecessary, not only as they regarded myself, but the counsel who were associated with me in the defence.

Mr. Randolph. In your testimony you have said that during the whole course of the trial you never once heard the voice of Judge Griffin. Where those replies and those decisions, which you have detailed, given by Judge Chase apparently without any consultation with Judge Griffin?

Mr. Hay. I stated that I did not hear the voice of Judge Griffin; but I by no means meant it to be inferred that Judge Griffin was not heard by any other person. Judge Chase's manner of delivering the opinion of the court was generally this: after having stopped or interrupted the counsel for the traverser, by telling them to sit down, or that they were mistaken in the law, sometimes, but not every time, he would look at Judge Griffin, who sat upon his left hand, and turning to the bar, and to the audience, he would say, such is the opinion of the court. I think also, that I saw them speaking to each other, but not in such a manner as if they were consulting upon a question of law.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Randolph. You said that the question propounded to Mr. Basset, and the other jurors, was, "Have you formed and delivered an opinion as to the charges contained in the indictment?" Are you certain that the expression was "formed and delivered?"

Mr. Hay. I am as clear on that point as I am of anything that ever occurred in the course of my life. I have said that my memory at the best is not a good one; but some of the occurrences on this trial were so singular and novel, that they made an unusual impression on my mind.

Mr. Randolph. When it was decided by the court that the question, "Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion on the charges contained in the indictment," was the only proper question, was it stated by the court, or requested by the counsel for the accused, that the indictment might be read?

Mr. Hay. It was requested by the counsel that the indictment might be read, that the juror might have an opportunity of ascertaining whether he had made up his mind on the particular charges it contained.

Mr. Randolph. Was the indictment then read?

Mr. Hay. It was not then read, nor until the jurors were sworn.

Mr. Randolph. You have been, you have stated, a practitioner of the law for fifteen years. Has it been the practice of the courts in Virginia, or have you ever heard of, or seen, an instance, where the questions propounded by counsel, were required to be reduced to writing, and submitted to their inspection, before they were permitted to be put?

Mr. Hay. I never knew of a single instance; nor do I remember to have even heard or read of such an instance. I acted as the prosecutor in the trial of Logwood, charged with counterfeiting notes of the Bank of the United States. The Chief Justice of the United States, who presided at the trial, made no such requisition, nor did it ever occur to me, that such a thing ought to be, or could be done.

Mr. Nicholson. When you were required to reduce the questions to writing, was it at the instance of the attorney of the district, (Mr. Nelson,) or was it by the court?

Mr. Hay. I do not remember that Mr. Nelson made any objection to putting the question. The objection was made only on the part of the court. I recollect that Mr. Nelson made one remark as to the witnesses giving testimony on what took place in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. Randolph. Upon what ground did the counsel for the accused assume the right of proving the vote which was given in the Senate by parole testimony? To prove facts done in the Senate you should have reference to their journal.

Mr. Hay. It will be recollected that I stated that Colonel Taylor came into court at the time the jury was about to be sworn; and that the counsel for the traverser was called upon to state in writing the questions that were to be put. Those questions were written without any reflection on my part, as to the propriety or legality of proving the vote of the Senate by parole testimony.

The Court rose at 5 P. M.

TUESDAY, February 12.

The Court met at 12 o'clock.

Present: the Managers, attended by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel.

Mr. Hay, in continuation.

A very short statement will close the detail which I have to make. It was the intention of the counsel, who appeared in behalf of the traverser, to have defended him on the ground of the unconstitutionality of that section of the law, commonly called the sedition law, on which the indictment was founded. The gentlemen associated with me in the defence proceeded to argue this point. They were not permitted to address the jury respecting it. The treatment experienced by Mr. Wirt on this occasion, I have already in some degree stated. I recollect he was interrupted by Judge Chase at several times, and particularly at one of those times, for the purpose of telling him that the doctrine he contended for was true, that the jury had the right to determine on the law as well as the fact. Mr. Wirt then went on to state that the Constitution of the United States was the law of the land. Judge Chase interrupted him, and said there was no necessity for proving that point, it was the supreme law of the land. Mr. Wirt then went on to argue that if the jury had a right to determine the law in this case, and if the Constitution was the supreme law, the conclusion was perfectly syllogistical, that the jury had a right to determine on the Constitutionality of the law. It was at that time that Judge Chase addressed him in the words that I have mentioned. According to my best recollection he bowed, and with an air of derision, addressing him, said, "a non sequitur, sir." Whether Mr. Wirt said anything more after this in behalf of his client, I do not recollect; he did not, however, say much. After Mr. Wirt sat down, I rose, addressed myself to the court, and stated that I addressed myself to the court exclusively. I observed that I did not wish to be heard by the jury, or by the very numerous assemblage that surrounded me. This observation was intended by me as a sort of reply to the observation made by the judge that our defence was intended for the people. I did not attempt to speak to the jury on the question, which I wished to argue before them, but I addressed myself to the court for the purpose of satisfying them. After I had gone on for a short time, I was interrupted by the judge, by a question which I thought an unnecessary one. I will endeavor to state it. I stated to the court, in terms as distinct as my knowledge of the English language enabled me to use, the specific proposition for which I meant to contend; which was, that the jury had, according to the laws of the land, a right to determine every question necessary to the decision of the question of guilty or not guilty. Judge Chase asked me whether I laid down that proposition as true in civil as well as in criminal cases, because, if you do, said he, you are wrong. My reply was that I believed the proposition universally true; but it was sufficient for my purpose if it were true as applied to criminal cases. I went on, as well as I could, in the argument I intended to urge. I was again interrupted by the judge. What the circumstances were that gave rise to that interruption, my unaided memory will not enable me to tell, nor do I recollect what expressions were used by him. I have not, since yesterday, taken the liberty of looking at the statement, which I have in my pocket, of the circumstances that took place on the trial; but I know that I was interrupted more than once, and I believe more than twice; but the impression on my mind was, that to get through the argument, I should be subjected to more humiliation than any man vindicating another in a court of justice was bound on any principle to encounter, and I declined proceeding in my argument.

When the judge perceived by the movements I was making with my papers, that I was about to retire, he asked me to go on. I told him I should not go on. He said there was no occasion for me to be captious. I told him I was not captious. He then said, go on, go on—you will not be interrupted. I, however, retired from the bar, and, I believe, from the room where the court was held.

Mr. Randolph. Did any circumstances occur, in relation to a witness brought forward on the part of the prosecution, of an unusual nature; were any observations made by the court to that witness, and what were those observations?

Mr. Hay. I do not know whether the circumstance I am about to state is an answer to the question which has been put to me. But I recollect distinctly that a circumstance did occur, which I thought extraordinary. A witness was brought forward to prove the publication of the Prospect Before Us, who was the very man employed by Callender to print the work. Whether the publication could be proved by any other person than Callender's agents, I do not now recollect. But I stated to the court that this witness was about to do what the Constitution authorized him to refuse to do, and what he was not required to do by the established rules of law in criminal prosecutions; which was, that no man was bound to deliver testimony that would go to criminate himself; and, if anything done by him implicated him in the transaction charged against Callender as libellous, he was not bound to answer, nor could he be required to answer by the court. Mr. Chase said that the opinion I had expressed was correct; but the witness, who had come forward to give evidence of the publication, might rest assured that he would not be molested for any part which he may have taken in the publication. I do not recollect that the District Attorney said a word on the occasion. Everything that was said on that head was said by myself, and answered by the court, as I have stated. The witness was sworn, and gave in his testimony, in which he stated that he was employed by Callender to print the work called the Prospect Before Us.

Mr. Randolph. The counsel for the accused seemed to have considered in this case, as well as in all the others, that the proceedings would be governed by the act of the State of Virginia, which, in virtue of the act of Congress of 1789, was the rule of procedure. It appears that process was issued, such as the laws of Virginia did not authorize. Was there no reference made by the counsel for the accused to the act of Virginia, to show that the process was illegal, or that it was contrary to law, to rule the party to trial at the same term the indictment was found?

Mr. Hay. There was a general, but not a specific reference to that circumstance. In making the motion for a continuance, I stated that in conformity to the law and usage of Virginia, when a presentment was found, the ordinary process was by summons to the next term, and that, during the interval between serving the process and the time at which it was returnable, the accused was enabled to prepare and collect matter for his defence. It is extremely probable that some other motion would have been made, but for an observation that fell from the judge on another part of my argument. I stated that the jury were to assess the fine according to law; this opinion was opposed and denounced as a wild notion. Finding that the judge had made up his mind on that subject, and that the law of Virginia was not considered as obligatory, I had no idea of making any motion to the court founded on the doctrine which he had thus denounced. My opinion before, at that time and at the present time, the opinion which I expressed officially on a late occasion, is, that where the laws of the United States do not otherwise require or provide—

Mr. Martin said, that he apprehended this testimony was of no kind of consequence.

Mr. Hay. I was only about to state the reasons why nothing more was said on that subject, or a motion founded on it.

The President. The Senate object to that sort of testimony. You will please to confine yourself as much as possible to facts.

Mr. Hay. I only meant to have stated a fact, that the express declaration made by the court to the counsel for the accused, in relation to the doctrine just mentioned, put a stop to my mentioning any idea, or making any motion founded on that doctrine.

Mr. Randolph. I wish to ask the witness, who tells us he has been sixteen years a practitioner at the bar, whether he ever knew an instance, in which, in a case similar to that of Callender, punishable only by fine and imprisonment, a capias was issued.

Mr. Hay. I ought to premise, that this question relates to a branch of jurisprudence which I have not much attended to, although sometime since I acted as prosecutor for the State for one of its counties. I have never known a single instance in which a capias has been awarded in the first instance. I believe the invariable practice is to issue a summons, and I believe it is not customary in Virginia to try a cause at the second term, when the party appears and pleads.

Mr. Randolph. If it is not the practice at the second term, do you mean that it is at the first?

Mr. Hay. No, sir; the presentment is found at the first term; the summons issues returnable to the next; at the second term the issue is made up, and the trial comes on at the subsequent term. This, I believe, is the ordinary mode of proceeding in Virginia.

Mr. Randolph. Finding that the law of Virginia was not considered as applicable, did you move, and support the motion by argument, for a continuance, founded on the affidavit filed by the accused, and what were those arguments?

Mr. Hay. I do not know whether I can state accurately all the arguments urged for a continuance. The argument was certainly in part founded on the affidavit of the traverser. He stated that he wanted documents which he could not instantaneously procure, and material witnesses who resided at a great distance. If I recollect rightly, I stated when Callender was first carried into court, that I was not prepared to discuss the important question whether a jury had a right to determine on the constitutionality of a law. I also stated the case to be a new one, that a prosecution for a libel had never before occurred in Virginia, and that the gentlemen of the bar were not masters of the subject; and that therefore I wished time to look into it.

[Mr. Charles Lee was here introduced into Court as counsel for Judge Chase.]

Mr. Harper. In your examination in chief, you stated that you defended the cause and not the man. We are not capable of understanding your meaning, and beg you to explain it. Was it the cause of Callender, or was it some other cause?

Mr. Hay. It was the cause of the Constitution, and I did not mean to defend Callender farther than he was connected with that cause.

Mr. Harper. Your object appears to have been to show that the law under which he was indicted was unconstitutional?

Mr. Hay. That was one great cause.

Mr. Harper. Not the sole one?

Mr. Hay. I had previously made up my mind, that if a prosecution should take place in Virginia under that law, I for one would step forward and offer my services to the person who should be selected as its first victim.

Mr. Harper. You said that you referred, when making a motion for a continuance, generally to the law, but not specifically to the law of Virginia?

Mr. Hay. My meaning was, that I did not quote the precise title of the act, but made a general reference to it.

Mr. Harper. Without citing the particular law?

Mr. Hay. Without citing it; I made no other than a general reference to the law.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect whether, on the subject of Colonel Taylor's testimony, Judge Chase applied to Mr. Nelson, the attorney of the district, to determine whether the testimony should be admitted?

Mr. Hay. I have some indistinct recollection of some such thing.

Mr. Harper. Did not Judge Chase offer to postpone the cause for a month or more?

Mr. Hay. I have no recollection of such an offer; it would have been the wish of the counsel for the accused to have obtained that delay. I know that, in consequence of an impression on my mind, that a postponement could not be obtained, I devoted my days and nights to make myself acquainted with the subject, previous to the day when the trial came on. I have no recollection of such an offer; if I had so understood it at the time, I should have availed myself of it.

Mr. Harper. Did the counsel of Callender ask for a postponement, independently of a continuance to the next term?

Mr. Hay. I do not recollect that they did.

The President. You say some conversation appeared to pass between Judge Chase and Judge Griffin; did you hear so much as to understand the substance of it?

Mr. Hay. No, sir.

President. How then did you draw the inference?

Mr. Hay. From the business then before them.

President. You spoke of a witness called by the name of Rind. Did he appear willing to give testimony?

Mr. Hay. He did not appear unwilling. The objection to his testimony was made by myself.

Mr. Randolph. The witness will please to state the circumstances that passed in the rejection of his testimony, and other circumstances which have any relation to the conduct of Judge Chase on the trial of Callender?

Mr. Taylor. I was summoned as a witness on that trial on the part of Callender. I attended and was sworn. On being sworn, Judge Chase inquired what it was intended to prove by my testimony? I do not recollect the expressions of Judge Chase, nor do I recollect precisely the answer made to this inquiry; but Judge Chase desired the counsel for the accused to reduce their questions to writing. They did so.

[Colonel Taylor's testimony was here so indistinctly heard, that we could not collect his words.]

I had come into court very near the hour when the court met, nor had I previously given any intimation of the testimony I could give either to Callender or his counsel. I should have added that, after, I think, the judge had declared the witness could not be examined, he applied to the district judge for his opinion; who replied in so low a voice that I could not well tell what he said. But this was after he had given his own opinion that my testimony could not be received.

Mr. Randolph. You state that neither the accused nor his counsel knew the extent to which your testimony would go. Would your testimony, according to your belief, have had a material bearing on the charges against Callender?

Mr. Martin objecting to this question, Mr. Randolph said he would withdraw it.

Mr. Randolph. Did you observe anything unusual in conducting the trial?

Mr. Taylor. One or more motions were made by the counsel for Callender, who was interrupted by Judge Chase repeatedly. The words in which these interruptions were couched, I cannot recollect, though I formed an opinion of the style and manner of them; the effect of which was to produce laughter in the audience at the expense of the counsel. If I am required to declare the character in which I conceived them to be made, I am ready to do so.

There was here a short pause, when Judge Chase rose and said, he had no objection to the opinion of the witness being delivered.

Mr. Taylor. I thought the interruptions were in a very high degree imperative, satirical, and witty.

Mr. Randolph. Did there appear to you anything unusual in the manner of the counsel for the accused towards the court?

Mr. Taylor. I neither discovered the least degree of provocation given by the counsel, nor perceived any anger expressed by the court. Judge Griffin was silent, nor were Judge Chase's interruptions accompanied by the indication of any anger as far as I could perceive.

To an interrogatory made, Mr. Taylor said, the interruptions of the court were extremely well calculated to abash and disconcert counsel.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect anything in relation to the objection taken by John Basset to serving as a juror?

Mr. Taylor. I by no means recollect the circumstances with precision, but the impression on my mind is strong, that Basset said that he had entertained some prepossession against the book called "The Prospect Before Us," or against Callender; and that the judge inquired whether he had any prepossession in regard to the charges in the indictment. He said, no: and it was also said by him or by some other person brought forward as a juror, that he had not read the indictment. Judge Chase ordered him to be sworn.

Mr. Randolph. You were, I believe, a long time a practitioner of the law in the courts of Virginia?

Mr. Taylor. For a few years—about seven, I practised the law.

Mr. Randolph. I will ask you if you have ever known a capias issued against a person indicted for an offence not capital, or a person, presented for such an offence, tried at the same term the presentment was made?

Mr. Taylor. I must answer in the negative, but it is proper to remark that, as I never turned my attention to the practice of the criminal law, no great reliance ought, on this point, to be placed on my answer.

Mr. Randolph. Has it ever been the practice in the courts of Virginia for counsel to be compelled to reduce to writing, questions which they wish to propound, and submit them previously to the court?

Mr. Taylor. I have never seen such a practice in a case like that of Callender.

Mr. Randolph. Do you remember a question put by Mr. Chase to the counsel on the part of the United States, with regard to permitting your testimony to be received?

Mr. Taylor. After the decision of the court, I do recollect Mr. Chase did express some such idea as that intimated in the question. The attorney for the district instantly expressed his dissent to what I conceived to have been in a very feeble manner recommended by the judge.

Mr. Randolph. This intimation was after the positive rejection by the court?

Mr. Taylor. I think so, although I will not be positive, as I made no memorandum of what occurred.

Mr. Randolph. Were you present when a motion for a continuance was made, and do you recollect the grounds of it?

Mr. Taylor. I only recollect that it was founded on the affidavit of Callender: I have no recollection of the arguments used.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect the grounds of the court for rejecting your testimony?

Mr. Taylor. I think, on the ground that though it were admitted, it would not acquit the accused.

Mr. Randolph. Was any observation made personally to you after the testimony was rejected?

Mr. Taylor. None, sir.

Mr. Harper. You have said, you considered the interruptions of the court as highly calculated to abash the counsel; did you mean thereby to give your opinion that they were so intended, or that such was their tendency?

Mr. Taylor. I thought they were so intended, and they had their full effect. They were followed by a great deal of mirth in the audience. The audience laughed, but the counsel never laughed at all.

Philip N. Nicholas, sworn.

In the year 1800, in the month of May, the circuit court of the United States sat at Richmond. Of this court, Mr. Chase and Mr. Griffin were the judges. I believe Mr. Chase sat alone for some time—for how long I do not recollect. Mr. Griffin did not, I believe, take his seat until the motion to continue the cause was renewed. On the first day of the court, Judge Chase delivered a charge to the grand jury, and called their attention, in a particular manner, to infractions of the sedition law. The grand jury returned with a presentment against James Thompson Callender, for a libel against the President, by the publication of a work, entitled "The Prospect Before Us." On this presentment, the attorney for the district filed an indictment, which the grand jury found a true bill.

Process was immediately issued on the indictment. My impression at the time, and until very lately, was, that the process issued was a bench warrant. I have lately heard that it was a capias.

Trial of Judge Chase.

For several days it was believed that Callender, who resided at Petersburg, could not be found; but the marshal at length arrested him, and brought him into court. Mr. Hay and myself undertook his defence. My motive was, that I believed the sedition law unconstitutional, and of course oppressive to any person prosecuted under it.

Mr. Hay and myself had an interview with Callender, in order to ascertain the grounds on which he expected to make his defence. Callender informed us that his witnesses were considerably dispersed, and that there were many documents which it would be necessary for him to obtain, before he could be prepared for his trial. An affidavit was drawn, stating the absence of Callender's witnesses, the want of the documents, and that the counsel could not be prepared during that term. On this affidavit was founded the motion to continue the cause. This motion was urged with great earnestness and zeal, as we were convinced that justice could not be done if the case was tried during that term. The arguments principally urged by us, were, that the defendant had a Constitutional right to compulsory process for his witnesses, and to counsel, but that these privileges would be nugatory if the court would not allow time to summon the witnesses, and for counsel to prepare for the defence.

When the motion was first made, Mr. Chase sat alone. He did not absolutely reject the motion for a continuance, but he intimated in pretty strong terms his opinion that the affidavit did not afford a sufficient ground to continue the cause. Mr. Chase observed that the evidence of Mr. Giles, as stated in the affidavit, was of a serious nature; that he would let the cause lie over till Monday, and in the meantime we might summon such of our witnesses as were accessible to us. On Monday, Mr. Giles did not attend. Mr. Hay stated to the court that the badness of the weather during the preceding day had probably prevented Mr. Giles's attendance, and asked that the cause might lie over a few hours. The judge said we might either let it lie a few hours, or until next day, at our option: the latter was preferred. On Tuesday, the motion was renewed to continue the cause. Amongst other arguments used in support of this motion, Mr. Hay observed, that by the laws of Virginia a person indicted for a misdemeanor was never tried at the term at which the indictment was found, but that a summons issued against him, returnable to the next term.

Mr. Hay further stated, that as the sedition law gave the party accused the right to give the truth of the matter charged as libellous in evidence, it resulted that the law meant only to include the case of facts falsely recited, and not the case of abuse or erroneous opinions; because they are not susceptible of proof, and their verity or falsehood would depend on the particular course of thinking of those who were to judge in the case. Mr. Hay said he wished time to deliberate maturely on this view of the sedition law, and said, that if his construction was correct, the jury, in assessing the fine, ought not to regard such parts of the indictment as related to mere matters of opinion.]

[Here Judge Chase interrupted Mr. Hay, and told him he was mistaken in supposing the jury were to assess the fine. This may be the case, said he, by your local State laws, but as applied to the courts of the United States it is a wild notion. Mr. C. said the cause must come on; that the traverser had not stated in his affidavit that he could prove all the charges in the indictment to be true; that it was necessary for him to prove the truth of all to obtain his acquittal; and that, as the absent witnesses were to give evidence as to part of the charges only, their absence afforded no good reason for a continuance.]

The motion to continue the case was overruled, and Judge Chase directed the jury to be called. When the jury came to the book, I stated to the court that I believed there was ground of challenge to the panel in consequence of one of the jurors, who was returned, having expressed opinions very hostile to the traverser. Mr. Chase, after looking into an authority which I quoted, and also into Coke Littleton, said the law was clear, that our objection did not apply to the panel, but to the individual juror. He further said that we must proceed regularly; that we might either introduce testimony to prove that a particular juror had expressed an opinion on the case, or we might examine the jurors as they came to the book. We preferred the latter mode, and Mr. Hay asked if he might ask a question of the first juror who was sworn. Mr. Chase said that Mr. Hay must submit the question to his previous inspection, and that, if he thought it a proper question, it might be asked. Mr. Hay stated that the question which he wished to ask, was, have you ever formed an opinion on the work, entitled "The Prospect Before Us," from which the charges in the indictment were extracted? Judge Chase said that the counsel should not ask that question; that the only proper question was, have you ever formed and delivered an opinion on the charge; in the indictment? I say (continued the judge,) formed and delivered; for it is not only necessary that he should have formed, but also delivered an opinion to exclude the juror. The judge propounded the last mentioned question to the first juror, and he replied that he had never seen the indictment, or heard it read. The judge said he was a good juror, and desired he might be sworn. Mr. Hay requested that the indictment be read to the juror, that he might be thereby enabled to say whether he had formed and delivered an opinion on the indictment. The judge replied that he had already indulged the counsel as much as he could, and they ought to be satisfied; he refused to let the indictment be read to the juror. The clerk then called the jury and swore them, till he came to John Basset, who in reply to the previous question said, he never had seen the indictment or heard it read. But Mr. Basset seemed to have considerable scruple at serving, and said he had formed and delivered an opinion that the book called "The Prospect Before Us," came within the sedition law. Judge Chase, however, said he was a good juror, and he was sworn and served as such. The witnesses on the part of the prosecution were called and sworn, and, among others, Mr. Rind was examined to prove the publication of "The Prospect Before Us." Mr. Hay observed that no witness who was any way concerned in the printing of the "Prospect," was bound to criminate himself. Mr. Chase admitted this to be correct, but declared that the witnesses might rest assured that no person would be prosecuted in consequence of any evidence given in the case then before the court. Under these circumstances Mr. Rind proved that he had printed part of the "Prospect" for Callender, and took out of his pocket some of the original sheets from which he had printed parts of the work. Judge Chase himself compared these sheets with the work as published, and they were found to correspond. After the testimony on the part of the prosecution was finished, Col. Taylor of Caroline was called on the part of the traverser, and, after he was sworn, Judge Chase asked with apparent haste and earnestness of manner, what we expected to prove by that witness. We said we expected to prove that Mr. Adams had avowed in the presence of the witness sentiments favorable to monarchy or aristocracy, and that he had voted in the Senate against the sequestration of British debts, and the suspension of commercial intercourse with Great Britain. Judge Chase then said that we must reduce the questions to writing. This I objected to, and stated that it was a thing very unusual in our courts; that it had not been required by the court of the District Attorney, when he examined witnesses against Callender; that it involved a dangerous principle, and was calculated to subject every question of fact to the control of the court; besides, I added, that I did not know the extent to which Col. Taylor's evidence would go; that I wished him to state all he knew, and that very probably the examination would point out new questions proper to be asked. I then stated that if the court insisted on the questions being reduced to writing, I would comply with their direction, but that I hoped it would not be considered as precluding us from asking any additional questions. The questions were then reduced to writing, and are as follow, viz:

1. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams express any sentiments favorable to monarchy or aristocracy, and what were they?
2. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams, while Vice President, express his disapprobation of the funding system?
3. Do you know whether Mr. Adams did not, in the year 1794, vote against the sequestration of British debts, and the suspension of intercourse with Great Britain?

Judge Chase, after examining the questions, declared Col. Taylor's evidence inadmissible. No evidence can be received, said the judge, which does not go to justify the whole charge; the charge is, that the President is a professed aristocrat, and has proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest. Now, you must prove both these points, or you prove nothing, and as your evidence relates to one only, it cannot be received; you must prove all or none. These, I believe, were the precise words of the judge. I think it right here to state that after Mr. Chase had declared Colonel Taylor's evidence inadmissible, he said to the District Attorney, that although the questions were improper, he wished the attorney would consent to let them be asked of the witness. The attorney said, he could not consent. The evidence of Colonel Taylor being excluded, the attorney for the United States addressed the jury, and commented at considerable length on the indictment. After that, Mr. Wirt addressed the jury for the defendant. He premised that the counsel for the traverser were placed in a very embarrassed situation; that the prisoner during the same term was presented, indicted, arrested, arraigned, tried; and that this precipitation precluded the possibility of obtaining witnesses or making the necessary preparations for arguing a cause of so much magnitude. Here Judge Chase interrupted Mr. Wirt, and told him, that he would not suffer anything to be said which reflected on the court. Mr. Wirt said he did not mean to reflect on the court; his object was only to apologize to the jury for the lameness of the defence. Mr. Chase replied that his apology contained the very reflection he disclaimed, and desired him to go on with the cause. Mr. Wirt then said, that an act of Assembly had adopted the common law of England as a part of the laws of Virginia; that an act of Congress had directed the United States courts sitting in Virginia to conform to the laws of the State in which such court might happen to sit; that by the common law the jury had a right to decide on the law as well as the fact. He then said, that if the jury upon inquiry should find the sedition law unconstitutional, they would not consider it as law, and if they did, they would violate their oaths. Here Mr. Chase said to Mr. Wirt, sit down sir. Mr. Wirt endeavored to explain, and said I am going on, sir, to—No, sir, said Mr. Chase, you are not going on; I am going on. Judge Chase then read from a paper, which he held in his hand an instruction to the counsel that they should not address the jury on the constitutionality of the act of Congress, but that arguments might be addressed to the court to prove the right of the jury to consider the constitutionality. Mr. Wirt then addressed the court. He said he had not considered the case elaborately; that it appeared to him so clearly that the jury had the right contended for, that he did not imagine it required any great research to prove it. He then proceeded to state that it was certainly the right of the jury to consider of and determine both law and fact. Mr. Chase here remarked that Mr. Wirt need not give himself trouble on that point; we all know, said he, that the jury have a right to decide the law. Mr. Wirt then said that he supposed it equally clear that the Constitution is the law. Yes, sir, said Mr. Chase, the supreme law. If then, said Mr. Wirt, the jury have a right to decide on the law, and if the Constitution is law, it follows syllogistically that they have a right to decide on the constitutionality of the law in question. A non sequitur, sir, said Judge Chase. Here Mr. Wirt sat down.

Trial of Judge Chase.

I followed Mr. Wirt, and spoke concisely to prove the right of the jury to decide on the constitutionality of the sedition act. I believe I was not interrupted.

Mr. Hay followed on the same side, and in the course of the discussion laid down the position that the jury had a right to decide the law as well as the fact. Mr. Chase interrupted him to ask whether he meant to extend his position to civil as well as criminal cases; for if you do, sir, said the judge, you are wrong; it is not law. Mr. Hay said he believed the position to be universally true, but it was sufficient for his purpose if it was true in criminal cases. Mr. Hay proceeded a very little way further before he was again interrupted by Judge Chase. Mr. Hay, who had been during the cause frequently interrupted, then folded up his papers and appeared to be retiring from the bar. Mr. Chase, addressing him, said, go on sir. No sir, said Mr. Hay, I will not go on. What, sir, said Mr. Chase, will not you proceed with your cause? No, sir, said Mr. Hay; my mind is made up, and I will not proceed. The judge told Mr. Hay he need not be captious. Mr. Hay replied, he was not captious. The judge said, go on, sir; proceed, and you shall not again be interrupted; you may say what you please.

Mr. Hay, Mr. Wirt, and myself left the bar at the same moment, and I cannot state what happened after with any degree of certainty. Callender was however convicted.

Mr. Randolph. When you observed to the court, at the time you were directed to reduce your questions to writing, that the attorney for the United States had not been required to do the same, was there any reply made by Judge Chase?

Mr. Nicholas. It was, I believe, stated by Judge Chase, that the attorney for the United States had, at the opening, stated what he expected to prove by his witnesses.

Mr. Randolph. Did you hear any offer made by the court to postpone the trial of Callender for a month?

Mr. Nicholas. No, sir, I did not hear such an offer, and I never heard it suggested until within a week or two, that such an offer was alleged to have been made. If such an offer had been made, I am sure we should have accepted it, as I know very well that a postponement would have been the most acceptable thing to us, except a continuance until the next term.

Mr. Randolph. Did the opinion of the court appear to be given after consulting with the district judge?

Mr. Nicholas. I never saw Judge Chase consult Judge Griffin but once, and that was after he had declared Col. Taylor's evidence inadmissible. He turned to Judge Griffin, and asked whether his brother Judge agreed with him, to which Judge Griffin assented.

Mr. Randolph. Did Judge Chase make use of any rude, unusual, and contemptuous expressions to the counsel, and what were they?

Mr. Nicholas. I recollect when he overruled Col. Taylor's evidence, he said, my country has made me a judge, and it is my duty to pronounce the law; the evidence of the witness is inadmissible; the counsel for the traverser know it to be so, but they wish to deceive and mislead the populace. I take the responsibility of this decision on myself, and say the evidence cannot be received.

At another time Mr. Chase told the counsel that they had all along mistaken this business, and kept pressing their mistakes on the court; and said repeatedly that what we urged as law we knew not to be law. Many remarks of a similar nature were made, and in many instances the judge seemed to endeavor to throw ridicule on the counsel. When Mr. Hay was endeavoring to prove that the declaration in the indictment, that the libel was of the tenor and effect following, held the prosecutor to a strict and literal recital, Mr. Chase said that it was not law; the counsel have contended, said he, that the recital ought to have been verbatim et literatim; I wonder, continued he, they have not contended for punctuatim also. In another instance, when Mr. Hay was adducing authorities to show that the title of the book ought to have been stated in the indictment, Mr. Chase observed that he knew there were cases in which the title was recited. I remember one, continued he, in the case called the Nun in her Smock; but though it was recited in that case, it was not necessary, nor is it so in any case. It is difficult in language to convey an adequate idea of Mr. Chase's manner; but in these and similar instances, from the sarcastic way in which he expressed himself, it was evidently his intention to throw ridicule on the counsel.

Mr. Randolph. You say that on the rejection of Col. Taylor's evidence, Judge Griffin was consulted by Judge Chase; was he consulted before, or after the opinion of the court was pronounced?

Mr. Nicholas. It was after.

Mr. Randolph. In speaking of the District Attorney, who, he said, had in opening the case stated the purpose for which he meant to introduce the witnesses, do you recollect that he said we were not bound to do this, and by the word "we," identifying himself with the public prosecutor?

Mr. Nicholas. I recollect that Judge Chase, in the course of the trial, used the term we in the manner alluded to; but I do not recollect with certainty in what part of the trial it was.

Mr. Randolph. Were you attorney general of the State of Virginia at that time?

Mr. Nicholas. I was, sir.

Mr. Randolph. Did Judge Chase apply the epithet young men, or young gentlemen, to you and the other counsel for the traverser?

Mr. Nicholas. I do not perfectly recollect whether he said young men or young gentlemen. I believe the latter, and as applied to me, it was true, for I was then a very young man.

Mr. Randolph. Is it the practice in Virginia to issue a capias to take the body of the party on presentments for misdemeanors at the term when the presentment is made, or the indictment found?

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Nicholas. By our act of Assembly the proceedings on an indictment or information for a misdemeanor, is by summons returnable to the next term, and if the summons is returned executed, and the party does not appear, a capias is awarded returnable to the succeeding term. If the party comes in and pleads, the plea is received, and the cause stands over to the next term.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever know the party in such case ruled to trial the same term the presentment was made?

Mr. Nicholas. Never.

Mr. Randolph. Did the counsel for the traveller refer to the act of Assembly, by which a summons is declared to be the proper process?

Mr. Nicholas. Mr. Hay mentioned it in his argument for a continuance; he said that as the laws of Virginia pointed out a summons as the proper process, and there was no act of Congress directing a different procedure, he thought the United States courts should allow the same time which the State laws did.

Mr. Harper. When you say that Mr. Hay referred to the law in question, do you mean he cited the particular act of Assembly?

Mr. Nicholas. No, sir, he referred generally to the Virginia laws, and said such was the process pointed out by them.

Mr. Harper. You said that the term we was used by Mr. Chase; how did you understand him to apply the expression?

Mr. Nicholas. I thought he identified himself with the prosecution.

Mr. Harper. In what part of the trial did this take place?

Mr. Nicholas. I do not particularly recollect, but I am sure he used the term we in the sense stated.

Mr. Harper. Is it unusual to give testimony by a person concerned in the commission of the offence for which another is indicted, and do you not as Attorney General of Virginia consider it your duty to promise a witness in such case that he shall not be prosecuted for anything he may then testify?

Mr. Nicholas. No case has occurred since I have been in office in which such promise was made.

Mr. Harper. Are you correct, sir; do you particularly remember whether you was Attorney General of Virginia at the time of the trial?

Mr. Nicholas. I certainly was; I had been a short time before the trial appointed by the Executive, subject to the approbation or rejection of the next Legislature.

Mr. Nicholson. You say the counsel were frequently interrupted, pray how frequently?

Mr. Nicholas. The counsel were frequently interrupted during the trial; and as a general character of the trial, I can say that, on most of the points which were made, not many sentences were uttered by the counsel at a time without interruption.

The President. Were you present when the process was issued against Callender?

Mr. Nicholas. I believe process was awarded whilst the court was sitting, but my impression at the time was that it was a bench warrant.

The President. Was anything said in court against its being issued?

Mr. Nicholas. There was not.

The President. By whom was the process made out?

Mr. Nicholas. I do not positively know. I suppose it was made out by the clerk, but whether by the particular direction of the court, or under an idea that it was, of course, I do not know.

John Thomson Mason, sworn.

Mr. Randolph. It has been contended on the part of the respondent, that the quo animo determines the guilt or innocence of an action; now, if the quo animo with which he went down to Richmond to execute the seditious law, can be shown, it will have an important bearing on his conduct. I wish, therefore, to ask the witness this question: Did you ever hear Judge Chase, previous to the trial of Callender, utter any expression, and, if any, what was it, on the subject of Callender's prosecution, or respecting the book called "The Prospect Before Us;" did he say that the counsel of the Virginia bar were afraid to press the execution of any law, and particularly the seditious law; did he say that he had a copy of that book, or what did he say? State the circumstances particularly.

Mr. Mason. The question refers to circumstances of which I have but an indistinct recollection, and which happened in a way which renders it extremely unpleasant on my part to relate them. Judge Chase presided in the circuit court held at Annapolis in the Spring of the year 1800; during the term a man by the name of Saunders was tried for larceny, and found guilty. After sentence was passed upon him, he was taken out of court to receive it. The press of the people being very great, the judges and myself were detained within the room. Judge Winchester, Judge Chase, and myself had a conversation, altogether of a jocular complexion. I think it was just after he delivered his valedictory, but how to connect the circumstances at this time, I do not know. I remember, however, that he asked me my opinion of the book called "The Prospect Before Us;" I told him I had not seen it, and from the character I had heard of it, I never wished to see it. He told me, in reply, that Mr. Luther Martin had sent a copy to him, and had scored the parts that were libellous, and that he would carry it to Richmond as a proper subject for prosecution. There was a good deal of conversation besides, but I do not recollect it. There was one expression, however, that he used, which just occurs to my memory, and which I will repeat, that before he left Richmond, he would teach the people to distinguish between the liberty and the licentiousness of the press. He said that he was as sincere a friend to the liberty, as he was an enemy to the licentiousness of the press. There was a sentiment he expressed, which I cannot undertake to give in his precise words, that if the Commonwealth or its inhabitants were not too depraved to furnish a jury of good and respectable men, he would certainly punish Callender. I do not precisely recollect the words: I never repeated this conversation before, and seldom or ever, after it occurred, thought of it.

John Heath, sworn.

During the trial of J. T. Callender, I attended at the court in Richmond as one of the bar. I had occasion to apply to the court for an injunction. The motion not having been decided upon, I went round to Crouch's, where Judge Chase lodged, and found him in his chamber alone, in which I thought myself very fortunate. We then talked over the application I had made the day before for an injunction; while talking on it, Mr. David M. Randolph, the then marshal, stepped in with a paper in his hand. The judge accosted him, and asked him what he had in his hand? He said that he had the panel of the petit jury summoned for the trial of Callender. This was after the indictment was found by the grand jury. After Mr. Randolph had mentioned that it was the panel of the petit jury that he had in his hand, Judge Chase immediately replied, have you any of those creatures called Democrats on the panel? Mr. Randolph hesitated a moment, and then said that he had not made any discrimination in summoning the petit jury. Judge Chase said, look it over, sir, and if there are any of that description, strike them off. This is all I know of this affair.

The Court rose at four o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

The Court was opened at half-past two o'clock.

Present: the Managers, attended by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel.

Mr. Randolph. I wish to know whether you ever heard previous to, or during the trial of Callender, any expressions used by the respondent, Judge Chase, manifesting a hostility toward J. T. Callender, and what were those expressions?

Mr. Triplett. I recollect to have had a conversation with Judge Chase on our passage in the stage down to Richmond. A book was handed to me by him, and I was asked if I had read it? I was asked, whether I had seen him, (Callender?) I told him, I had never seen him. There was a story recited about the arrest of Callender by a warrant of a magistrate, under the vagrant act of Virginia; I recollect that the judge's reply was, "it is a pity you have not hanged the rascal."

Mr. Randolph. Was there any other expressions of this nature used, after you got to Richmond?

Mr. Triplett. I did not hear anything particular; but I think the judge did say something about the Government of the United States showing too much lenity towards such renegadoes. I do not recollect any other conversation passing between us at that time, until after the court was sitting, when Judge Chase was the first who informed me of the presentment being made by the grand jury against Callender. At the same time, he informed me that he expected I would have the pleasure of seeing Callender next day before sundown, that the marshal had that day started after him for Petersburg.

Mr. Randolph. We wish you, as well as your memory serves, to state not only the substance, but the exact expressions used by the judge.

Mr. Triplett. I will state them as well as my memory serves me. Some time after this conversation, I met the judge at the place where he boarded; he said that the marshal had returned without Callender, and used this expression, "I am afraid we shall not be able to get the damned rascal at this court."

Mr. Randolph. You say a copy of this book was handed you by Judge Chase. Did you read it, sir?

Mr. Triplett. I read several passages of it.

Mr. Randolph. Were they marked?

Mr. Triplett. I saw several passages marked; but by whom I do not know.

Mr. Randolph. Do you remember any particular passages that were marked?

Mr. Triplett. I do not. I have stated everything I recollect; but if the gentlemen have any questions to ask, I am ready to give them an answer.

Mr. Martin. I will ask how many days you resided at the same house with the judge?

Mr. Triplett. I think, six days.

Mr. Martin. Do you recollect whether my name was not marked on the book which Judge Chase handed to you?

Mr. Triplett. I do not.

Mr. Harper. Can you state the day of the month, or of the week, when the last conversation passed.

Mr. Triplett. I think it was Sunday, but I am not positive. I made no minutes, as I never expected to be called upon to answer inquiries of this kind.

Mr. Harper. How long was it after the first conversation with the judge, when he mentioned that the marshal had gone after Callender?

Mr. Triplett. I do not precisely recollect. It was not, I think, so much as three days. I do not think it was so much as two days; but I cannot be positive, after so great a length of time has elapsed.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect who travelled with you in the stage from Dumfries to Richmond?

Mr. Triplett. I cannot recollect. The stage was much crowded from Dumfries to Fredericksburg; and there was a passenger taken in at Stafford court-house.

Mr. Harper. Well, sir, how was it from Fredericksburg to Richmond?

Mr. Triplett. I do not particularly recollect; but there were passengers repeatedly getting in all the way.

Mr. Harper. Did this conversation take place before you reached Stafford court-house?

Mr. Triplett. It was after.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Harper. Was it between Fredericksburg and Richmond?

Mr. Triplett. Yes, sir.

President. Had you any conversation with Judge Chase previous to this interview?

Mr. Triplett. No, sir.

President. Did you sit together in the stage?

Mr. Triplett. We did the second day, and it was then the conversation passed.

Mr. Hopkinson. When was it, that, for the first time, you mentioned this conversation to anybody?

Mr. Triplett. I do not recollect when I mentioned it the first time; but I remember to have communicated it to General Mason on my return to Dumfries.

Mr. Nicholson. Have you since mentioned it to others?

Mr. Triplett. Frequently.

On the suggestion of Mr. Randolph, that Mr. Triplett had fractured his wrist, from which he apprehended serious consequences, he was dismissed with the consent of the counsel for the respondent, from further attendance on the Court.

At the instance of Mr. Lee, John Heath, examined yesterday, was again called in.

Mr. Lee. You mentioned yesterday that you made two applications for an injunction. Were they made at the judge's chambers, or in court?

Mr. Heath. I mentioned that I made the application to the court, and that it was not then granted. I then stated that I went to the judge's chambers the next day before the court met.

Mr. Lee. Who composed the court when the injunction was moved in the first instance?

Mr. Heath. I think, but I cannot be particular, that Judge Griffin was there. He was, however, there the next day.

Mr. Lee. At what time of the day was it that you went to the judge's chambers respecting your application for the injunction?

Mr. Heath. It was immediately after breakfast. We generally breakfasted early. Immediately after, I waited upon him. I think it was between eight and nine o'clock.

Mr. Lee. What space of time were you there?

Mr. Heath. I do not think I was there quite half an hour.

Mr. Lee. Was the bill read by yourself, or put into the hands of the judge to read it, at the time you made the application at his chambers?

Mr. Heath. I do not recollect to have presented the bill to the judge. I am not positive that I had the bill with me. I called upon him for the purpose of learning the reasons, why he did not grant the application. [Here the witness related some remarks of Judge Chase on the application for an injunction, which were too indistinctly heard to be related.]

Mr. Lee. Who were present at the judge's chambers at the time you state the conversation took place between Judge Chase and Mr. David M. Randolph respecting the panel of the jury?

Mr. Heath. No other person was present but myself. When I came in I found the judge alone, and I thought myself fortunate in so finding him.

We had been in conversation by ourselves for eight or ten minutes before Mr. Randolph came in.

Mr. Lee. Was any one present at the door, or was the door open at the time?

Mr. Heath. I do not recollect that there was; but it appeared to me that as I was going into the house, somebody was coming out; and I found the judge alone, I am positive, when I entered; and we continued alone until Mr. Randolph stepped in. It struck me that there might have been somebody that came in at the main door of the house between the time I was there and Mr. Randolph's coming in; but I am not certain.

Mr. Lee. You say somebody was coming out, when you went into the room. Was it Mr. Randolph?

Mr. Heath. No, sir, I said there might be somebody coming out, but whether out of his chamber, or out of another room, I am not certain; but when I entered his chamber, I found him alone, and I thought myself fortunate in so finding him.

Mr. Lee. On what day of the week was this?

Mr. Heath. I do not recollect.

Mr. Lee. How many days was it after your motion to the court before you went to the judge's chambers?

Mr. Heath. I do not recollect; but I think it was a few days after the bill against Callender had been found, and he had been arrested; but as to days, hours, and minutes, I do not pretend to recollect them.

Mr. Lee. Am I to understand that it was after Callender appeared in court?

Mr. Heath. I do not say so. It was after Callender was brought forward by the marshal, and a true bill found. I think it was immediately after; but I do not recollect whether it was a day or two after.

Mr. Lee. Did you go to Judge Chase's chambers on any business more than that one time?

Mr. Heath. No; I never did more than that one time.

Mr. Chase. It was with the motion?

Mr. Heath. Yes, sir, it was with the motion.

Mr. Randolph. Did you at any, and at what time, mention this circumstance, and to whom did you mention it?

Mr. Heath. As soon as it happened, I considered the conversation improper, and thought I had a right to relate it, as I did not visit Mr. Chase as a friend, but as a judge in his judicial character to perform the duties of his office, and on business which might have been done in open court as well as at his chambers. I mentioned it to Mr. Hugh Holmes, also to Mr. Meriwether Jones.

Mr. Randolph. Do you mean Mr. Holmes, the present Speaker of the House of Delegates of Virginia?

Mr. Heath. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. You state that you mentioned it to Mr. Holmes and Mr. Jones; did you mention it to anybody else?

Mr. Heath. I was so much impressed with it, that I mentioned it to several others.

Mr. Nicholson. Did you say that you made this communication to those gentlemen immediately after the conversation occurred?

Mr. Heath. On the very day, and within an hour afterwards; and I have since mentioned it frequently to others—I never kept it a secret.

Mr. Hopkinson. Was this conversation on the day of the trial of Callender, or how many days before?

Mr. Heath. I do not recollect whether Callender was tried that day; I mentioned yesterday that I did not attend the trial.

Question. Did you make your motion at the same term that Callender was tried?

Mr. Heath. Yes, sir—There were intervals in which motions were made by counsel. During one of these intervals I made my motion for an injunction. Callender had not then been tried; I do not know that when I made the motion the marshal had returned with Callender, but I made it the day before I went to the judge's chambers.

Mr. Nicholson. Was the conversation before the impanelling of the jury in the case of Callender?

Mr. Heath. Yes, sir—The marshal came in during the time I was in conversation with the judge, it appeared to me, to show the judge what kind of a panel he had.

At the request of Mr. Harper, and with the consent of the managers, John Basset, a witness on the part of Judge Chase, was sworn and examined, in consequence of the peculiar situation of his family requiring his immediate return home.

Mr. Harper. Relate the circumstances that took place relative to your being sworn on the jury, on the trial of Callender, and what the application to the court was on your behalf?

Mr. Basset. The circuit court of the United States at which James T. Callender was presented and indicted for a libel, was held on Monday the second or third of June. I left home in the morning and arrived in Richmond as early as might be expected. On my arrival I saw David M. Randolph, who was standing at a corner of a street; perceiving me, he came towards me; before I alighted from my horse, he informed me that I had been summoned as a grand juror, and that for not appearing, had been crossed, that it was my duty to go to the court and justify myself for my absence; that he summoned me on the petit jury for the trial of Callender, and that my serving in that capacity would be an apology for my previous absence. I presented myself to the court, but the trial did not come on that day. The second day I attended also. I knew very well that the law under which the traverser was to be tried, was odious to my fellow-citizens; I knew it was conceived to be a great oppression to the liberty of the subject, and I believed that great umbrage would be given to the mass of the people by those who should undertake to execute that law. I was weak or wicked enough to be among that class of people called federalists, and I did believe that the law [sedition law] was Constitutional. I felt myself bound when called on to be a jurymen, to make a declaration of my political sentiments. I made this declaration to relieve the impression on my own mind, and not in order that it should be considered that I declined, in consequence of my political opinions, to serve on Callender's trial, or in any other case. I thought it possible that I might be excused; but if I were found by the court to stand in a proper relation between my country and the traverser, I would cheerfully serve. My object was to justify my own conduct to myself, and to the whole world. I made use of these expressions, and I believe I repeat the very words, but I am well assured that I shall express the force and efficacy of what I said. I declared to the judge that my politics were federal; that I had never seen the book called the Prospect Before Us, but I had seen in a newspaper some extracts from it; that if the extracts were correctly taken from the book, and if the traverser was the author or publisher of that work, it appeared to me that it was a seditious act; that I had formed and expressed an unequivocal opinion, that the book was a seditious act; that I had never formed an opinion in respect to the indictment, for I had neither seen it nor heard it read. The court considered me a good juror, and I was sworn accordingly. After the trial had been gone through, the jury retired to their room. I informed the jury that I thought we should have the book read through.

The President here stopped the witness, and informed him that it was useless waste of time to relate what took place in the room of the jury.

The witness, however, continuing the statement he had previously begun, the President desired him to go on, if it were necessary for the purpose of connecting the testimony he had to give; but to pass over what occurred among the jury as briefly as possible.

Mr. Basset. I told the jury that I thought the book should be read. The jury did not at first agree, but the greater part of it was afterwards read. In respect to the general progress, I will state one point that makes a great impression on my mind; I do not pretend, however, to a superior recollection, especially after a lapse of five years, during which I never dreamt it would be the subject of discussion; but I will give my impressions. The judge, addressing the counsel for the traverser, said, when my country invested me with my sacred office, it placed me under an obligation to administer justice according to law; this I am determined to do, and I have done it. I have decided what the law is, but this decision is not conclusive against the traverser. If any exceptions are made by his counsel to my decision, they may be reduced to writing, and if I have committed errors, a superior tribunal shall correct them.

Mr. Randolph. You stated that you had read extracts from the Prospect Before Us in newspapers, before you were impanelled on the jury, which impressed you with the opinion that it was a seditious publication. After reading over the book, did it appear to you to answer that description.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Basset. I thought it was more libellous than the extracts I had seen.

Mr. Randolph. The extracts and the book did not then correspond.

Mr. Basset. I cannot say. I could not say the extracts were the same with what I read in the book; I only recollect that my impression was, they were the same. I could not then, nor can I now say they were conformable to the book, but my impression is, that they were the same in substance.

Mr. Harper. Did you mean to say that the contents of the book were more libellous than the extracts?

Mr. Basset. I meant to say, that after I had read the book, my impressions were that it was more libellous than I conceived it to be when I read the extracts.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect at what time you arrived in town?

Mr. Basset. I cannot recollect, but I believe soon after the court met: that morning I rose early and rode twenty-two miles, about four hours riding.

Mr. Nicholson. Was the book given by the court to the jury?

Mr. Basset. I understood that it was delivered by the court to the jury for their inspection, and to compare the extracts from the book, and see whether they were correctly taken, but I do not recollect that the judge particularly called our attention to the book, and directed us what was to be done with it; but my recollection is that the book was delivered to us.

Mr. Rodney. Was the indictment read after all the jury were sworn?

Mr. Basset. I do not recollect that the indictment was read till after the jury was sworn.

Mr. Rodney. Had the book given to the jury any passages scored?

Mr. Basset. I think it had.

Mr. Rodney. Do you know whether the passages marked formed any part of the indictment?

Mr. Basset. I cannot say that I recollect.

Mr. Campbell. When you were sworn did you understand that the charges in the indictment were taken from the book called the Prospect Before Us?

Mr. Basset. It was subject of general notoriety, that the indictment was drawn from the Prospect Before Us.

Mr. Campbell. What authority had you for supposing that the extracts you had read were taken from the Prospect Before Us?

Mr. Basset. I had no authority but the newspapers, they purported that the extracts were taken from the book called the Prospect Before Us.

Mr. Randolph. Have you any reason to believe that the extracts in the newspapers were not taken from the book?

Mr. Basset. I firmly believe they were taken from it.

Mr. Hopkinson. Was the book which you took out that which was given in evidence during the trial?

Mr. Basset. Whether it was the book which was furnished by the prosecutor and handed to us by the agent of the court, I cannot tell.

Mr. Hopkinson. At what hour did the court meet?

Mr. Basset. I believe about ten o'clock.

The President. I understand you as saying that you never saw the book, until you saw it in court?

Mr. Basset. I am firmly and fully so impressed. The President. When you were questioned as a juror, I understand you to have said, that if the extracts you had read were correctly given, the matter was libellous; did you say that you had formed an opinion?

Mr. Basset. No, sir, nor that I had delivered an opinion, but I said that if the traverser was the author of those extracts, he was guilty of a breach of the sedition law. I repeat every expression that is now remaining on my memory. I answered so far as to the fact. The inquiries extended no farther than to making up my opinion on the extracts contained in the newspapers. It had no connexion whatever with the book. I do not think that I stated to the court that I had expressed an opinion.

Mr. Harper. Did you make an application to the court to be excused, or did your observations arise from motives of delicacy?

Mr. Basset. If my memory does not fail me I did not solicit the judge to excuse me; the office of a juror is no doubt always an unpleasant one, but when I am called upon to perform a duty, I do not shrink from the task. I had some doubts whether my mind was in a proper state to pass between my country and the traverser. It was to remove these doubts that I made the declaration, and for no other purpose.

Mr. Lee. On what day of the week was Calender tried?

Mr. Basset. I arrived about ten o'clock on Monday, and, the next day, the jury were sworn at the usual time.

Mr. Bayard. What was the general deportment of the judge to the counsel, and of the counsel to the court?

Mr. Basset. The different coloring through which the samethings are seen makes some men see things differently from others. My own opinion is that the judge conducted himself with decision unmixed with severity, and that he was witty without being sarcastic. It was my impression that the judge wished the prisoner to have a full hearing, that he might be acquitted, if innocent, and found guilty, if really guilty. It appeared to me that the sole point on which the counsel hoped to save their client was by proving the unconstitutionality of the sedition law, and it appeared to me that they could not form a reasonable expectation of acquitting him on any other ground. I believe his counsel believed the law unconstitutional, and thought they had eloquence and argument enough to convince the jury of it. I believe they thought the judge deprived them of their right to address the jury on that point; and that having the cause very much at heart, they were vastly mortified that the court did not permit them to take the course they wished. They appeared to consider themselves as advocating the cause of an oppressed citizen, and they felt hurt at not being allowed the mode of defence which in their opinion the law authorized. In all their arguments they travelled but little way before they came to the point that went to prove the law unconstitutional, and the judge declared, at every such time, that they had no right to address the jury on that point; that the Constitution had made the court the sole judges of the law as far as it respected its constitutionality. From these circumstances, it is my impression that the altercation between the bar and the court arose solely from the sensibility of the counsel to this particular subject, and from being deprived, as they supposed, of their rights.

The President. What were the particular causes of irritation between the judge and the counsel?

Mr. Basset. I have stated what I considered the causes. They arose from the counsel adverting to that particular point, and their so frequently doing it occasioned the judge to elevate his voice, and to pronounce over and over again what he conceived to be the law.

Mr. Rodney. Was the question put by the court, whether you had formed and delivered an opinion on the charges contained in the indictment?

Mr. Basset. My memory on the particular form of the question is imperfect, but I will state my idea of it. I at first thought the question had been put in the disjunctive, or—but I am now persuaded that I was mistaken; so many gentlemen concurring in recollecting that the word and was used, I must believe I was mistaken.

Mr. Rodney. When the question was put, did you not say that you had formed an opinion on the extracts, and did you not express the very opinion which you had formed?

Mr. Basset. I did, and I said that if the book answered to the extracts, I had formed an unequivocal opinion that it was libellous.

Mr. Rodney. And this before you were sworn?

Mr. Basset. Yes, sir.

The witness was then, from the peculiar circumstances already stated, excused with the consent of the parties from any further attendance on the court; the President observing that although the indulgence was granted in this instance, he hoped it would not be made a precedent for a general practice.

The Court rose at four o'clock.

THURSDAY, February 14.

The Court was opened at twelve o'clock.

Present: the Managers, attended by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel,

On the request of Mr. Harper, and with the consent of the Managers, Edmund Randolph, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was sworn.

Mr. Hopkinson. Were you present at the trial of Callender?

Mr. Randolph. I was present during a short part of the time.

Mr. Harper. What was the general conduct and demeanor of the court towards the counsel? Was it harsh, rough, and irritating; or was it mild and facetious?

Mr. J. Randolph. I wish to submit to the Court, whether it is proper to put this question in the form proposed. I wish the witness may, in stating the conduct of the court, confine himself to specific facts, as much as possible.

Mr. Harper. The general conduct of the court is a matter of fact, and the particular acts of the court go to show what that was.

The President here desired the answer to be reduced to writing, when Mr. Harper said that he had no objection to withdrawing the question—Mr. J. Randolph, however, waiving any objection to it, the President desired Mr. Randolph to proceed.

Mr. Randolph. The answer I have to make is very short. Having been absent the greater part of the time, I do not consider myself competent to say what the general conduct of the court was. I recollect that shortly after the trial commenced, I came into court, and sat very near the bench on which the judges sat. I continued there for some time, while a portion of the very lengthy indictment was reading. I then went out, and returned to my own house, where I continued until the time when I supposed the reading of the indictment would be finished. Just on my entrance into the lobby of the court, I saw the counsel for the traverser folding up their papers, and retiring from the bar.

Mr. Harper. Were you in court during the time when the previous motions were made?

Mr. Randolph. Shortly after the indictment was found against Callender, I was in court. The only incident which I recollect to have taken place at that time, was seeing the clerk or the attorney of the district hand up to Judge Chase a paper, about which I made inquiry of somebody near me, and learnt that it was a warrant for process for apprehending Callender. This is all I recollect previous to the arrest of Callender. When Callender was brought into the court, I stood outside of the crowd, at some distance from the court. I heard a great deal said, but I do not recollect what I did hear. I am therefore satisfied that I am incapable of giving a connected statement of what passed at that time. On the succeeding day the trial commenced; but I was not present when the motion was made for a continuance. I have stated already how far I was a witness from that time to the conclusion of the trial.*

Mr. Harper. What was the demeanor of the court when you saw the counsel folding up their papers?

Mr. Randolph. I do not recollect any specific facts.

Mr. Harper. What was their general demeanor during the trial?

* The introduction of Mr. Randolph's testimony was delivered in so low a voice as not to be heard by the reporter. But it is understood that, in the part not heard, nothing relevant to the charges in the articles of impeachment, was said.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Randolph. From the causes I have stated, I am not able to answer this question.

Mr. Harper. Have you no general impression?

Mr. Randolph. I cannot say I have.

Mr. Harper. Was there anything which struck you as remarkable, improper, or otherwise?

Mr. Randolph. I have no hesitation in saying that I saw nothing which conveyed the idea of corruption.

Mr. Harper. What do you mean by corruption?

Mr. Randolph. I mean an evil intention to oppress the traverser. I speak only of those parts of the trial which I witnessed myself, and I must be understood as knowing little of what passed from my own observation.

Mr. Harper. You say you perceived no evil intent to oppress the traverser?

Mr. Randolph. I had no idea of the sort.

Mr. Lee. Do you recollect nothing that was said by the court to the counsel, when they were putting up their papers and retiring?

Mr. Randolph. No, sir; I was at a considerable distance—at the door of the lobby at the time. I have no further answers to make to the questions proposed; I do not think it incumbent on me to relate matters that are irrelevant, or to go into conjectures.

Mr. Harper. We are ready to hear anything from a gentleman so well skilled—

Mr. Randolph. The reason of my remark is, my having understood that I was summoned in relation to opinions delivered by me at the time of the trial.

Mr. Harper. We are sensible that we cannot require them.

Mr. Randolph was, by consent of both parties, excused from further attendance as a witness.

George Read, sworn.

Mr. Randolph. The witness will please to state what he knows in relation to certain proceedings at a circuit court of the United States, held at Newcastle, in the State of Delaware, in the month of June, 1800.

Mr. Read. It is incumbent on me to state that several years have elapsed since the transactions which I am now about to relate occurred; of course I cannot pretend to say that the language I shall use to convey the sentiments delivered by Mr. Chase is precisely according to what occurred at the time; but the substance of what I relate will be correct. The transactions to which I presume I am called to testify took place at a session of the circuit court, held at Newcastle, for Delaware district, in June, 1800. The court sat two days, viz: on the 27th and 28th days of the month. At that court, Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices, presided, and Gunning Bedford, district judge, was associated with him. Judge Chase, as usual, delivered a charge to the grand jury, on the first day of the term. The grand jury, after hearing the charge, retired to their chamber; after remaining there for some time, they returned into court, and on being asked whether they had found any bills, or had any presentments to make, they answered they had found no bills of indictment, and had no presentments to make. After receiving this answer, Judge Chase proceeded to observe, as nearly as I can recollect, addressing himself to the grand jury, that he had been informed, or heard, that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware among a certain class of people, especially in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order; that the name of this printer was —; the judge here paused, and said, perhaps it might be assuming, or taking upon himself too much to mention the name of this person; but, gentlemen, it becomes your special duty, and you must inquire diligently into this matter. Several of the jurors, I believe, made a request to the court to dismiss them, and assigned as the reasons for their request, that some of them were farmers, and, as it was about the time of harvest, they were anxious to be on their farms. The judge observed that the business to which he had called their attention was of a very urgent and pressing nature, and must be attended to; that he could not, therefore, discharge them before the next day, when further information should be communicated to them on the subject he had referred to. The judge then addressing himself to me as the District Attorney, asked me, as I believe is usual on such occasions, whether I had any criminal charges to submit to the grand jury? I said that none such had yet occurred, and I believed none were likely to occur during that term. Judge Chase, continuing his address to me, observed, you might, by prosecuting proper researches, make some discoveries. Have you not heard of some persons in this State who have been guilty of libelling the Government, or the administration of the Government of the United States? I am told, and the general circulation of the report induces me to believe it, that there is a certain printer in the town of Wilmington who publishes a most scandalous newspaper; but it will not do to mention names. Have you not two printers in that town? I answered that I believed there were. Judge Chase observed, that one of them was a seditious printer, adding, he shall be taken notice of, and it is your duty, Mr. Attorney, to examine unremittingly and minutely into affairs of that nature; times like these require that this seditious temper or spirit, which pervades too many of our presses, should be discouraged or repressed. Can you not find a file of these newspapers between this time and to-morrow morning, and examine them, and discover whether this printer is not guilty of libelling the Government of the United States? This, I say, sir, must be done; I think it is your duty. I observed, as this subject was pressed by the honorable judge, I believed I was acquainted with the duties of my office, and was willing to discharge them. I mentioned that I had not in my possession the papers alluded to by the judge, nor had read them; but that if a file of them were procured and handed to me, I had no objection to examine them, and communicate with the grand jury on the subject.

Trial of Judge Chase.

The judge then said he was satisfied, and, turning to the jury, observed, that he could not discharge them, however inconvenient their stay; they must attend the ensuing day, at the usual hour. The judge then directed that a file of the papers should be procured for me. I understood him to mean the paper called the Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser, though I do not recollect to have heard the title of the paper mentioned during the proceedings. A file of those papers was brought to me in the afternoon, after the adjournment of the court; by whom they were brought I do not recollect. I examined them, but in a very cursory manner, as I was very much interrupted by persons calling upon me. I did not discover during the course of this examination, any libellous matter coming within the provisions of the sedition act.

According to what I understood to be the wish of the judge, I sent this file of papers to the grand jury. Soon after the meeting of the court on the second day, and at the request of the grand jury, I attended them in their room. On entering, the foreman of the jury addressed me, and directed my attention to a paragraph in a publication contained in the Mirror of the Times of the 21st June, 1800, republished from the Aurora, reflecting, perhaps in strong and pointed language, on the former conduct of Judge Chase. He observed that there was a difference of opinion among the jurors as to the nature of the paragraph—some doubted whether it was a libel or not, and, if libellous, whether they had a right to present it to the circuit court. I observed that it was not necessary for me to be very particular in my opinion of the publication, as I did not consider it as coming under the sedition law, though it might be considered as an offence at common law, because Judge Chase had decided that the circuit court could not take cognizance of cases arising at common law. I returned into court. After some time, the file was placed before the judge. Judge Chase asked me what had been done, and whether the grand jury had made any discoveries of libellous matter? I answered none, unless it were the paragraph which related to Judge Chase, which I showed him, observing that it did not appear to me to come under the sedition law. Judge Chase acquiesced, and the business passed over on his part in a very polite and affable manner. I do not recollect anything further to have passed. I have, however, an indistinct recollection of a conversation between Judge Chase and myself, in the room of a tavern, before we went into court, in which I understood him to have made a general declaration of hostility against seditious printers.

Mr. Randolph. You said the judge gave orders to somebody to procure a file of newspapers. Do you recollect to whom he addressed himself?

Mr. Read. I do not; but I understood to the bailiff or marshal, or some other officer.

Mr. Rodney. Please relate to the court the occurrences which took place at a circuit court of the United States at Newcastle, and whether you were summoned as a grand juror at that court.

Mr. Lea. I was summoned by the marshal of the district of Delaware as a grand juror at the circuit court held in the month of June, 1800. I attended agreeably to that summons, and was qualified as a juror. After receiving a charge from Judge Chase, we retired into our room, and remained there for some time. There appearing to be no business for us, we returned into our box. The usual question was put to us, whether we had found any bills? We said that we had not. After some time, Judge Chase addressed the grand jury, and observed that a very seditious disposition had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, in the county of Newcastle, and particularly in the town of Wilmington; that a seditious printer lived in that place, who edited a paper called the Mirror of the Times and the General Advertiser, who was in the habit of libelling the Government of the United State, and that his name was—, he said he would not mention his name, but that it was our duty to inquire if any seditious publications had been made; that he would not discharge us that day, nor until we had made the inquiry. Several of the jurors addressed the judge for leave to return home, stating that they were farmers, and were extremely anxious to be on their farms, as it was harvest time. Some conversation passed between Judge Chase and the Attorney for the District, after which he said he would not discharge us until the next day. We returned the next day into court, and after sitting some time in our box, we retired to the jury room. A file of newspapers was produced by some persons, and we examined them. We found nothing in them of a libellous nature, in our opinion, excepting something relative to Judge Chase, which some of the jury thought came under the sedition law. We sent for the Attorney of the District to inform us as to the nature of the paragraph. He told us it did not come under the sedition law. We went into the jury box, when a conversation of some length took place between Judge Chase and the Attorney of the District, after which we were discharged.

Mr. Martin. What time did you come down on the first day?

Mr. Lea. We were up a very short time—perhaps an hour.

Mr. Martin. What time the second day?

Mr. Lea. A good while.

Mr. Martin. What time is the harvest in Delaware?

Mr. Lea. It was the time of hay-harvest.

Mr. Randolph. I will ask you whether you recollect the judge to have quoted the title of the paper?

Mr. Lea. I recollect that he did.

Mr. Randolph. Was it the same paper that was sent you by the attorney?

Mr. Lea. It was.

John Crow, sworn.

Mr. Rodney. Please to state what occurred in the circuit court held at Newcastle.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Crow. I was not in the court-house the first day. On the second day, I went into court just after it was opened. I recollect there was some conversation that took place between Judge Chase and the district attorney. The judge asked the attorney of the district if there were any presentments likely to be made that day. The attorney answered, there were none; that, on examining the file of newspapers, there was nothing found rebellious, unless it were some strictures on the judge himself. If that is all, the judge replied, we will take no notice of it. I recollect nothing further. The judge shortly after discharged the grand jury.

John Montgomery, sworn.

Mr. Randolph. The subject on which it is understood you are capable of giving some information to the court is the conduct of Judge Chase, at a circuit court of the United States held for the district of Maryland at Baltimore in May 1803, or about that time.

Mr. Montgomery. The point, I presume, on which I am called to give testimony, relates to a charge to a grand jury delivered by Judge Chase, at a circuit court where he presided, and Judge Winchester was associated with him. It will not, from the nature of the subject, be expected that I shall be able to detail, in the precise language of the judge, the whole of the charge which was delivered in 1803 at the May term. Though not one of the bar, I was present at the court, and took a chair among the gentlemen of the bar. After the grand jury were impanelled, Judge Chase addressed them. He appeared to address them from a written paper that lay before him. He proceeded in the usual manner to charge the jury as to the duties expected to be performed by them. After he had thus far proceeded in his charge, he mentioned, that before the jury retired to their chamber, he would make some observations, and that they would be considered as flowing from a wish for the happiness or welfare of the community. He stated that it was important that the people should be fully informed, particularly at such a crisis; that falsehood was more easily disseminated than truth; and that the latter was reluctantly attended to, when opposed to popular prejudice. I cannot pretend to state the sentiments delivered by the judge, in the order in which they were delivered. I can undertake to state, from my recollection, the substance of those he delivered. To the best of my recollection, the judge stated that the Administration was weak, relaxed, and inadequate to the duties devolved on it; and that its acts proceeded not from a view to promote the general happiness, but from a desire for the continuance of unfairly-acquired power. The language unfairly-acquired power made a strong impression on my mind at the time; and when the judge called the attention of the jury to the observations he was about to make, I was prepared to expect something extraordinary from him, as I was at Annapolis when he pronounced the valedictory address which Mr. Mason, in his testimony, took occasion to mention. The judge stated the violation of the Constitution that had taken place by the act of Congress repealing the Judiciary act of 1800, and the consequent removal of sixteen judges; that it had made a violent attack on the independence of the Judiciary. He also found fault with a law passed by the Legislature of Maryland in 1800, the effect of which was the removal of all the judges on the county-court establishment. He stated that those acts were a severe blow against the independence of the Judiciary. He stated, that since the year 1776, he had been an advocate for a representative or republican form of government; that it was his wish that freemen should be governed by representatives chosen by that class of citizens who had a property in, a common interest with, and an attachment to, the community. The language might have been in the words of our constitution. He found fault with the law passed by the Legislature of Maryland, which he styled "The Universal-suffrage Law." He stated that that also affected the independence of the Judiciary, and to the best of my recollection, he explained his ideas in this manner: that every free, white, male citizen, in the language of the Constitution, having the qualification of age and residence, though he had not a property in, an interest with, and an attachment to, the community, being suffered to choose those who constituted the Legislature, and the Judiciary being dependent on the Legislature for their support and continuance in office, few characters of integrity and ability, who are competent to discharge the duties of judges, would be found to accept appointments held by such a tenure. He stated that these measures were destructive of the happiness and welfare of the community; that they would have a tendency to sink our Republican Government into what he called a Mobocracy—the worst of all possible governments. When on the subject of the alteration of the State constitution, he stated that the framers of that constitution were men of ability and patriotism—the names of some of whom were honorably enrolled on the Journals of Congress, and also I think he said, on the Journals of the Convention of Maryland; that he had to observe, that the sons of those characters (which he regretted) were the chief supporters of these destructive measures. He stated that where there were equal laws and equal rights—viz: laws equally administered between the rich and the poor—in that country there was freedom. But where the administration of the laws was partial and uncertain, the people were not free; and he was apprehensive we were fast approaching to that state of things. He stated that there was but one act remaining to be done, (mentioning the act passed by the Legislature of Maryland for the trial of facts, and for abolishing the general and appellate court;) if that should be adopted, the Constitution would not be worthy of further care or preservation. At the close of the judge's charge, he, in an impressive manner, called on the jury to pause, to reflect, and when they returned to their homes, to use their endeavors to prevent these impending evils, and save their country. He said that the people had been misled by misrepresentation, falsehood, art, and cunning; that, by correcting these errors, the threatened evils might be prevented—or words to that effect. With regard to a part of the answer of Judge Chase, which has been published, and which I have read, perhaps it may not be improper for, and may be expected of me, to mention a fact contradictory to what is stated therein. It is stated in the answer, "The next opinion is, that the independence of the judges of the State of Maryland would be entirely destroyed if the bill for abolishing the two supreme courts should be ratified by the next General Assembly. This opinion, however incorrect it may be, seems to have been adopted by the people of Maryland, to whom this argument against the bill in question was addressed; for, at the next session of the Legislature, this bill, which went to change entirely the Constitutional tenure of Judicial office in the State, and to render the subsistence of the judges dependent on the Legislature, and their continuance in office on the Executive, was abandoned by common consent."

Trial of Judge Chase.

It is true it was abandoned by common consent, but not for the reasons assigned by the judge in this part of his answer.

Mr. Nicholson. Was the provision for establishing universal suffrage a part of the constitution at the time Judge Chase delivered the charge?

Mr. Montgomery. It was.

Mr. Randolph. You state that the charge appeared to have been delivered from a written paper which lay before the judge. Do you mean to be understood, that after going through the first part of the charge on the ordinary duties of a grand jury, the latter part appeared to be delivered from a written paper?

Mr. Montgomery. It appeared to me that the latter, as well as the former part, was delivered in the same manner—the judge keeping his eyes on the paper before him.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect whether the very last part of the charge, when he desired the jury to pause and reflect, &c., was delivered from the written paper?

Mr. Montgomery. It appeared to me as if he confined himself throughout to the written paper.

John T. Mason was again called.

Mr. Randolph. You will please to mention such circumstances as came under your observation, at a circuit court of the United States held at Baltimore in May, 1803, in relation to a charge delivered to a grand jury.

Mr. Mason. I was present when such a charge was delivered; I was present when it commenced and continued in court until it ended. I have, however, a very imperfect recollection of the greater part of it, and of a great part of it, perhaps, I have no recollection at all. I had not been in Baltimore for two years previous; the court room was very full; and while I was there a number of persons came up to salute me. I felt no particular interest in it, and I only attended to those parts of the charge, during the delivery of which I was not interrupted by interchanging the civilities of my friends and acquaintance. I do not think I can charge my recollection with more than three great points in the charge; nor am I certain that I can give them in the order in which the judge delivered them. The first contained pretty strong and censoring animadversions on the act of Congress which repealed the law passed in February, 1801, for the new organization of the courts of the United States, by which the sixteen new judges of the circuit court were removed from office. He spoke of it as an event which had wounded the independence of the judiciary, and as calculated to produce great mischief. I do not, however, pretend to give the words, but only to embrace the idea.

With regard to the second point which I recollect, it will perhaps be necessary for me to explain that, according to the provision in the constitution of Maryland for altering that instrument, amendments may be made by a Legislative act passed by two successive Legislatures. Under the constitution, before a late amendment was made, no man was permitted to vote unless possessed of property to the value of thirty pounds. That part of the constitution had been altered by two successive Legislatures by confining the qualifications of voters to age, residence, and color. This amendment Mr. Chase spoke of as one calculated to sap the foundations of Government, as injurious, and as leading to a great many evils.

The third ground arose on this circumstance: An effort had been made to alter the constitution by a considerable change in the judiciary system, and which had so far progressed as to have obtained the sanction of one Legislative vote. He spoke of this as a measure extremely dangerous in its nature, and which, if carried into effect, was calculated to deform and injure one of the most beautiful features of the constitution, and so to affect it as to leave nothing or little in it worth preserving. He concluded his remarks on this point by an earnest recommendation to those persons to whom he addressed himself, to make the necessary exertions to prevent the passage of this act, which would have made it a part of the constitution. There were at least two gentlemen in the room who were members of the Legislature, and whose fathers, as I understood, were members of the convention which formed the constitution of Maryland. Judge Chase observed that it was a matter of peculiar mortification, or concern, to look at, to see, or to know (using some such expression) some gentlemen engaged in thoughtlessly demolishing the fair fabric, which their fathers had toiled with him in erecting.

There is one point of fact in which I differ from the witness last examined. Judge Chase delivered the charge from a written paper which he had before him. He wore his spectacles at the time, and though he turned over leaf by leaf, he occasionally threw up his head, and sometimes raised his spectacles on his forehead, and spoke as if he was making what I considered an enlargement of the original charge, by extemporary observations in addition to what he had written. I cannot charge my memory with anything further.

Trial of Judge Chase.Samuel H. Smith, sworn.

Mr. Nicholson. Please to state what you know of the charge delivered by Judge Chase at Baltimore.

Mr. Smith. The charge of Judge Chase having been published, I did not expect to be called upon to state in detail its general contents; supposing that the only inquiry made would be on the correspondence of my recollection with the contents of the published charge. I do not know that I should be able, under these circumstances, to give a particular statement, from memory, of its contents. On the evening subsequent to the delivery of the charge, I committed to paper the most important features of it, which were published in the National Intelligencer, and which form part of the printed testimony received by the committee of inquiry. If I could be indulged with access to it, I should be enabled to state more correctly my knowledge of the charge.

[Mr. Smith here, with permission, read the following, extracted from the National Intelligencer of May 20, 1803:

"After a definition of the offences cognizable by the grand jury, Judge Chase said he hoped he should be pardoned for making a few additional observations. He had, he remarked, been uniformly attached to a free republican Government, and had actively participated in our Revolutionary struggle to obtain it. He still remained warmly attached to the principles of Government then established. Since that period, however, certain opinions had sprung up which threatened with ruin the fair fabric then raised. It had been contended that all men had equal rights derived from nature, of which society could not rightfully deprive them. This he denied. He could conceive of no rights in a state of nature, which was in fact entirely a creature of the imagination, as there was no condition of man in which he was not, under some modification, subject to a particular leader or particular species of government. True liberty did not, in his opinion, consist in the possession of equal rights, but in the protection by the law of the person and property of every member of society, however various the grade in society he filled. Nor did it consist in the form of government in any country. A monarchy might be free, and a republic in slavery. Wherever the laws protected the person and property of every man, there liberty existed, whatever the government was. Such, said he, is our present situation. But much I fear that soon, very soon, our situation will be changed. The great bulwark of an independent judiciary has been broken down by the Legislature of the United States, and a wound inflicted upon the liberties of the people which nothing but their good sense can cure. Judge Chase here went into an assertion of the right of the judiciary to decide on the constitutionality of laws. He then adverted to the proceedings of the Legislature of Maryland. He commented on the wisdom and patriotism of those who had framed the constitution of that State. That wisdom and patriotism had never conceived liberty to consist in every man possessing equal political rights. To secure property the right of suffrage had been limited. The convention had not imagined, according to the new doctrine, that property would be best protected by those who had themselves no property. The great rampart established in the limitation of suffrage was now demolished by the principle of universal suffrage ingrafted in the constitution. In addition to this, a proposition was now submitted, whose ratification depended upon the next Legislature, and which, if ratified, would destroy the independence and respectability of the judiciary; and make the administration of justice dependent upon Legislative discretion. If this shall, in addition to that which establishes universal suffrage, become part of the constitution, nothing will remain that will be worth protecting. Instead of being ruled by a regular and respectable Government, we shall be governed by an ignorant mobocracy. When he reflected on the ruinous effects of these measures, he could not but blush at the degeneracy of sons, who destroyed the fair fabric raised by the patriotism of their fathers."]

President. Did you hear any reflections cast on the Administration?

Mr. Smith. I do not recollect any other beside those contained in the statement I have read.

I was at Baltimore when the charge was delivered by Judge Chase. My recollection of its contents is extremely vague. But, with regard to some of it, it coincides with that of Mr. Montgomery, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Smith. He spoke of the repeal of the Judiciary law, and said that it was injurious to the independence of the judges. He also mentioned the general suffrage law as injurious; and said no man ought to be permitted to vote unless he had a property in a common interest with, and an attachment to, the community; that the act violated this principle, and would be attended with very injurious consequences; he denied the doctrine of natural rights; and said that they were altogether derived from convention; and at the end of the charge he exhorted the jury to use their efforts to prevent the injury likely to result from the temper of the times. I cannot say whether Judge Chase confined himself to a written paper or not. He declared that the independence of the Judiciary of the United States had been injured by the repeal of the Judiciary system; and that the bill then pending before the Legislature of Maryland, if adopted, would have the same effect upon the Judiciary of that State.

Mr. Nicholson stated, that all the witnesses present on the part of the prosecution had been examined; the managers would therefore proceed to offer certain records; but, as several material witnesses were absent, he hoped they would not be precluded from calling them, should they attend, at a future stage of the trial.

Mr. Randolph offered in evidence a copy of the record in the case of J. T. Callender; also, in the case of Fries.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Randolph then stated that the managers had submitted all the evidence they were prepared to adduce. Whereupon the Court rose.

FRIDAY, February 15.

The Court was opened at 10 A. M.

Present: The Managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole: and Judge Chase attended by his counsel.

The evidence being closed on the part of the prosecution,

Mr. HARPER, of counsel for the respondent, addressed the Court to this effect:

Mr. President: We feel so strong a reliance on the justice, impartiality, and discernment of this honorable Court, that nothing but an anxious regard for the character and feelings of the honorable gentleman who is the object of this prosecution, and a solicitude to remove even the slightest imputation of impropriety or incorrectness that may rest on his conduct, could induce us to occupy any portion of that time which we know to be so precious, by the introduction of testimony on his part. We believe the charges to be utterly unsupported by the testimony adduced on the part of the prosecution; and had we no other object than a mere legal acquittal, we should cheerfully rest the case on that testimony. But we are aware that some parts of the honorable judge's conduct, though not criminal nor punishable by impeachment, may, if left without explanation, appear in an unfavorable light. We are prepared with testimony to give this explanation; to show that, through all the transactions which form the matter of this prosecution, he has been governed by the purest motives, and that whatever errors he may have committed, are trivial in themselves, are imputable to human infirmity alone, and were instantly corrected by himself. This testimony we request the permission of this honorable Court to produce. But a consciousness of the strong ground on which we stand, and a recollection of the very important public business which now presses on the attention of this honorable Court, in its Legislative capacity, have determined us to waive our right to a general opening of our case; and to confine ourselves, in this stage of the cause, to a brief statement of the points to which our testimony will be directed.

On the first article, which relates to the conduct of Judge Chase in the trial of John Fries for treason, we shall produce testimony to show, that the opinion contained in the paper which the judge delivered to the prisoner's counsel was not only legal, but had been twice expressly decided, and once admitted in the same court, and had before that trial been laid down as a general principle of law, in a charge delivered to a grand jury in the same court, by one of Judge Chase's predecessors.

[Here Mr. Harper sat down, while the Committee of the Whole were entering and taking their seats.]

Mr. Harper then rose and proceeded. He stated that the counsel for the respondent had begun to open their defence, and were stating the ground which they should take in opposition to the first article of impeachment. We shall show, said he, by the most indisputable testimony, that the point of law respecting treason in levying war against the United States, which was stated in the paper delivered to the counsel of Fries, had been once informally decided by the same court, in a prior case, and twice after solemn argument and full discussion, and that one of those discussions was made in the case of John Fries himself, on an indictment for the same offence. We shall show that Judge Chase's predecessor had, before counsel was heard and before an indictment was found, delivered the same opinion in a charge to the grand jury. We shall proceed to prove in a more particular manner the contents of the paper thus delivered to the counsel. We shall produce the original paper itself; and shall prove that delivered to the prisoner's counsel to be a true copy of it; and we shall conclude, by showing that when the counsel of Fries had refused to proceed in his defence, and were informed by the judge that they might go on, and conduct the case as they thought proper, he employed no menacing expression, and uttered no such words as "proceed at the hazard of your characters;" but merely informed them that they should be under no other restriction, but that which a regard to their professional character would impose. That, far from threatening, he did all in his power to soothe; and instead of restricting, gave the utmost latitude of indulgence.

Proceeding, then, to the second general head of accusation, the conduct of the respondent relative to the trial of Callender, which furnishes the matter of the second article, and embraces in the whole five articles, we shall show that the copy of the "Prospect Before Us," which the respondent carried with him to Richmond, was marked, not by him, but by another person, without any view to a prosecution of the author, and was given to him by that person without any request, on his part, as a performance which might amuse him on the road.

As to the private conversation at Annapolis, we shall prove that it was a mere jest between the respondent and the gentleman, who, after treasuring it up for five years, has this day brought it forward to support an impeachment; and whose recollection of it we shall show to be far less accurate than ought to be required of a man, who, after so great a lapse of time, adduces a private, confidential, and jocular conversation, to aid a criminal prosecution.

We shall then follow Judge Chase to Richmond, where we shall show that, far from having formed a corrupt determination to oppress Callender, he felt solicitous for the escape of that unfortunate wretch; that, far from entering into a combination with the marshal to pack a jury for the conviction of Callender, Judge Chase expressed a wish that he might be tried by men of that political party whose cause his book was intended to support. We shall prove, by testimony not to be doubted, that no conversation whatever took place between the judge and the marshal, relative to striking any person from the panel, much less such a conversation as has been sworn to by one witness for the prosecution. We shall show that no panel of the jury actually summoned was formed, until the opening of the court on the day when the trial of Callender was to have commenced; that it was completed in open court, and was never seen by the judge. And we shall prove that the marshal, not by the direction of the judge, from whom he was bound to receive no directions on that subject, but with his entire approbation and according to his advice, took the utmost pains to select a jury of the most impartial, considerate, and respectable men; that, in this selection, no attention was paid to party distinctions; and that if no persons of Callender's political opinion actually did serve on the jury, it was because, after being summoned, they made excuses, which were admitted by the court, or refused to attend.

Thus much respecting the conduct of the judge previous to the trial. Proceeding then to the particular matter of the second article, which relates to the supposed rejection of John Basset's application to serve on the jury, we shall prove, more fully than we have already done, that the nature of this application has been wholly misunderstood by the witnesses on the part of the prosecution; that the juror did not offer an excuse, or apply to be discharged, but merely suggested some scruples of delicacy, and was willing to serve if those scruples were not sufficient to constitute a legal disqualification. We shall fully corroborate the testimony which the juror himself has given on this head, and shall show clearly that his scruples were not of such a nature, as to furnish a legal or proper ground of objection to his competence as a juror.

As to the refusal of a continuance, which has been so much relied on as a criminal violation of the law, with intent to oppress the party, we shall prove, that although no legal grounds for a continuance were shown, and it was therefore not in the power of the court to grant it, Judge Chase did offer to postpone the trial for a month or six weeks, in order to accommodate Callender and his counsel, and to enable them to prepare; an offer which they thought proper to reject. And we shall also show, that when this motion for a continuance was made, the law of Virginia, by which it is now contended that the court ought to have been governed, was not cited, nor even mentioned.

With respect to the conduct of Judge Chase towards Callender's counsel, we shall prove that it was free from any appearance of harshness, or desire to intimidate, abash, or oppress: that the irritation which took place proceeded from the counsel themselves, and that the conduct of the court was far more mild and forbearing than from those irritations could have been expected. That every decision on the law was the joint opinion of Judge Chase and his colleague, delivered after consultation between them. That every interruption of the counsel arose from their pertinacity in pressing points which had been decided, and on which propriety and duty required them to be silent; and that after the respondent had delivered the opinion of the court on these points of law he offered to assist the counsel for the traverser in framing a case for the opinion of all the judges of the Supreme Court, and thus to give them an opportunity of correcting any errors which he and his colleague might have committed in those decisions. And finally, we shall produce a witness who, having attended the trial and taken down all the proceedings in short-hand, will lay before this honorable Court an exact detail of all that passed.

Passing then to the matter of the fifth and sixth articles, we shall prove, by a rule solemnly made by the Supreme Court of the United States, that they never considered the State laws as regulating process, by virtue of the act of Congress which is relied on in support of these articles; but merely as governing the decision of rights acquired under them, when such rights come into question in the courts of the United States; that the practice in the courts of Virginia, under the State law in question, has been and is conformable to our construction, and not to that contended for on the other side. And as a proof how little the recollection of men, even the most correct, can be relied on, in cases where their feelings have been strongly excited, we shall produce a record, in which the learned gentleman who, though very young, was Attorney General of Virginia in 1800, and who has delivered his testimony with the greatest candor and propriety, did himself order a capias, on a presentment in a case not capital. We shall produce evidence to prove that the capias is the proper process, in all cases of presentments, except those of petty offences, which are tried by the court, without an indictment, and are punishable by fine only, but not imprisonment. And to remove every possible doubt on this head of accusation, we shall prove that when the presentment against Callender was made, and it became necessary to issue process against him, Judge Chase applied to the District Attorney for information as to what was the proper process, who answered, a capias; and that the capias, which was actually issued, was drawn up by the clerk, inspected and approved by the District Attorney, and issued on his suggestion.

Respecting the transactions at Newcastle, in the State of Delaware, which constitute the matter of the seventh article, we shall prove that those offensive and improper expressions, which are attributed to the respondent, relative to a seditious temper, in the State of Delaware, and, especially in the county of Newcastle and the town of Wilmington, never were uttered by him; that the witnesses who have deposed to those expressions are under a mistake; and that nothing was said or done by Judge Chase on that occasion, but what he has admitted in his answer; but what propriety justifies, and his duty required. To this end we shall offer the testimony of persons who were in a situation to remark every occurrence; to listen to every expression, and on whom such expressions, had they been uttered, could not have failed to make a strong impression. We shall then proceed to the charge delivered to the grand jury at Baltimore, which furnishes the eighth and last ground of accusation; and then we shall prove that the respondent said nothing of a political nature to the jury, except that which he has stated in his answer, and which he hopes to satisfy this honorable Court he had a right to say, however indiscreet or unnecessary the exercise of that right in this instance may have been. We shall produce an host of witnesses to prove that he never uttered such sentiments as are attributed to him by one witness, relative to the present Administration, its character, views, and manner of obtaining its power; sentiments which he admits would have been in the highest degree reprehensible on such an occasion; that the charge which was delivered was read from a book; and that he spoke nothing extemporary, as other witnesses for the prosecution have supposed. And, finally, we shall produce this book to speak for itself; shall prove it to be the same from which the charge was delivered; and shall conclude with the examination of witnesses who stood round the respondent while he read it, sat by his side, and almost looked over him while he delivered the charge which it contains.

This, Mr. President, will be the general bearing of our testimony; which we shall now, with the permission of this honorable Court, proceed to adduce, in the order in which it has been stated.

Mr. Hopkinson, (producing a paper.) Be pleased to inform the Court whether this is your handwriting.

Mr. Ewing. It is my handwriting so far as the paragraph at which I have signed my name; it was written by me at the time, and my name signed to it. The remainder is not in my handwriting, and I do not know by whom it is written.

Mr. Hopkinson. At what time and from what paper did you make it out?

Mr. Ewing. I made it out from the opinion of the court which was thrown down by Judge Peters or Chase, and within about half an hour after it was thrown down from the bench. I took the copy home with me, to Mr. Lewis's office, where I was at that time a student. In the afternoon of the same day Mr. Caldwell, the clerk of the court, called on me, and, at the desire of Judge Chase and Judge Peters, requested that it might be returned; and I gave it to Mr. Caldwell. I made out only one copy, and this is it.

Mr. Hopkinson. The paper being proved, I will read it in evidence.

Mr. Rodney observed that the original paper was the best evidence, and as one of the copies thrown down from the bench was already before the court, he presumed that ought to be considered as the best evidence.

Mr. Hopkinson said, he was desirous to read it merely to show that it corresponded with the copy in the possession of the attorney of the district.

Mr. Hopkinson then read the copy in the handwriting of Mr. Ewing, (containing the opinion of the court in the case of Fries,) which appeared to correspond precisely with the copy adduced by Mr. Rawle.

Mr. Hopkinson. Please to state whether you were in the court the day subsequent to that on which the opinion was delivered by the court, and what you recollect occurred at that time?

Mr. Ewing. I attended at the court the day succeeding, and I remember that Judges Chase and Peters, addressing Messrs. Lewis and Dallas, said they were not to consider anything which took place the day before as a restriction on the course they wished to pursue; Judge Peters said that everything done yesterday was withdrawn. Judge Chase asked them if they would go on in the cause; some conversation ensued, which ended in the determination of Messrs. Lewis and Dallas not to proceed in the defence of Fries. Judge Chase then made this observation: that if, after the court had expressed their opinion on the law, they persisted in stating to the jury their sentiments on the law, they must do it at the hazard of their legal reputations. I did not understand this as a menace, but as a declaration to the counsel that they must do it on their standing at the bar, and from a regard to their reputations. If I state anything further, it will only be a recapitulation of the testimony already given.

Edward J. Coale, sworn.

Mr. Hopkinson. Will you examine that paper, and say what you know respecting it?

Mr. Coale. It is a copy of the paper handed down by Judge Chase on the trial of Fries, made at the instance of Judge Chase, from a paper in his hand-writing; there were some words in the original which I could not ascertain: I left blanks for them, and they were filled up by Judge Chase; the other parts are written by me. It was made out before the trial of Fries. When in the office of Judge Chase, I was frequently in the habit of transcribing papers from his hand-writing. After I left him I went to Philadelphia, and lived there when Fries was tried. The judge occasionally, during my residence there, sent for me to transcribe his opinions; and on that occasion he called on me to transcribe this paper from the original hand-writing of himself.

Mr. Hopkinson. Was there a conversation between you and Judge Chase, in which he assigned his reasons, and what were they, for making out this opinion?

Mr. Nicholson objected to the putting of this question.

The President desired Mr. Hopkinson to reduce it to writing.

Mr. Nicholson said he would withdraw his objection rather than occasion delay. Some objection, however, arising on the part of the court,

Mr. Hopkinson submitted, in writing, the following question:

At the time Judge Chase desired you to make the copy in your hand, did he, or did he not, explain to you his reasons or motives for drawing up the paper from which this copy was made? If yes, what were they?

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Hopkinson said, he thought such questions perfectly legal, when they went to show the intention of the accused. We have heard, said he, much of the quo animo; and it is perfectly clear, that the intention constitutes the guilt of the offence.

Mr. Nicholson. The quo animo is to be collected from the acts of the party. The evidence of his declaration may be shown to prove the quo animo. But I do not consider it to be correct that Judge Chase shall be permitted to give in evidence declarations made at any other time than that when we have stated he made them; otherwise it will always lay in the discretion of the party accused to state declarations made at another time by him, for the purpose of justifying any acts he may have committed.

Mr. Martin said he had ever considered the declaration of the party at the time he was charged with committing a criminal act, as competent evidence to show his innocence.

Mr. Nicholson said there was no doubt of it; but that he was not charged with drawing out the paper as a criminal act. Any declaration made by Judge Chase at the time he delivered the opinion of the court, may be given in evidence, but any other declarations have nothing to do with the case.

The President. Where was the conversation between the judge and yourself?

Mr. Coale. At the judge's lodgings.

The question was then taken on permitting the question to be put, and passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 25.

Mr. Hopkinson next offered a certificate of the clerk of the circuit court of Pennsylvania, to show that at the trial of Fries, in 1799, there were eighty-six civil suits depending.

Also a copy of the indictment on the first trial of Fries.

Also a part of a charge delivered by Judge Iredell at the term when Fries was tried, taken from Carpenter's report of that trial, page 14.

Mr. Campbell intimating some objection to receiving this paper in evidence,

The President said it might be read as a report of the case; but what credit it would deserve it would be for the court to determine.

Mr. Rawle was again called in.

Mr. Hopkinson. You were District Attorney at the trial of Fries. I will ask you whether the restriction of the court as to arguing the point of law was not applied to the counsel of the United States, as well as to those of the prisoner?

Mr. Rawle. I certainly did consider the restriction as imposed upon us both.

Mr. Hopkinson submitted extracts from 2d Dallas, pages 346, 348, to show that in the cases of Vigol and Mitchell the crime of high treason was completely settled by the court, and was the same as defined by Judge Chase in the trial of Fries.

Mr. Hopkinson. Were you present at the trial of Fries?

Mr. Meredith. On the 22d day of April, 1800, I went to the court house for the purpose of attending the trial. It was rather at a late hour; I think after eleven o'clock before I reached the court house, I met several persons coming from the court room; I thought therefore that the court had adjourned, but not seeing any gentlemen of the bar, or the judges, I went on; when I came into court, I saw Judge Chase holding a paper in his hand, and he said that the court had with great deliberation considered the overt acts in the indictment against Fries, that they had made up their minds on the extent of the Constitutional definition of treason, and that to prevent their being misunderstood, they had committed their opinion to writing, one copy of which was intended to be given to the District Attorney, another to the counsel for the prisoner, and a third to be given to the jury; perhaps something else might have been said, but I do not recollect it. The paper was then thrown down by him to the bar, and a sentiment of this kind expressed by Judge Chase: that this opinion was not intended by the court to prevent the counsel from proceeding in the usual manner. I felt a desire to take a copy of the paper. I do not recollect whether more than one was thrown down. I had not, however, an opportunity of doing it. The paper was so fully occupied till the adjournment of the court, that although I made two or three attempts to obtain it, I could not succeed. The court adjourned a short time afterwards. After I went home I recollect that an application was made to me by the clerk of the court to return the copy, which he understood I had taken. I informed him I had not taken a copy. On the following day I was in the court room at the opening of the court. Fries was put to the bar, and the judge then inquired whether the counsel were ready to proceed on the trial. I remember Mr. Lewis addressing himself to the court, and objecting to proceed in the defence, because the counsel had been restrained by the court from proceeding in the manner which they deemed most beneficial to their client. I remember also that Judge Chase told him that he ought not to refer to the opinion which had been delivered on the preceding day; that the counsel were not to be bound by that opinion, as it had been withdrawn. Mr. Lewis referring to that opinion, however, considered it as the formed and decided opinion of the court, and that although the court had withdrawn it, it still would have an operation upon their minds; that while the court was under its influence, they could not expect to be heard in any of their arguments with effect. Judge Peters replied that the opinion was withdrawn, and I think Judge Chase repeated the opinion before expressed, that the counsel were not to be bound by that opinion, might enter fully into the case, and argue as well on the law as on the fact before the jury. I recollect Mr. Lewis stating to the court his opinion of the appositeness of cases decided at common law in England. I remember Judge Chase expressing his opinion and belief that they were perfectly inap-plicable; and afterwards remarking, that if, however, the counsel would go on, it was not the intention of the court to circumscribe them, or to take from the jury the decision of the law as well as the fact. He further added, that the counsel might manage the defence in such way as they thought proper, having a regard to their own characters. I am the more particular and positive of these expressions, because very shortly after the trial I made a summary of the proceedings. I find it stated as coming from the mouth of Judge Chase, and that he repeated that the counsel for the prisoner might go on in their own way, having a regard to their own characters. Judge Peters made a remark which I thought was calculated to put the counsel into good humor, but they persisted in their refusal to proceed. Thus far the court manifested, in my opinion, a desire that the cause might progress, and a persuasive and conciliatory temper; but Mr. Lewis having again decidedly said that he would not proceed, Judge Chase said, if you suppose by conduct like this to put the court into a difficulty, you are mistaken. After a pause, Judge Chase addressed himself to the prisoner, and asked him if he was ready to proceed on his trial, or whether he would have other counsel assigned to him. Fries replied he did not know what was best for him to do, but he would leave his case to the court. Mr. Rawle stated that from the peculiarity of the circumstances of the case, and the prisoner being left without the assistance of counsel, his wish was that the trial might be postponed for a day, and the postponement took place by order of the court. The following morning when the court was assembled, Fries was again put to the bar, and Judge Chase inquired of him whether he wished the court to assign him counsel? His reply was, that he would trust himself to the court and jury. Judge Chase replied, then by the blessing of God the court will be your counsel, and will do you as much justice as could be done by the counsel that were assigned you, or nearly in those words. The trial proceeded, but I was not present during the whole of it.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Hopkinson. Do you recollect whether Judge Chase guarded the prisoner against putting any improper questions to the witnesses, &c.?

Mr. Meredith. Judge Chase seemed to me to perform his promise. He told him he had a right to put any questions he pleased, and guarded him against putting improper ones.

Mr. Harper said he would next proceed to the case of Callender.

Mr. Harper. Did you furnish Judge Chase with a copy of the book, entitled the "Prospect Before Us," and at what time did you furnish him with it?

Mr. Martin. It is not a pleasing thing for me to be a witness on this point, as I may be considered as a party concerned, and especially from being one of the counsel for Judge Chase. Yet, as it is required from me, I will proceed to state what I know. When I was in New York, I observed in a newspaper which I took up at a barber's shop an advertisement for the sale of the "Prospect Before Us." I mentioned it to Judge Washington, and he sent his servant to procure a copy, and I desired him to purchase two copies. I read it, and as was usual with me with respect to books any wise interesting, I scored such passages as were remarkable either for their merit or demerit, and I did score a great portion of the book. But I did not score them with the least idea of an indictment being founded upon them. When I scored the book I did not know that Judge Chase was going on the circuit of Virginia. My scoring was for my own amusement, and for that of my friends. Afterwards I saw Judge Chase. I asked him if he was going down to Richmond; he answered yes. I asked if he had seen the book called the "Prospect Before Us?" He said he had not. I then told him, I will put it into your hands; you may amuse yourself with it as you are going down, and make what use of it you please. There was a great deal more scored than was contained in the indictment. I most solemnly declare that I had no view to a prosecution in scoring it; though I have no hesitation in saying that in common with every worthy inhabitant of America I detested the book.

Mr. Nicholson. What do you mean by detest?

Mr. Martin. I am ready candidly to acknowledge that I did think it a book that ought to be prosecuted; and I did not think that Judge Chase would have an opportunity of seeing it unless I gave him a copy of it. Having since heard it suggested that I had some share in drawing up the indictment against Callender, I most solemnly declare I did not put pen to paper on the subject.

Mr. Harper. Was not your name written on the book?

Mr. Martin. It was.

President. Did you express the view you had in putting it into his hands?

Mr. Martin. I said what I have already stated; that he might take it down with him, and make such use of it as he pleased.

James Winchester, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Will you please to state whether you were in Annapolis in 1800, in court with Judge Chase; and Mr. John T. Mason, and what was the conversation which then took place?

Mr. Winchester. I attended a circuit court held at Annapolis in 1800. I do not recollect either the day the court commenced or ended. I think on the last day of the term sentence was passed on — Saunders for stealing, in his character of postmaster, the contents of a letter. A crowd gathered round the door, and retarded our passage out of court. I do not remember what persons remained; but Mr. Mason came up and addressed himself to Judge Chase. My recollection is at best but imperfect, and of this conversation necessarily indistinct. In the account of it, therefore, I shall use my own language. I may occasionally use the language of Judge Chase and Mr. Mason. According to the impression on my mind the conversation commenced in this way. Judge Chase had delivered a charge to the grand jury. Mr. Mason came up, and in a laughing manner jocosely asked in what light are we to consider the charge, as moral, political, judicial, or religious? These are the words, I believe, but of this I am not certain. The judge replied in the same style and manner, I believe, that it was a little of all. I cannot be certain, but I think Mr. Mason intimated to the judge that he would not deliver such sentiments in Virginia. It appeared to me that the language of Mr. Mason conveyed to Judge Chase the idea that he was afraid to deliver such sentiments in Virginia, though I am not myself confident that such was his meaning. The judge replied that he would, and that he would at all times and in all places execute the laws in the manner he had declared. The conversation then turned on the book called the "Prospect Before Us;" as well as I remember it was spoken of as a book written by Callender. The conversation which passed on the subject I cannot pretend to relate at all, more than that I have a strong impression on my mind that Judge Chase mentioned that Mr. Martin had put the book into his hands, that he would take it with him to Richmond, and lay it before the grand jury, and have it presented. I heard Mr. Mason's testimony, and my recollection corresponds with his, that the whole conversation was jocular. I do not remember the particular expressions which Mr. Mason relates; but I cannot say that they were or were not made—because my attention was not very pointedly directed to the conversation, and at the time, from the laughing which took place, I might not have heard the expressions though they had been used.

Mr. Harper. What is the expression you do not recollect?

Mr. Winchester. That if the whole State of Virginia was not depraved, he would carry the book down with him, and have the fellow indicted.

Mr. Harper. Inform the court how soon you saw Judge Chase after his arrival at Richmond, what passed between you, &c.?

Mr. Marshall. Judge Chase arrived in Richmond, but whether on the 21st or 22d of May, I do not recollect; but my impression is that it was Tuesday. I waited on him, as was usual with me, and gave him information respecting the state of the docket. The associate judge did not attend on the 22d, when the court was opened and the grand jury received their charge. They went to their room, and did not return till Saturday the 24th of May, when they returned a presentment against James T. Callender, which I have. [The original presentment was produced by the witness, read, and delivered to the Secretary.]

As soon as I had read the presentment, at the request of the attorney of the district the jury were taken back to their chamber, and progress was made in preparing the indictment. There was some conversation between Judge Chase and Mr.

Nelson, which lasted for a few minutes. Judge Chase inquired what was the proper process on the presentment. The answer which the District Attorney made, was, that he supposed a capias was the proper process. I recollect that Judge Chase said something of a bench warrant, which was a practice unknown to us. Judge Chase asked me to draw the warrant. I said I could not. He then said he would endeavor to draw it. Afterwards Judge Chase desired the District Attorney to draw out the form of a capias; the Judge said he would draw one himself, and that I might draw out another; and he said he would take the most approved of the three. I recollect mine was drawn first; but whether before Judge Chase and Mr. Nelson had finished theirs, I do not recollect. On looking over mine, he said he was better satisfied with mine than his own; and he requested me to sign, seal, and deliver it to the marshal.

On Saturday the 24th of May, in the afternoon, the grand jury brought in the indictment. I have taken these circumstances from a copy of the minutes of my office, which, if the court wish to see, I can produce, as I have them with me. Judge Chase alone formed the court from the 22d to the 29th of May, inclusive. On the 27th of May the marshal brought Callender into court, Judge Chase being at that time the only member of the court. A chair was handed to him, and he remained in court while the court proceeded with the docket in the usual way, until near evening, when Judge Chase observed that as the traverser was in court, he might perhaps have some application to make. I do not recollect whether the counsel afterwards employed for the defence of Callender were then in court; but if they were, they made no observations. But Mr. Meriwether Jones, with whom Callender resided, said that Callender was not then prepared to make any application; but that perhaps to-morrow he would move a continuance. Then Judge Chase applied to Callender, and asked if he could give bail. Mr. Jones replied that he could give bail in a moderate sum. Judge Chase asked Callender what were his circumstances; that in fixing the sum, he would be governed by that circumstance. Callender said they were nearly equal. The judge repeated the question and then Callender said he was indebted about two hundred dollars, and there was about as much due to him which he expected to receive; and therefore he did not consider himself worth anything. Judge Chase then asked if he could give bail, himself in two hundred dollars, and another in a like sum. The reply made by Mr. Callender or Mr. Jones was, that he could find bail to that amount; and he accordingly gave bail. On the 28th May, an application was made by Mr. Hay; this was the first instance in which Mr. Callender took any steps for his defence. Mr. Hay stated that he was not well acquainted with the practice in such cases; that he had an affidavit, of a general nature, stating the impossibility of going into the trial, with any prospect of success, without the attendance of a number of witnesses who lived at a great distance. Mr. Hay also inquired whether a general affidavit was sufficient, or whether a special affidavit, stating the names of the witnesses and the facts they were expected to prove, would be required. Judge Chase said that the strict practice of the law required a special affidavit; but they might take till to-morrow to prepare a special affidavit, submitting it to their discretion to manage the cause as they thought proper. I beg pardon for being a little too hasty in my narrative. When Mr. Hay offered his motion for a continuance, the court said that before they could hear the motion it was necessary that the traverser should plead to the indictment. For if he pleaded guilty, there would be no necessity for an application. Mr. Hay assured the court that the traverser would not plead guilty. Mr. Callender was arraigned and he plead not guilty; and then the conversation, which I have stated took place. The reply of Judge Chase was, after a general affidavit is made, it must be relied on, but you may withdraw the general, and file a special affidavit. Nothing further passed on the 28th.

On the 29th, in the morning, Mr. Hay produced a special affidavit; I have the original here. It is stated therein that, there were a number of witnesses, one from New Hampshire; one from Massachusetts; some from Pennsylvania, and some from South Carolina, absent; who were material witnesses for his defence; that there were also sundry documents to be procured; and an essay written by Mr. Adams on canon and feudal law, which the traverser supposed it important to have for his defence. Mr. Hay, on these grounds, moved for a continuance to the next term, in a pretty long speech. Judge Chase observed, that every person before he made a publication, if he meant to justify it, ought to know the names of his witnesses; and if he meant to justify it by documents, they ought to have been within his reach. It was not to be presumed, indeed, that he could calculate upon being able to procure his witnesses in a few days; that in this case, it was alleged that one witness resided in New Hampshire, which was a great way off. He said that the ordinary sittings of the court would be too short for him to obtain witnesses from so great a distance. He said that the prisoner should have time, and he should have a fair trial, but he could not allow him to the next term. He said he might have two weeks—but that might be too short a time—you may have three weeks, a month, nay, six weeks. We cannot sit so long, because we are obliged to hold a court in the district of Delaware; but I will adjourn this court, to go to Delaware, and will return in six weeks. In the course of the observations offered by Mr. Hay to the court, as well as I can recollect, he said if the documents and witnesses were here, he did not think he would be prepared during that term to investigate all the facts, and the law arising on them; but he would be prepared against the next term, if the court would indulge him with a continuance. After Judge Chase had made this offer of a postponement, I do not distinctly remember that Mr. Hay or Mr. Nicholas made any reply.

After a short interval Judge Chase said, as they did not seem disposed to take the time he had offered, the trial should come on within the time the testimony of the witnesses residing in Virginia, deemed material, can be procured. He asked the marshal what was the distance of the residences of Mr. Giles and General Mason, and in what time they could conveniently come to Richmond; and, whether his deputy marshals could go for them? The reply of the marshal was, that his deputies were prepared to execute any orders of the court. Judge Chase then directed me to make out the subpoenas for Monday, the 2d of June; and I issued subpoenas for Messrs. Giles, Mason, and Taylor; but Colonel Taylor's name does not appear in the affidavit. The deputy marshals were directed to use all possible expedition in serving the subpoenas: they were all returned executed on Monday the 2d of June, endorsed with the hour of the day on which they were executed.

[Here Mr. Marshall offered the originals with the endorsements of the time of service.]

On Monday, the 2d day of June, Colonel Taylor appeared in court. The other witnesses were called, but they did not appear. A postponement was asked by one of the gentlemen, for two hours, who stated that it had rained on Sunday preceding, which might have impeded travelling, and it was granted. Some time in the course of the day, Judge Chase observed he might have till to-morrow, which was accepted.

On Tuesday morning, soon after the opening of the court, the motion for a continuance was renewed, founded on the affidavit of Callender, which gave rise to the first motion. Judge Griffin was then in court, having arrived on the 30th of May, and continued during the remainder of the term. It was argued much at length, and received the same decision as on the 29th. The marshal was then ordered to call the petit jury; twelve jurors appeared; there were some objections which I do not precisely recollect, to the panel of the jury; and a motion made to quash the array. An argument was made and some authorities quoted; Judge Chase said they were not to be relied on, and he asked for Coke upon Lyttleton. I brought it from the library in the capitol. Judge Chase looked into it, and said the array should not be quashed; but I do not know the principle on which he decided. When the jury had all answered, the gentlemen proposed to propound a question to the jurors as they came to the book. I do not recollect what the question was, but Judge Chase said he would propound the proper question himself. The question which Judge Chase said it was proper to propound, was: "Have you formed and delivered an opinion (for he said it was necessary to have delivered as well as formed it) on the indictment?" The answer of the first juror was, that he had never seen or heard the indictment, and could not say that he had formed an opinion respecting it. Eight or nine of the jurors were asked the same question, and gave a like answer. The gentlemen who defended the traverser then said it was unnecessary to ask the other jurors that question; the rest were sworn, and the trial proceeded. The course it took was pretty lengthy, and I cannot state all the circumstances that took place. I recollect that the testimony of Colonel Taylor was refused, but I do not recollect the particular circumstances attending it.

Mr. Harper. Did anything pass between you and Judge Chase respecting the jury summoned to try Callender?

Mr. Nicholson made some objection to this question.

Mr. Harper replied in support of it.

The objection was then withdrawn by the Managers; but further objection being made by a member of the court,

The President desired the question to be reduced to writing, which was accordingly done by Mr. Harper, as follows:

"Testimony on the part of the prosecution, tending to show from the declarations of the respondent, that he had a corrupt intention to pack a jury for the trial of Callender, having been given; he offers in evidence other declarations of his, made during the proceedings, but on a different day, for the purpose of rebutting the former testimony, and of showing that his intentions, in that respect, were pure, and even favorable to Mr. Callender."

When the Senate decided that it should be put—yeas 32, nays 2.

Mr. Marshall. Mr. Giles was on a jury in the circuit court, on, I think, the 27th of May, the day Callender was brought into court by the marshal. When Mr. Giles's name was called, Judge Chase asked me whether that was the celebrated Mr. Giles, Member of Congress. I said that it was. He said that he had never seen him before. Nothing more passed at that time. In the evening I was at Judge Chase's lodgings. He asked me whether I supposed Mr. Giles would remain in Richmond until the trial of Callender. I said it was uncertain, that it was not customary for Mr. Giles to remain any length of time when he came to town. Judge Chase said he wished he would remain, and serve in Callender's case; nay, he wished that Callender might be tried by a jury of his own politics. He said that if his situation as a judge would permit him to drop a hint to the marshal with respect to the jury, he would intimate his wish that Callender should be thus tried; but, in his situation, it would be improper for him to interfere with the duty of the marshal.

Mr. Harper. Inform the Court at what time, if any, you were at Judge Chase's chambers, when a certain Mr. John Heath was there; what passed, and what did not pass.

Mr. Marshall. Judge Chase was, as he informed me, a total stranger in Richmond, and had never been there until he held the court in 1800. He asked me if I would call upon him from time to time. When I knew he was at home, I used to go in an evening, and spend an hour or two with him at his lodgings. I also generally went in the morning, about an hour before the meeting of the court. I recollect about ten o'clock, going to Mr.

Chase's lodgings. I went, I think, but of this I am not positive, with Mr. Randolph. I found Mr. Heath in Judge Chase's chamber, or in the passage. Mr. Heath was, I think, in the act of leaving the room; he had his hat in his hand, and I met him either in his way out of the room, or in the passage.

President. Can you state the day of the month?

Mr. Marshall. I cannot, but I think it was the day before Judge Griffin arrived. I recollect very well, on that day Mr. D. Randolph and myself walked up to the court room. I was surprised at seeing Mr. Heath at Judge Chase's, and asked Mr. Randolph what could have brought him there.

Mr. Harper. Was Mr. Heath in the act of going out when you entered?

Mr. Marshall. Yes sir, he was on the floor. He had taken his leave, as I supposed, of Judge Chase, and was either out of the room, or in the act of coming out of it. I do not recollect positively whether Mr. Randolph went with me. I recollect going with Mr. Randolph to court, and that it was the usual practice of Mr. R. and myself to go to Judge Chase's chambers in the morning and attend him to court. I do not certainly recollect whether that morning we went together to the judge's chambers, but I am positive we left the chamber together. The court met generally at eleven o'clock. I had something particularly to do that morning, and it was from ten to half-past ten when I went to the judge's chambers; it may have been about ten. The time I saw Mr. Heath must have been about ten o'clock.

Mr. Harper. Did any conversation take place between the judge and Mr. Heath while you were there?

Mr. Marshall. I believe I met Mr. Heath outside of the door. There was not a word of conversation at any rate.

Mr. Harper. Did any incident take place respecting a paper handed from Mr. Randolph to Mr. Chase?

Mr. Marshall. There did not.

Mr. Harper. Did you hear anything about creatures called democrats?

Mr. Marshall. I never heard anything pass between them. I never heard the judge say anything about the jury, except what occurred either at the judge's lodgings or at court, which I took to be instructions to summon twenty-four jurors above twenty-five years of age, and freeholders; that there should be enough to supply the juries required at that court.

Mr. Harper. Did he direct them to be summoned from the country or the town?

Mr. Marshall. I have stated all that I remember relative to the summoning of the jury.

Mr. Harper. Did he say anything of the description of persons, relative to parties?

Mr. Marshall. I do not recollect that he said a word.

Mr. Harper. Did you make it a practice to go with the judge to the court every day from his lodgings?

Mr. Marshall. I walked every day with him. I made it an uniform practice. The judge's lodgings were on my way to court, not more than twenty yards out of my way.

Mr. Key. When the subpoenas were returned on the 2d of June, and neither Mr. Giles nor General Mason appeared, was there any application made on the court to allow a further time for their appearance?

Mr. Marshall. There were some observations made, but I do not recollect whether I attended to them at the time or not; but I think Judge Chase offered to issue an attachment for them, and left it to the pleasure of the traverser to say whether he would have compulsory process issued.

Mr. Key. Do you recollect, sir, whether that was applied for by the counsel, or whether it was a voluntary offer on the part of the court?

Mr. Marshall. I understood that it was a voluntary offer on the part of the court.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase confer with Judge Griffin upon the motion of a continuance, and upon the rejection of Colonel Taylor's testimony?

Mr. Marshall. I sat very near them, and I frequently heard them in conversation in a sort of whisper.

Mr. Harper. Did you hear any part of the conversation between them?

Mr. Marshall. I did not hear anything distinctly; but when Mr. Basset was sworn, after having stated the situation in which he stood, Judge Chase asked him whether he had formed an opinion who was the author of the Prospect Before Us; he replied that he had not formed an opinion of the author, but he had formed an opinion of the book, and had said that the author ought to be punished. Judge Chase then turned to Judge Griffin, and said that the question propounded by the counsel would prevent the formation of a jury with respect to a notorious murder, as every man in the county where it had been committed might have declared that the perpetration ought to be punished. In that case there would not be in the whole county a competent jury. Judge Chase then said, let him be sworn. I do not know positively that Judge Griffin concurred in that opinion; but I think, from what I heard, that he did.

Mr. Harper. Did this conversation take place prior to the declaration of the opinion of the court by Judge Chase?

Mr. Marshall. I cannot say with certainty, because Judge Chase sometimes spoke without consulting Judge Griffin. I do not recollect any case in which they held a consultation, but that on the rejection of the testimony of Colonel Taylor, and the direction that Mr. Basset should be sworn on the jury. He was consulted as to the testimony of Colonel Taylor, but I did not hear him declare his assent aloud, but I took it for granted, as it was not denied.

Mr. Harper. With respect to the motion for a continuance, do you know whether the decision was made after a consultation with Judge Griffin?

Mr. Marshall. I do not recollect that anything was said on the part of Judge Griffin; but I understood that it was assented to, as it was delivered as the opinion of the court.

Mr. Harper. Was there any expression on the part of Judge Griffin of disapprobation of what was delivered by Judge Chase as the opinion of the court?

Mr. Marshall. None, sir.

Mr. Nicholson. At the time of the trial of Callender, was it not the custom of the judges to choose their circuits?

Mr. Marshall. I believe it was, sir.

Mr. Nicholson. At that time, the Virginia district was within Judge Chase's circuit, and do you recollect that he said he would not continue the cause till the next term?

Mr. Marshall. I recollect that Judge Chase said he would not continue it till the next term.

Mr. Nicholson. Who presided at the next term?

Mr. Marshall. Judge Paterson.

Mr. Randolph. You have said that on the morning when you found Mr. Heath about retiring from Judge Chase's chamber, you did not recollect whether the marshal accompanied you there or not?

Mr. Marshall. I do not recollect whether he did or not, but the probability, as resting on my mind, is that he did.

Mr. Randolph. Did he accompany you from the lodgings of Judge Chase to the court?

Mr. Marshall. Yes, I am certain of that, because I had the conversation which I have mentioned.

Mr. Randolph. You mentioned a conversation you had with Judge Chase on the subject of the political characters serving on the jury; that he wished that Mr. Giles, and other gentlemen of the same political character, might serve on the trial of Callender; did you mention that conversation to the marshal?

Mr. Marshall. I do not remember to have conversed with him on that subject?

Mr. Randolph. Were you acquainted with the gentlemen who served as petit jurors on Callender's trial?

Mr. Marshall. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. Is there any one of them that comes under the description of being of the same political character with Mr. Giles?

Mr. Marshall. I believe not, sir. At the time of the trial, I was not fully acquainted with the political characters of the gentlemen that served on the jury; but since I have learned, as I then conceived, that none of them were of the same politics with Mr. Giles.

Mr. Randolph. If I understood you right, sir, you stated that a capias was ordered to be issued before the grand jury returned the indictment a true bill.

Mr. Marshall. I said on the presentment a capias was issued for the arrest of Callender, which was before the indictment was found.

Mr. Nicholson. The indictment was found on the 24th of May, was it not sir?

Mr. Marshall. The presentment was made on the morning of that day. The court sat longer than usual, and I remember that the jury wished to be discharged, but they were not, and it was five or six o'clock before they brought in the bill of indictment.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect whether the attorney of the district had commenced drawing the indictment before the presentment was made?

Mr. Marshall. I remember that the district attorney was drawing up the indictment before the presentment was made; he had made, however, very little progress in it at the time; it was finished afterwards as soon as convenient, and transmitted to the grand jury.

Mr. Randolph. During the course of that trial, pray, sir, tell the court were the interruptions of the counsel for the traverser more frequent than you have been in the habit of witnessing?

Mr. Marshall. I have rarely seen a trial where the interruptions were so frequent.

Mr. Randolph. Do you remember a single instance?

Mr. Marshall. I think in a trial where Judge Iredell presided there were interruptions which were as frequent, if not more frequent than took place in the course of this trial.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect anything disrespectful on the part of the counsel towards the court on the trial of Callender?

Mr. Marshall. One of the counsel, Mr. Hay, appeared to be under a great deal of irritation during a great part of the trial.

Mr. Randolph. Did you perceive any cause for this?

Mr. Marshall. The court were very positive that the jury should not be addressed by the traverser's counsel on the constitutionality of the sedition law, and whenever that point was touched by the counsel, there was as much decision shown by the court as I ever witnessed.

Mr. Randolph. Was there much mirth among the by-standers?

Mr. Marshall. There was a good deal. I cannot say what gave rise to it, but it was kept up during the course of the trial. The court was extremely facetious during that part of the trial which I particularly attended to, but I was not very attentive to the trial till that morning.

Mr. Martin. What was the cause of the interruptions?

Mr. Marshall. It was the counsel persisting in addressing the jury on the unconstitutionality of the sedition law, after the court had declared what was their opinion of the law on that point.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect any particular expressions used by the court on this subject?

Mr. Marshall. I heard Judge Chase say that the counsel for the traverser were mistaken in their exposition of the law, and they kept pressing their mistakes upon the court; he said so once, if not oftener.

Mr. Harper. You say, sir, that there was no gentleman on the petit jury of the same political opinion with Mr. Callender or Mr. Giles. Do you mean on the jury that tried Callender, or on the panel?

Mr. Marshall. On the jury that tried Callender.

Mr. Harper. Were there any on the panel?

Mr. Marshall. There were Colonel Harvie, Mr. Radford, and Mr. Marks Vanderval. Mr. Harvie was called very early, and Mr. Marks Vander-val; but it appeared to me that there was a great unwillingness on the part of those gentlemen to be on the jury to try this cause, and several applications were made to have them excused.

Mr. Harper. How did it happen that none of those gentlemen served?

Mr. Marshall. Mr. Harvie suggested that he was sheriff of Henrico county, and that the county court was sitting at the time; that his presence was required, and on that ground the court excused him from serving on the jury. The other two gentlemen did not attend at all.

Mr. Harper. When you said that the confusion on this trial took place from the counsel's pressing their opinion on the jury, do I understand you as saying that it was after they (the counsel) had been overruled by the court?

Mr. Marshall. I so understood it; I did not perceive any other cause.

Mr. Harper. What took place on the motion for a continuance? The affidavit filed stated that the traverser could not produce his witnesses; did it state that he could prove a justification as to all the charges in the indictment?

Mr. Marshall. No, sir, not that I remember; but the affidavit is here on file. It was stated by Judge Chase, that there were nineteen charges in the indictment, and that it was necessary for the traverser, in order to procure his acquittal, to prove the truth of the matter in the whole; it was not sufficient to prove a dozen or more of them to be true, if he could not prove them all. It was not sufficient to prove a part instead of the whole of any one charge; for example, suppose a man should charge me with being a great scoundrel, a rogue, and a very ugly fellow, and he should prove that I was a very ugly fellow, would that go to acquit him for having called me a scoundrel or a rogue? Can a part proven in this way be said to be a justification?

Mr. Harper. Was this remark made by Judge Chase in good humor?

Mr. Marshall. I thought him in a remarkable good humor.

Mr. Harper. You say Judge Chase was positive. Was he harsh towards the counsel of the traverser?

Mr. Marshall. I did not think so. I remember that he said his country had made him a judge, and he would be the judge on the business of that day, and whatever was transacted should be under the direction of the court. He said also that he was a frail and feeble man, and that it was possible he was in an error in respect to the opinion which he entertained of the law. If the gentlemen who dissented from his opinions would form a bill of exceptions, he would be the first man to allow them a writ of error to go into the Supreme Court of the United States, a superior tribunal, and have there his opinions tested.

Mr. Harper. Did the counsel for the traverser state a case on this offer of the judge?

Mr. Marshall. Those were the observations of the court, but I do not recollect that the counsel said anything in reply.

Mr. Randolph. You mentioned that no person of Mr. Giles's politics was on the jury; did I understand you, when speaking of Mr. John Harvie as being of those politics, as meaning Mr. Harvie of Belvidere?

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Marshall. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. What do you conceive to have been his politics at that time?

Mr. Marshall. I thought, from his opinion on the sedition law, which I had understood was, that it was unconstitutional, he might have been of the same politics as Mr. Giles.

Mr. Randolph. What was your opinion of Mr. Radford?

Mr. Marshall. I understood his politics to have been of the same kind.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever hear that Mr. Marks Vanderval had denied that he was summoned on the jury for the trial of Callender?

Mr. Marshall. I have understood that he denied ever having been summoned.

Mr. Randolph. Did Mr. Harvie answer to his name when called on the jury list?

Mr. Marshall. Yes, sir, and he was excused as being high sheriff of the county of Henrico.

Mr. Randolph. Did Mr. Radford answer to his name?

Mr. Marshall. I believe not, sir; Mr. Vanderval I am certain did not.

Mr. Randolph. Were you well acquainted at the time with Mr. Radford and Mr. Harvie?

Mr. Marshall. I was with Mr. Harvie, and tolerably well with Mr. Radford.

Mr. Randolph. Were you well acquainted with Mr. Marks Vanderval?

Mr. Marshall. Not very intimately.

Mr. Randolph. Do you know, or believe, that at the election for members of the House of Representatives in the Spring of the year 1799, whether Mr. Vanderval did vote for your brother, the present chief justice?

Mr. Marshall. I believe he did not vote at all; but if he had voted, I believe it would have been for him.

Mr. Harper. Colonel Tinsely appears upon this panel; I would ask you if his political opinions were at that time the same as they are now?

Mr. Marshall. I do not know what were his political sentiments at the time; but I remember that he had been hostile to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Martin. The panel of the petit jury is never returned; if I understood you right, by the marshal, until the jury appears in court, and the clerk of the court knows nothing of it. Did you learn anything of the panel that had been summoned by the marshal on the morning you were with him at Judge Chase's lodgings?

Mr. Marshall. I did not.

The President. Did you know whether Mr. D. Randolph had or had not made out his panel?

Mr. Marshall. I knew nothing of it.

Mr. Wright. When was it that the conversation took place at Judge Chase's lodgings, when you met Mr. Heath there?

Mr. Marshall. I do not recollect the precise day, but I think it was the 27th or 28th of May.

8th CON. 2d SES.—9

SATURDAY, February 16.

The Court was opened at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Present: the Managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel.

David M. Randolph, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Were you marshal of the United States for the district of Virginia in 1800?

Answer. I was, sir.

Mr. Harper. Did you attend the circuit court held in May of that year, as marshal?

A. I did, sir.

Mr. Harper. Did you summon the panel of the jury that served on the trial of Callender?

A. I did.

Mr. Harper. Had you any conversation with Judge Chase on the forming that panel?

A. I had no conversation with him on that subject. There was a conversation offered to me by Judge Chase.

Mr. Harper. What was it?

A. The judge recommended to me that I should get persons generally from the country; represented that they should be twenty-five years of age, of fair characters, untainted by party prejudices.

Mr. Harper. What were his reasons for taking them from the country?

A. I do not know.

Mr. Harper. If at that period you had been disposed to form a jury of the political opinion of those then in power, would you have taken them from the town or country?

A. I knew very little of the political sentiments of the citizens. There were, however, in town a great majority of those whose politics were called federal.

Mr. Harper. Was that the case in the country?

A. I cannot say. I never meddled with politics in any way except in private conversation. Not attending at public meetings, I had but little acquaintance with the politics of individuals.

Mr. Harper. Did you, in forming the panel, summon any persons you knew to be opposed to the then Administration?

A. I believe I did several. I summoned the best and fairest characters, without respect to their political opinions. I employed two deputies.

Mr. Harper. Did you summon Colonel Vanderval?

A. I did by my deputy.

Mr. Harper. On what day was he summoned?

A. I received directions from the bench on Friday, to be prepared with two juries, of twenty-four each, on the Monday following.

Mr. Harper. When did you proceed to form the jury?

A. I proceeded the moment I was directed. I summoned several in person while in court.

Mr. Harper. When did you complete the panel?

A. I completed it on Monday morning following while the court was sitting.

Mr. Harper. Did you complete the panel before?

A. Never. It might have been considered as in an incomplete state at that period.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Harper. Why so?

A. It is never the practice in Virginia for the jury summoned to consist of any precise number of persons.

Mr. Harper. Did you ever show the panel to Judge Chase?

A. Never at any time or place. The list was handed to the clerk of the court on Monday after the court was in session.

Mr. Harper. Did Mr. Chase ever say anything to you about striking off any persons of any particular description from the panel?

A. Never at any time or at any place, I am very confident.

Mr. Harper. You are very confident of that?

A. Perfectly so.

Mr. Harper. You say the panel was not completed till Monday?

A. It was not finished till that day when the court was in session—and the list was never shown by me to any person.

Mr. Harper. It was not the practice then to present a list to the clerk?

A. Never, except as the jurors are sworn?

Mr. Harper. Were the jurors called and sworn on that day?

A. There were twelve of them sworn on that day.

Mr. Harper. Did any gentlemen summoned apply to you to be discharged?

A. Several. At the moment I received orders to have two juries ready by Monday, I called on my two deputies, and desired them to take down, on distinct papers, the names I mentioned to them. I observed that I chose to take the responsibility on myself. While they were taking down the names, I summoned several persons whose names were not put down till Monday. On Monday, finding my two deputies had not summoned a sufficient number, I went in quest of them. I found them at the end of the town, in the act of executing my orders. Mr. Moseby, one of my deputies, was standing with Colonel Vandervail, I think in conversation with him. I called him across the street, and asked him how they succeeded. At this time I saw my other deputy. They told me they wanted but one or two jurors. I told them they must make haste. About this time I saw Mr. Basset entering town on horseback. I told him that he had been crossed as a grand juror for non-attendance; that he must serve as a petit juror, which would give him an opportunity of offering his apology. I took out my watch, and told him that I allowed him five minutes. We arrived at the capitol, and my deputies there gave me their memorandums, from which, and my own, I made up the list of the jury. Two gentlemen, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Blakely, offered something like excuses. I looked at Mr. Blakely, and said there was only one excuse that I would admit, to wit: his being under twenty-five years of age. He said he was under that age, and I dismissed him. Mr. Lewis said he might make the same excuse. I said I doubted it, but I let him off. As I went into the passage, I met Mr. Samuel Myers, who also desired to be let off. I told him I could not and would not. He said I would excuse him for a reason which he could assign. He whispered, and said that he was prejudiced against Callender. I permitted him to go, but begged him to keep that reason to himself. Another juror summoned, was very warm and importunate to be excused. I told him there was only one ground on which I would excuse him. He asked me what it was? I answered that if it applied to him, he already knew it. I begged him to go to the court, and he would learn what it was. He did so. Colonel Harvie stopped me in the passage in a hasty manner, and with great warmth and friendliness urged me to let him off. He said he was sheriff of Henrico county. I said I knew it, but that I also knew that his duties were generally performed by deputies. I did not let him off. He applied to the court, and was excused.

Mr. Harper. Were there any other gentlemen who applied to be excused?

A. Yes, sir, Mr. Radford. He was in court at the time I commenced making out the list. He urged as an objection to serving that he differed in politics from myself. This I considered evasive, and I told him I should call him. When called he did not answer. I believe he went immediately home.

Mr. Harper. Did you go in person to execute the process against Callender?

A. I did.

Mr. Harper. Did you meet any person at Petersburg with whom you had a conversation respecting the arrest of Callender?

A. The first person I had any conversation with was Mr. George Hay.

Mr. Harper. Did anything pass in that conversation tending to dissuade you from searching for Callender?

A. I had fruitlessly gone in pursuit of Callender some distance from Petersburg; on my return about sunset, at a tavern nearly opposite the residence of Mr. Hay, he came up, and entered into conversation with me with regard to Callender. I said I had been on a wild-goose chase, and had found myself foiled, but that I was determined to find whether he was not in town. Mr. Hay appeared to interest himself very much, in dissuading me from the pursuit. He said that Callender would not be taken, and that it was in vain to pursue him. I replied that I would do my duty, and, if possible, apprehend him. I asked him if he knew where Callender was. He said he knew not where he was, and if he did, he would not tell me. He invited me to take a bed at his house, which I declined, as I was going to spend the evening down town.

Mr. Harper. Did Mr. Hay assign any reasons why Callender ought not to be arrested?

A. I cannot state the language he used. He urged a great many things. Among others, he observed, that as Callender could not be defended this term, he would be found guilty and imprisoned, and said that if he was not then arrested, he might, in the fall, surrender himself.

Mr. Harper. You understood Mr. Hay to say, that if Callender was not arrested till the next term, he would surrender himself?

A. He so intimated to me. These were not his very words, but that was my understanding of them.

Mr. Harper. You say you completed the panel after the court met on Monday?

A. I did.

Mr. Harper. And that you never submitted it to Judge Chase, or spoke to him about it?

A. I did not, at any time or place whatever.

Mr. Harper. And that you had no conversation with the judge about forming it, except that you have mentioned?

A. None other; and that was at his lodgings in a familiar conversation.

Mr. Randolph. I understand you to have said you did not summon Marks Vandervall yourself.

A. I said so—but he was summoned by my order.

Mr. Randolph. Were you present when the order was executed?

A. I was on the opposite side of the street, and saw my deputy, Moseby, in conversation with him. He crossed the street, and said that Colonel Vandervall expressed a repugnance to serving. I told him it laid with him to release him, and if he departed from the general rule he must answer for it.

Mr. Randolph. Do you know whether Mr. Vandervall has denied that he was ever summoned?

A. I do not, except seeing it so stated in the public papers.

Mr. Randolph. Have you ever at any time had any conversation with Judge Chase on the subject of the grand jury?

A. Not that I recollect.

Mr. Randolph. Was the William Radford who was summoned and expressed his unwillingness to serve on the jury, the same who keeps the Eagle tavern?

A. The same.

Mr. Randolph. Did he keep the Eagle tavern at that time?

A. I believe not.

Mr. Randolph. Did he say his politics differed from yours?

A. I do not know that he used those words; but such was my impression, at the time, of his meaning.

Mr. Randolph. Did you understand his opinions to be of that political character?

A. I cannot say positively. I have some indistinct recollection that he was classed among that description of men.

Mr. Nicholson. What party?

A. The democratic party, as they are called.

Mr. Randolph. Did I understand you to say you were not positive to which party he belonged?

A. I was not positive at that time.

Mr. Campbell. I wish you to state when you showed the panel of the grand jury to the judge.

A. On the first day of the court after it was formed.

Mr. Campbell. Had he never seen it before?

A. Never, sir; I had never seen it before myself. The practice is, for the returns to be handed in by the deputies, and a list formed and given to the clerk, who hands it to the court.

Mr. Campbell. Have you any recollection of seeing Mr. Heath at the judge's lodgings, and when?

A. I have no recollection of seeing him at the judge's chambers at any time, or of seeing him in Richmond during that session of the court, until it was called to my mind by Mr. Marshall's testimony.

Mr. Nicholson. Then you recollect by presumption that he was there—did you see him?

A. I rather think I saw him; but I have no recollection of seeing him in Judge Chase's chamber, or with Judge Chase alone.

Mr. Randolph. Did the judge lodge at Crouch's?—is it not a tavern?

A. It is a boarding-house, and no wise distinguished from a tavern. I had never been in the house before Judge Chase's arrival.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever receive any instructions, verbal, or by letter, from Judge Chase, in relation to the grand jury?

A. Never.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable Court whether you did, or did not, on the part of Colonel Harvie, make an application for his discharge from the jury, and on what ground that application was made?

Mr. Marshall. I was at the bar when Colonel Harvie, with whom I was intimately acquainted, informed me that he was summoned on the jury. Some conversation passed, in which he expressed his unwillingness to serve, and stated that he was an unfit person; for that his mind was completely made up, that he thought the (sedition) law unconstitutional, and that, whatever the evidence might be, he should find the traverser not guilty; and requested me, on that ground, to apply to the marshal for his discharge. I told the marshal that Colonel Harvie was extremely desirous of being discharged, and, on his discovering great repugnance to his discharge, I informed him that he was predetermined, and that no testimony could alter his opinion. The marshal said that Colonel Harvie might make his excuse to the court; he observed that he was watched, and, to prevent any charge of improper conduct from being brought against him, he should not interfere in discharging any of the jurors who had been summoned. I informed Colonel Harvie of this conversation, and it was then agreed that I should apply to the court for his discharge, upon the ground of his being sheriff of Henrico county, that his attendance was necessary, as that court was then in session. I moved the discharge of the juror on that ground, and he was discharged by the court.

Mr. Harper. Did you communicate to Judge Chase, or to the court, the reasons which first induced Colonel Harvie to make this application?

Mr. Marshall. I only stated that he was sheriff of Henrico county, and that it was unusual to require the attendance of sheriffs on juries. I believe the marshal was at that time obtaining juries, he had at that time a paper in his hand; and appeared to be setting down the names of persons within his view.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Randolph. Were you in court during a part of the trial, or during the whole of the trial?

Mr. Marshall. I think I was there only during a part of the time.

Mr. Randolph. Did you observe anything unusual in the conduct on the part of the counsel towards the court, or the court towards the counsel, and what?

Mr. Marshall. There were several circumstances that took place on that trial, on the part both of the bar and the bench, which do not always occur in trials. I would probably be better able to answer the question, if it were made more determinate.

Mr. Randolph. Then I will make the question more particular by asking whether the interruptions of counsel were much more frequent than usual?

Mr. Marshall. The counsel appeared to me to wish to bring before the jury arguments to prove that the sedition law was unconstitutional, and Mr. Chase said that that was not a proper question to go to the jury; and whenever any attempt was made to bring that point before the jury, the counsel for the traverser were stopped. After this there was an argument commenced (I think) by Mr. Hay, but I do not recollect positively, to prove to the Judge that the opinion which he had given was not correct in point of law, and that the constitutionality of the law ought to go before the jury; whatever the argument was which Mr. Hay advanced, there was something in it which Judge Chase did not believe to be law, and he stopped him on that point. Mr. Hay still went on, and made some political observations; Judge Chase stopped him again, and the collision ended, by Mr. Hay sitting down, and folding up his papers as if he intended to retire.

Mr. Randolph. There were many preliminary questions, such as, with respect to the continuance of the cause, the admissibility of testimony, &c. Did the interruptions take place on the part of the court only when the counsel pressed the point of the unconstitutionality of the sedition law?

Mr. Marshall. I believe that it was only at those times, but I do not recollect precisely. I do not remember correctly what passed between the bench and the bar; but it appeared to me that whenever Judge Chase thought the counsel incorrect in their points, he immediately told them so, and stopped them short; but what were the particular expressions that he used, my recollection is too indistinct to enable me to state precisely; what I do state is merely from a general impression which remains on my mind.

Mr. Randolph. Was there any misunderstanding between the counsel and the court, and what was the cause of that misunderstanding, or what was your opinion as to the cause, or did you form one?

Mr. Marshall. It is impossible for me to assign the particular cause. It began early in the proceedings and increased as the trial progressed. On the part of the judge it seemed to be a disgust with regard to the mode adopted by the traverser's counsel, at least I speak as to the part which Mr. Hay took on the trial, and it seemed to increase also with him as he went on.

Mr. Randolph. When the court decided the point that the jury had not a right to decide upon the constitutionality of a law, did the counsel for the traverser begin an argument to convince Judge Chase that the opinion which he had delivered on that point was not well founded? Is it the practice in courts when counsel object to the legality of an opinion given by the court, to hear the arguments of counsel against such opinion?

Mr. Marshall. If the counsel have not been already heard, it is usual to hear them, in order that they may change or confirm the opinion of the court, when there is any doubt entertained. There is however no positive rule on this subject, and the course pursued by the court will depend upon circumstances; where a judge believes that the point is perfectly clear and settled, he will scarcely permit the question to be agitated. However, it is considered as decorous on the part of the judge to listen while the counsel abstain from urging unimportant arguments.

Mr. Randolph. In the circuit courts of the United States, after a court is opened for any district, is it the practice of such courts to adjourn over from time to time, in order to hold a court in another district in the intermediate time, and then to return back; or is not the uniform practice to postpone causes when they cannot be conveniently tried, to the next term?

Mr. Marshall. I can only speak of courts where I have attended, in which the practice is, that the business of one term shall be gone through as far as possible, before any other court is held.

Mr. Randolph. Was it ever the practice of any court, in which you have practised or presided, to compel counsel to reduce to writing the questions which they meant to propound to their witnesses?

Mr. Marshall. It has not been usual; but in cases of the kind, the conduct of the court will depend upon circumstances. If a question relates to a point of the law, and is understood to be an important question, it might be proper to require that it be reduced to writing. Unless there is some special reason which appears to the court, or on the request of the adverse counsel, questions are not commonly reduced to writing, but when there is a special reason in the mind of the court, or it is required by the opposite counsel, questions may be directed to be committed to writing.

Mr. Randolph. When these questions are reduced to writing, is it for a special reason, after the court have heard the question, and not before they have been propounded?

Mr. Marshall. I never knew it requested that a question should be reduced to writing in the first instance in the whole course of my practice.

Mr. Randolph. I am aware of the delicacy of the question I am about to put, and nothing but duty would induce me to propound it. Did it appear to you, sir, that during the course of the trial, the conduct of Judge Chase was mild and conciliatory?

Mr. Marshall. Perhaps the question you propound to me would be more correct, if I were asked what his conduct was during the course of the trial; for I feel some difficulty in stating in a manner satisfactory to my own mind, any opinion which I might have formed; but the fact was, that in the progress of the trial, there appeared some—

Mr. Cocke, (a Senator) here interrupted Mr. Marshall, by observing that he thought the question an improper one.

Mr. Randolph said he would not press it, if there were any objection to it.

Mr. Harper. We, sir, have no objection; we are willing to abide in this trial by the opinion of the Chief Justice.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever, sir, in a criminal prosecution, know a witness deemed inadmissible, because he could not go a particular length in his testimony—because he could not narrate all the circumstances of the crime charged in an indictment, or in the case of a libel; and could only prove a part of a particular charge, and not the whole of it?

Mr. Marshall. I never did hear that objection made by the court except in this particular case.

[Some inquiry was here made relative to the above question put by Mr. Randolph, and objected to by Mr. Cocke, which Mr. R. answered by observing that he withdrew it.]

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable Court, sir, whether you recollect that Judge Chase during any part of the proceedings made an offer to postpone the trial of Callender, and if you do, to what time?

Mr. Marshall. I recollect at the time a motion was made for the continuance till the next term, that Judge Chase declared, as his opinion, that it ought to be tried at the present term. A good deal of conversation took place on the subject. The counsel for the traverser stated several circumstances in favor of their client, particularly relative to the absence of his witnesses; but the whole terminated at that time by a postponement for a few days; so many days as, I thought at the time, were sufficient for obtaining the witnesses residing in Virginia. I do not now recollect what the time was, nor do I say it was sufficient. I simply recollect that I thought it was. When the cause came on again, there was no proposition that I recollect on the part of the traverser's counsel for a continuance, but a desire was expressed of a postponement for a few hours in order to give their witnesses time to arrive at Richmond, as it was possible they had been impeded by the badness of the roads; a considerable quantity of rain having fallen the preceding day. There was a declaration on the part of the court that they might take until the next day, and they went on to say they might have a longer time, if they thought it was necessary, but the precise length of time offered I do not recollect; but I do remember that they said the trial must come on before the present term closed.

Mr. Harper. Is it the practice of the circuit courts to hold an adjourned court; and is it not in the power of the circuit court to adjourn the jury, and direct them to meet again at some subsequent time?

Mr. Marshall. That is a question of law I have never turned my mind to.

Mr. Harper. Do you know an instance in which it has been done?

Mr. Marshall. I do not know any instance in which it has ever been done.

The President. Do you recollect whether the conduct of the judge on this trial was tyrannical, overbearing, and oppressive?

Mr. Marshall. I will state the facts. The counsel for the traverser persisted in arguing the question of the Constitutionality of the sedition law, in which they were constantly repressed by Judge Chase. Judge Chase checked Mr. Hay whenever he came to that point, and after having resisted repeated checks, Mr. Hay appeared to be determined to abandon the cause, when he was desired by the judge to proceed with his argument, and informed that he should not be interrupted thereafter. If this is not considered tyrannical, oppressive, and overbearing, I know nothing else that was so.

Mr. Randolph. Was the check given to the traverser's counsel more than once?

Mr. Marshall. There were several interruptions, as I have stated; for whenever the counsel attempted to show the unconstitutionality of the sedition law, Judge Chase observed that it was a point which should not go before the jury, and he would not permit a discussion upon it.

Mr. Randolph. Then it was these checks that induced the counsel to abandon the cause of the traverser. I understood that the counsel were endeavoring to show, without any regard to the jury, that the opinion of the court was incorrect.

Mr. Marshall. That was my impression.

Mr. Randolph. Is it not usual, when the opinion of the court is not solemnly pronounced, to hear counsel?

Mr. Marshall. Yes, sir.

The President. Is it usual for a trial to take place at the same term that the presentment is made?

Mr. Marshall. My practice, while I was at the bar, was very limited in criminal cases; but I believe it is by no means usual in Virginia to try a man for an offence at the same term at which he is presented.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever hear Judge Chase apply any unusual epithets—such as young men, or young gentlemen—to the counsel?

Mr. Marshall. I have heard it so frequently spoken of since the trial, that I cannot possibly tell whether my recollection of the term is derived from the expressions used in the court, or from the frequent mention since made of them; but I am rather inclined to think that I did hear them from the judge.

Mr. Randolph. Are you acquainted with Mr. Wirt; was he a young man at that time; was he single, married, or a widower?

Mr. Marshall. I am pretty well acquainted with him; he is about thirty years of age, and a widower.

Mr. Randolph. Do you know Mr. Norborne Nicholas and Mr. Hay; they practised with you at the bar; did you observe anything in their conduct that required the interposition of the court to check or prevent its consequences?

Mr. Lee objecting to this question, Mr. Randolph said he would decline putting it. Mr. Marshall then withdrew.

Mr. Randolph. The managers think themselves entitled to put to any witness, however respectable his standing in life, any questions which they deem necessary to bring out the whole facts.

The President. If it is not objected to by the counsel for the respondent, nor decided by the court to be irrelevant or improper, the managers will be gratified by having their questions answered.

At the instance of Mr. Randolph, Chief Justice Marshall was again called.

Mr. Randolph. Is it the practice of the courts in Virginia to proceed against a person when indicted for an offence less than felony—say for a misdemeanor—by issuing a capias in the first instance?

Mr. Marshall. My practice, I before stated, had not taken this course; I therefore cannot well say what the usual practice is.

Mr. Harper. I will ask you a question, sir: When Mr. Hay was interrupted by the court, at the commencement of the argument, to show to the jury that they were the judges of the constitutionality of the law, was the interruption that took place one which went to the argument, or barely reminding them of some erroneous opinion delivered?

Mr. Marshall. I believe it was the latter; though I am not certain.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect, sir, whether it was as to the matter, or whether the impression has not been made on your mind by some conversations which you have heard since?

Mr. Marshall. My impressions are, sir, that Mr. Hay pressed the matter of the constitutionality of the law in the manner I have heretofore stated.

Edmund J. Lee, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Were you at the circuit court in the spring of 1800, held at Richmond, at which Judge Chase presided?

Mr. Lee. I was not in court when Callender was presented by the grand jury; but I was when application was made for a continuance, and I remember that Judge Chase, on an application made for a continuance, on account of the absence of some of the witnesses, informed the counsel that he could not continue the cause, but if they would fix upon any determinate time, within which they could obtain their witnesses, without its going over to the next term, the court would postpone the trial. Judge Chase also added that he had no objection to postpone it for a fortnight or a month; I am not certain whether he did not say he would postpone it for a longer time, I do not know but he said for six weeks, but he said positively he would not postpone it to the next term.

He added, if the counsel conceived they could obtain the evidence within the time mentioned, they might have it.

Mr. Nicholson. At what stage of the business was this proposition made?

Mr. Lee. I think it was made after the affidavit was read.

Mr. Nicholson. On what day was it made?

Mr. Lee. I believe it was the first day. I do not recollect when the application for a continuance was first made; it possibly had been before, but I was not in court.

Mr. Nicholson. There was no subsequent application?

Mr. Lee. None, sir.

Mr. Nicholson. How long was it before the jury were sworn?

Mr. Lee. I do not recollect the day of the week on which the jury were sworn, but I remember the offer was made at the time the application for a continuance was made.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect whether the court offered to postpone the trial until all the witnesses could be procured, or whether the offer related alone to those who resided in the State of Virginia?

Mr. Lee. I do not recollect whether the court said anything on that point; but I recollect perfectly that they made the offer to postpone the trial for some length of time, such as I have just mentioned, a fortnight, month, or more.

Mr. Randolph. How far did you understand that more to extend?

Mr. Lee. Not beyond six weeks.

Mr. Campbell. Were the counsel for the traverser present, and did Judge Chase address himself to them?

Mr. Lee. The counsel were present, and I think the judge did address himself to them.

Mr. Campbell. What then was their reply?

Mr. Lee. I do not recollect, if they did say anything, what they said.

John A. Chevalier, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Were you present at the circuit court held at Richmond, in Virginia, in the spring of 1800, on the trial of James Thompson Callender?

Mr. Chevalier. I was at Richmond at the time.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect what took place on the trial of Mr. Callender?

Mr. Chevalier. I was in the court room some few minutes during the trial, but I do not recollect anything that occurred.

Mr. Harper. Why not, sir?

Mr. Chevalier. Because I was too far off to hear anything which was said, and my mind was otherwise occupied.

Mr. Randolph. Pray how long have you resided in the United States?

Mr. Chevalier. About twenty years.

Mr. Randolph. Have you been much in courts?

Mr. Chevalier. I have had very little to do with court business. I had a suit, and it was on that account that I happened to be in court.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect anything remarkable in the conduct of the court while you happened to be present?

Mr. Chevalier. Why, sir, I recollect Mr. Hay's shutting up his books and putting away his papers, and that Judge Chase said to him, when he observed it, sir, you may go on with your speech as long as you please, and I shall not interrupt you any more.

Mr. Harper. Were you at the circuit court of the United States for the Virginia district, in the month of May or June, 1800, held at Richmond?

Mr. Gamble. I was one of the jurors, sir, and I was in court when a motion was made for continuing the cause of Callender to the next term.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect whether an offer was made by the court to postpone that cause?

Mr. Gamble. Yes, sir; Judge Chase said he would postpone it for a week, a fortnight, a month, or more, and I think he mentioned he would postpone it for six weeks, or as long as the term would admit, without its going over to the next term.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect what Mr. Basset's scruples were against serving on the jury?

Mr. Gamble. I recollect that he stated to the court that he had seen extracts in the newspapers that were alleged to be taken from the book called "The Prospect Before Us," and upon that circumstance he made a declaration that if the extracts were faithfully copied from the work, he was satisfied that it would come under the operation of the sedition law. The judge asked him whether he had made up and delivered an opinion on the articles contained in the indictment, and he answered that he had neither seen the indictment, nor heard it read; he therefore could not declare that he had formed any opinion upon it. The judge said in that case he was a good juror and must be sworn.

Mr. Harper. What was understood to have been the subject of indictment?

Mr. Gamble. It was pretty well understood that the indictment was for libellous matter contained in the book called "The Prospect Before Us." I did not know it myself; I was taken that morning to serve as a juror, without any previous intimation. I had not seen either the book or the extracts alluded to, but I had heard them spoken of as being within the sedition law; yet I said nothing to the court after having heard Judge Chase declare that Mr. Basset's objection would not excuse him.

Mr. Harper. Did you understand that Mr. Basset urged it as an objection to serve on the jury?

Mr. Gamble. No, sir, he merely suggested it to the court.

Mr. Harper. Then he did not ask to be excused on that account?

Mr. Gamble. No, sir.

Mr. Randolph. You say that Mr. Basset and yourself informed the court that you had not made up your mind on the charges in the indictment, because you had not read it, and did not know its contents?

Mr. Gamble. I had never read or seen the indictment; of course I had not made up my mind in respect to anything it contained.

Mr. Randolph. Had you made up your mind on the publication of the book called "The Prospect Before Us," from which you believed the charges were extracted?

Mr. Gamble. Sir, I never read the "Examiner" that contained those extracts, nor had I then seen the book called "The Prospect Before Us," although, after the jury retired, in order to determine on our verdict, we were compelled in some degree to read it nearly through.

Mr. Randolph. What induced you to read the book after you retired?

Mr. Gamble. Mr. Basset wished it to be read. The whole book consisted in defamation of the Government.

Mr. Randolph. As that book is a lengthy production, suppose you had read it before instead of after the indictment was read, might it not so have happened that you might have made up your mind as to the publication, and not as to the indictment?

An objection having been made to this question by Mr. Martin,

Mr. Randolph said he would withdraw it, but would ask the witness another question. Do you recollect anything of an offer made to postpone the trial of Callender on the part of the court?

Mr. Gamble. I remember there was a short adjournment of the cause in the first instance, and that an offer was made by the court to postpone the trial for a month or more.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect what that more was?

Mr. Gamble. I do not recollect.

Mr. Nicholson. Was the offer to postpone the cause made before the jury was sworn or after?

Mr. Gamble. I do not recollect at what time it was made.

Mr. Randolph. Did you understand that an objection was to be made against you, sir, as a juror on this trial?

Mr. Gamble. I had understood that I might be objected to, because I had spoken words disrespectful of Callender.

Mr. Randolph. Was evidence offered to show that you had done so?

Mr. Gamble. I acknowledged it myself, and the judge said, notwithstanding, I was a good juror.

Mr. Randolph. Did you speak disrespectfully of Callender, and so declare it to the court, and what had you said?

Mr. Gamble. I had said that I thought him to be a very unworthy character.

Mr. Randolph. How did you understand that you were to be objected to?

Mr. Gamble. I had heard that Mr. — had heard me use this expression, and that it was intended to bring him forward as a witness to prove the fact; this was on the morning of the day of the trial, and just before I was sworn.

Philip Gooch, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable

Trial of Judge Chase.

Court whether you were present at the trial of James Thompson Callender, at a circuit court, holden at Richmond, in the year 1800?

Mr. Gooch. I was in court during a part of the time of that trial; I did not get in until the jury were called, and just before they were sworn; I believe I was not present at the whole of the trial.

Mr. Harper. What was the nature of that trial?

Mr. Gooch. I understood it to be an indictment for a libel upon the President, under the sedition law, and I went on purpose from Amherst county, where I reside, to be present at it.

Mr. Harper. What did you observe relative to the conduct of the court and counsel on that day? State what happened.

Mr. Gooch. When Mr. Basset suggested to the court his wish to be informed whether it was their opinion that he was a proper person to serve on the jury, because he had formed and expressed an opinion on the extracts which he had seen, and declared that if correctly copied from the work called "The Prospect Before Us," the author was within the pale of the sedition law; on that suggestion, I recollect, the court decided, and laid it down as law, that he must not only have formed an opinion, but delivered it also, and the judge gave some reasons why he must not only have formed, but delivered an opinion. I think he said that if a notorious murder was committed in the body of a county, which every man believed ought to be punished with death, and had so formed his opinion, it would in that case be impossible to get a jury to try such an offender, if it were an objection that a man had formed an opinion. I understood that he had consulted Judge Griffin on this point. The court was very crowded, but I had obtained a situation just behind the judges, and had an opportunity of hearing in some degree what passed between them, though not distinctly. Mr. Basset was eventually sworn upon the jury. The cause proceeded. Mr. Nelson (the District Attorney) then opened the case. I am unable to detail all his observations, nor is it material that I should do so; however, he said that the intention of the traverser was to be understood from the matter which had been extracted from "The Prospect Before Us," and laid in the indictment with innuendoes. He examined the witnesses on the part of the prosecution, but I do not recollect that any question was put on the part of the counsel for the traverser in objection to the testimony; but I remember that when Colonel Taylor was called to give testimony on the part of the traverser, the court required his counsel to state what they intended to prove by him, and that Judge Chase required the questions to be reduced to writing; after that was done, I remember that he determined that as this testimony did not go to prove the whole of a charge, it should not be received. He turned to Judge Griffin, and asked him if that also was his opinion; Judge Griffin said it was. Judge Chase added afterwards, in a pleasant manner, to the counsel for the traverser, "you show yourselves to be clever young men, and I believe you know that testimony of this kind ought not to be adduced, but perhaps you do it to blind the people and to work up their minds to a state of opposition;" he then turned to the attorney for the district, and said he was pressed by the counsel to admit the testimony of Colonel Taylor, and that he wished him to give his consent that it should be received. The District Attorney told him that he could not. Judge Chase asked him a second time, to accede to the reception of the testimony of Colonel Taylor; the District Attorney replied he would not, it being inconsistent with his duty.

Mr. Wirt then opened the cause on the part of the traverser; he made some allusion to the court's prohibiting the mode of defence, which the counsel for the traverser had adopted, but he was interrupted by the court, and was told that the decision of the court must be binding for the present; that if they objected, they might file their bill of error, and it should be allowed.

Mr. W. proceeded in the cause, and was endeavoring to show that the sedition law was unconstitutional; the court interrupted him, and told him that what he had to say must be addressed to the court, but if he was going on that point, he must again be informed that the court would not suffer it to be urged. Mr. W. appeared to be in some agitation, but continued his argument, and when he came up to that point a second time, he was again interrupted by the court. Mr. W. resumed his argument, and said he was going on. Judge Chase again interrupted him and said "no, sir, you are not going on, I am going on; sit down." I recollect, also, after the judge had made some observations, Mr. W. again proceeded, and having observed that as the jury had a right to consider the law, and as the Constitution was law, it followed syllogistically that the jury had a right to decide on the constitutionality of a law. Judge Chase replied to him, a non sequitur, sir, and, at the same time, made him a bow. Whether these circumstances took place exactly in the order in which I have mentioned them, I am not positive, but I believe they did. Mr. W. sat down, and the judge delivered a lengthy opinion. He stated that the counsel must argue the law before the court, and not before the jury, for it was not competent for the jury to decide that point, or that the jury were competent to decide whether the sedition law embraced this case or not, but that they were not competent to decide whether the sedition law was Constitutional or not, and that he would not suffer that point to be argued.

Mr. Harper. What was the effect produced by the reply of Judge Chase to Mr. Wirt's syllogism, a non sequitur?

Mr. Gooch. It appeared to me as if it was intended to excite merriment, and if it was so intended, it certainly had that effect, and the same appeared to me to be the motive of the judge in adding the word punctuatim after the words verbatim et literatim. I thought these circumstances were calculated to display his wit. After this, Mr. Hay addressed the court on behalf of Callender, and I recollect he met with some interruptions in the course of his argument, which ended in his folding up his papers, and moving as if he was about to quit the bar. The judge perceiving it, said to him, sir, since you are so captious, you may go on and say what you please, you shall not be again interrupted.

Mr. Harper. When the judge told Mr. Wirt to sit down, did you conceive the conduct of the court to be rude, and peremptory, or was there anything like it in his application of the term "young gentlemen?"

Mr. Gooch. I did not perceive anything rude or intemperate in his conduct, unless it can be inferred from the words themselves, when he said you show yourselves clever young gentlemen, but the law is, nevertheless, not as you have stated it.

Mr. Harper. Was this allusion made to a particular point of the law, which had been agitated, or was it general?

Mr. Gooch. I do not know, sir, to what point of law it applied.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase consult his brother Judge (Griffin) on the several decisions which were made, and did Judge Griffin concur in them all?

Mr. Gooch. I think he privately conversed with Judge Griffin on all the points which he decided; I do not mean that he consulted him at every time at which he stopped or interrupted the counsel.

Mr. Harper. Pray, did Judge Chase say to Mr. Wirt, sit down, or please to take your seat, sir?

Mr. Gooch. I think it was, please to sit down, sir. I think, on that occasion, the judge was proceeding to deliver an opinion of the court, and that Mr. Wirt was standing at the time, and that the judge spoke with a view of letting him have an opportunity of being easy in his seat.

Mr. Harper. Did you attend the trial of James Thompson Callender, at the circuit court of the United States, held in Richmond, Virginia, in May or June, 1800.

Mr. Robertson. I attended during a part of the trial, and I took down what occurred in shorthand. I have my original notes with me, as well as a printed copy. I must, however, observe that the printed copy does not exactly correspond with my short-hand notes. There are four instances of a variation, which I have discovered by comparing it recently with my notes. If I may be permitted to have recourse to those papers, I can give as faithful a narrative, perhaps a more correct one, than when depending altogether on my own recollection. The notes were taken at the time, for my own amusement, and without an idea of their being made public. However, at the request of some of my friends, they were published, I think, in July following.

Mr. Randolph. We have no objection to take the printed statement as evidence on this occasion.

Mr. Robertson then read the printed statement. [As this statement was published soon after the trial, in the newspapers, and was republished by the committee of inquiry of the House of Representatives, its insertion on this occasion has been deemed unnecessary. The variations in the printed statement from the original notes are entirely verbal.]

Mr. Randolph. An observation has been made in your deposition, that Judge Chase consulted with his brother Judge (Griffin) in the opinions which he gave as the opinions of the court; did you see him in the act of consultation, or did you hear him?

Mr. Robertson. I was too busily engaged in writing to have leisure for observing the attitudes or motions of the judges on the bench, but I understood at the time, and my impression is, that they held those mutual consultations.

Mr. Randolph. I observe in this printed deposition, that Judge Chase always speaks in the first person singular, was that his manner of expressing himself?

Mr. Robertson. He spoke in that manner on all those occasions on which I cited him.

Mr. Randolph. How long, sir, have you been in the practice of the law in Virginia?

Mr. Robertson. I have been a practitioner of the law for seventeen or eighteen years in Virginia. I have been a practitioner on the part of the public for several years. I am now a practitioner in two districts, having criminal jurisdiction, as public prosecutor. I have been twelve years employed in the one, and ever since the year 1788 employed in the other.

Mr. Randolph. What is the mode of proceeding in criminal cases less than capital; I mean less than felonies, such as misdemeanors, assaults and batteries, &c.?

Mr. Robertson. I will explain, sir. Misdemeanors, (short of felony,) such as assaults and batteries, are the only offences in which it is the practice to issue a summons, and upon the return of the summons, if the party does not appear, a capias is directed to be issued by the court; but I never knew, in offences of that nature, that a capias was ever issued in the first instance. When I say I do not recollect a capias to have issued in the first instance, I mean to be understood as saying, that I never knew it to be issued, although there are two cases within my knowledge in which offenders, for crimes less than felony, were indicted and tried at the same term. The one was a conspiracy to poison, and the person was bound, under recognizance, to attend at the court which was then sitting. Bail was given in a considerable sum, the trial came on shortly after, and a sentence of fine and three years' imprisonment was pronounced. The other was a conspiracy to set fire to the town of Petersburg. It was examined in the county court, and sent to the court above, the district court. There they obtained a new indictment against the prisoner, and upon that indictment, which was tried at the same term, the person was found guilty, and sentenced also to fine and imprisonment. It was from the heinousness of these offences, I think, that bail was required.

Mr. Randolph. Then, in cases of misdemeanor, not so heinous as to poison a person, or to burn a town, I understand it is your practice, under the laws of Virginia, to issue a summons?

Mr. Robertson. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. Well, sir, at what time is your summons made returnable?

Mr. Robertson. Always to the next term.

Mr. Randolph. Does the trial take place at the next term, sir?

Mr. Robertson. If the party appears, he pleads, and the trial goes over until the next term; if he does not appear, a capias may be awarded, and he is brought in to answer at the next term.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever know a capias to issue in the first instance for a misdemeanor, and the party ruled to a trial at the first court at which he was presented?

Mr. Robertson. No, sir, not in cases of that sort, which I have described.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever ask a man to be ruled to trial for a misdemeanor at the first term?

Mr. Robertson. I never did, sir, if I understand your question.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever hear of an offer made by the court to postpone the trial of Callender?

Mr. Robertson. I have heard it out of doors, but I have stated that I was not present the first day, and it was only the two last days that I was there.

To an interrogatory,

Mr. Robertson answered. In all those cases of misdemeanor to which I have alluded, the punishment is fine and not imprisonment.

The President. When the party comes in on a summons, and the trial does not proceed, is bail required for his further appearance?

Mr. Robertson. I never knew an instance unless it was in a flagitious case. In one of those which I have mentioned, the party was imprisoned, and it was considered as a favor to him, to bring on the trial in order to avoid the imprisonment which must have taken place till the next term. It was, however, considered within the power of the court either to postpone the cause or to bring it on, but I felt it a duty on my part, as public prosecutor, to urge it forward; but I have always thought it in the power of the court, in cases of high misdemeanor or flagitious offences, that the party might not escape the punishment of the law upon conviction, to issue a capias and require bail.

Mr. Randolph. The eighty-third chapter of the Revised Code of Virginia has this clause respecting the mode of proceeding upon presentment.

[Mr. R. here read the passage.]

Mr. Robertson. That is one law on this point; but there is another respecting proceeding upon information, which I will turn to if indulged with the volume. The book being handed to him, after some time, he discovered and read some passages from the 24th, 25th, 26th, and 28th sections, page 305, directing the mode of proceeding on informations.

Mr. Campbell. In the two cases, which you have mentioned, in respect to arson and poisoning, was there an application made for the continuance of either of them?

Mr. Robertson. I do not recollect that there was; I believe there was not.

Mr. Nicholson. Were they proceeded against by indictment or information?

Mr. Robertson. One by information, the other upon indictment. In one case it was impossible to obtain an acquittal, because the facts and the law came up to a conviction, and that notoriously; but in both cases, if they had been continued, the imprisonment would have been for six months longer, the period of the court being half-yearly. As the accused could not procure bail, they would have been confined for six months longer than the period for which they were condemned.

Mr. Hopkinson. Then, if I understand you right, sir, you would have kept those persons in prison, till next term, if they could not furnish bail?

Mr. Robertson. Yes, sir.

MONDAY, February 18.

The Court was opened at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Present: the Managers, attended by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and Judge Chase, attended by his counsel.

William Marshall, called in.

Mr. Randolph. Have you not been clerk of the federal court ever since its establishment?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. Have you ever known an instance of the circuit court adjourning from one time to another, and, in the interim, holding another court?

A. I knew it once to adjourn from Tuesday to Friday. I have never known it to hold another court in the interim.

Mr. Randolph. Was that in relation to a particular case?

A. Yes, sir. The adjournment took place to give the gentlemen of the bar an opportunity of qualifying in the superior court.

Mr. Harper. We have heard in this case much about political opinions, and of the effects they were intended to have on the trial of Callender. What was the political character of Mr. Nelson, District Attorney, at that time?

A. I considered his politics as violently opposed to the then administration of the General Government.

Mr. Harper. Was he in strong and decided opposition to it?

A. He was at that time.

Mr. Harper. Do you know any instances that occurred before Judge Chase went to Richmond, of a decision in the circuit court that the State law of Virginia respecting the assessing the fine by the jury did not apply in that court, and what were they?

A. There had been two instances of indictment in the circuit court at Richmond. In one case Judge Iredell presided, and in the other Judge Wilson. In both, it was decided that the jury should not assess the fine, but the court. The indictment in one case was quashed; and in the other the judgment was arrested, so that the decisions were not final.

Mr. Nicholson. In what manner did the court decide that the jury should not assess the fine?

A. In one case the jury was about to be sworn, when the court said they would certainly assess the fine.

Mr. Nicholson. Was any question made of the right of the jury to assess the fine?

A. It was mentioned; but was not, I think, discussed.

To an interrogatory put,

Mr. Marshall answered, that he knew a case in which a capias issued; it was a case in which a felon was rescued from the civil authority.

Mr. Martin. Was he tried the same term he was arrested?

A. Not in that case; but I have known repeated trials the same term; and in some instances trials have been had the same day the indictment was found.

Mr. Randolph. Have you known motions to be made for a continuance, and what was the decision?

A. I have generally agreed to them; but not as a matter of right.

Mr. Nicholson. In what courts were you public prosecutor?

A. In the court of hustings for the city of Richmond.

Mr. Nicholson. Was that court created by a law of the corporation?

A. No, sir, by an act of the Assembly.

Mr. Nicholson. You stated that, in going to Judge Chase's lodgings, you met Mr. Heath, I think, in the passage?

A. I stated that I was uncertain whether I met him within or without the house.

Mr. Nicholson. Are you rather inclined to think that you met him in the passage?

A. I cannot speak with certainty.

Mr. Nicholson. How is the door of Judge Chase's chamber situated as to the other parts of the house?

A. As well as I recollect there is but one door in a narrow passage leading to Judge Chase's room.

Mr. Nicholson. Are there other doors leading to the passage?

A. I believe there are; but I am not certain; as I have not been at the house since Judge Chase lodged there, and had not been there before.

Mr. Clark. Did I understand you to say that misdemeanors are tried in the same term that the indictment is found?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Clark. How was the defendant got into court?

A. He was bound in a recognizance.

Mr. Randolph. Was it at Crouch's tavern that Judge Chase lodged?

A. I do not know where he lodged. His sitting room was in the upper end of the house.

Mr. Randolph. The house stands on the side of a hill, and may be said to have two ground-floors; was his room on the upper or the lower floor?

A. He sat in a room on the upper floor.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect instances of motions for postponement, which you opposed?

A. Yes, sir. I recollect one such instance, in which a man was charged with receiving a hog's-head of tobacco, and was imprisoned six months and fined one hundred dollars.

President. I understand that you were prosecutor for the commonwealth of Virginia?

A. I was, sir. I was appointed to prosecute for Richmond, while Colonel Innes was Attorney General. I applied to him and to his successor, Mr. Brooks, for information as to the practice; but I could never find that there was a fixed practice. I therefore acted according to my best judgment.

Mr. Harper said that, before he proceeded in the examination of other witnesses, he would correct a misapprehension which had arisen with regard to the testimony of Mr. D. M. Randolph. For the purpose of correcting it, he would read a letter he had just received from that gentleman.

[Mr. Harper here read the letter to show that, though Mr. Hay had, in conversation with Mr. Randolph, stated his opinion that it would be either impossible, or extremely difficult to find Callender, and his belief that he would surrender next term; yet it was not the impression of Mr. Randolph that this was done to influence him in the discharge of his official duty.]

Mr. Nicholson observed, that he wished, at this stage of the trial to suggest a question which had arisen in his mind. Some of the witnesses on the part of the prosecution were absent. He did not know whether the court considered itself authorized to issue attachments for absent witnesses. There were some witnesses absent whose testimony the managers were extremely anxious to obtain. If the court deemed itself authorized to issue attachments, he would make a motion to that effect.

President. The Court cannot take order on hypothetical cases. If any witnesses summoned have disobeyed the orders of the Court, the Court will take proper order for securing their attendance on a proposition being made to that effect.

Mr. Harper. I will proceed to show the practice of the circuit court in the State of Maryland, where Judge Chase resides, and also in Delaware. It has been a common practice in Maryland, ever since the federal courts were organized, to adjourn, whenever a necessity for it appeared to the court to exist. In the State of Maryland there is no limitation to the session of the State courts.

James Winchester, called in.

Mr. Harper. Do you, at an adjourned court, try causes?

A. No doubt. We progress with causes at an adjourned court, in the same manner as at an original court.

Mr. Harper. Do you not try criminal as well as civil actions?

Trial of Judge Chase.

A. I do not recollect any instances of criminal cases. We have very few instances of criminal cases in the circuit court.

Mr. Harper. Has this practice existed as long as the court has existed?

A. It has been the constant practice ever since I was on the bench. A postponement often takes place for the convenience of the bar, to allow time for making up the issues, which cannot be done during the hurry of business.

Mr. Harper. Has Judge Chase ever adjourned the circuit court for Baltimore, and, after holding a court in Delaware, opened the adjourned court at Baltimore?

A. I do not recollect. I think there was one case of an adjournment, during the interval of which he went to Delaware.

Mr. Key. The circuit meets at Baltimore on the first Monday of May, and the general court of Maryland at Annapolis on the first Tuesday of the same month. Do you recollect an instance of the circuit court adjourning the first week in May to September, and that a circuit court was in the mean time held by Judge Chase in Delaware?

A. I do not recollect this precisely. But I recollect the circuit court having adjourned from May to September; and I believe Judge Chase held a court in Delaware in the mean time.

Mr. Randolph. Have you ever known any other judge to make a similar adjournment?

A. I do not recollect. There is very little business in the circuit court, and generally all the business is transacted without a necessity for an adjournment.

Mr. Key. It has been the invariable practice of the circuit court to adjourn to intervening periods between the stated terms, at the discretion of the court; also in the State courts?

A. It has.

William Rawle, called.

Mr. Harper. Please to state what you know of the practice of the circuit court for Pennsylvania as to adjournments and meeting in the intervening time?

A. The first time I recollect the subject to have been discussed in the Pennsylvania district, was when Mr. Jay presided. On some occasion, which I do not remember, it accorded with the views of the court to adjourn for a few days, or perhaps a week. At first I was inclined to doubt whether this could be done. Mr. Jay and Mr. Peters called upon me to state my ideas, and desired me to consider the case and look at the acts of Congress. The next day I gave it as my opinion, that the court had a right to adjourn, as the length of their session was not limited by law. Mr. Jay and Mr. Peters were of the same opinion; but what took place I do not recollect.

I recollect, in 1795, at the trials arising out of the Western insurrection, many of the trials lasted till three or four o'clock in the morning; and that, in one instance, the court adjourned from the 16th to the 18th of the month. I recollect another instance, when Judge Chase presided, where, at the instance of the bar, an adjournment took place until the first Monday in August, and that the court met that day, and did some chancery business.

Another instance in which the question was discussed, was during the trials before Judge Iredell arising out of the Northern insurrection. Mr. Iredell then thought it the safest way for him to come to the court at ten o'clock, and adjourn the court from day to day, stating, however, that he did not know that this was necessary.

The next instance I recollect, was in the year 1804, when Judge Washington presided, when, at my instance, in consequence of large bodies of land having been ordered to be sold, the court adjourned from May to some day in July. I do not recollect any other instances.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect an adjourned court being contemplated to be held in January?

A. I do. Judge Washington agreed with Judge Peters, if the yellow fever should occur at the usual time of holding the court, that the latter should open and adjourn the court. But the calamity not occurring that year, there was no necessity for the adjournment.

Mr. Randolph. Did not the first case you mentioned arise from Mr. Jay having been appointed an Envoy Extraordinary?

A. I do not recollect.

Mr. Hopkinson. Is it not the invariable practice of the court of common pleas to do every species of common business at an adjourned court?

A. Unquestionably. The period of the adjourned court is regularly fixed; and all the jury trials take place at an adjourned court.

Mr. Harper said, that he considered it his duty to do justice to a gentleman, (Mr. Nicholas,) to whose testimony he had alluded in his remarks on opening the defence. He had stated that it could be proved, contrary to his testimony, that he had himself issued a capias in a particular case. He had since inspected the record, and found that it did not warrant the inference.

Mr. Harper then said that, to show what was the practice in Virginia, he would call Mr. E. Lee.

Edmund J. Lee, called.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform the Court whether you are acquainted with the criminal practice in any, and what parts of Virginia.

A. I have been a practitioner of the law for about nine years. My practice has been confined to the upper court in three counties, and to one district court. I have never appeared in the character of a public prosecutor; but generally in defence of the accused. In the county courts of Virginia, the usual practice of presentments for offences not capital, and not prosecuted by way of indictment, is to issue a summons. There are some offences which, according to the laws of Virginia, are tried solely by the court, without the intervention of a jury: such as neglect of duty on the highway, profane swearing, sabbath breaking. When the grand jury present offences of this sort, the penalty attached to a number of which does not exceed five dollars, a summons issues against the party to appear at the next court, and on his appearance the court examine him, and proceed to judgment.

There are also some offences which may be prosecuted before the district court, when the penalty does not exceed—. In these cases the court also proceeds to judgment without the intervention of a jury.

There are other offences solely prosecuted by way of information. On a presentment by a grand jury, a summons issues.

But, in the courts in which I have practised, I have never known a summons against a person to answer an indictment for any offence. The practice in the courts in which I have had occasion to attend, is this: when the party is proceeded against by indictment, the attorney for the State sends the indictment to the same grand jury that found the presentment; they return it a true bill, and a capias is then issued.

Mr. Harper. Then the distinction is between indictable offences, and those founded on presentment or information?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Harper. I understand you to say that it is the practice to issue a capias in cases as low as assault and battery?

A. In the county courts.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect a question lately made under the law of Virginia in the District of Columbia?

A. Yes, sir. In the district court for Alexandria, it has been determined on argument that a capias is the proper process on all indictments; and Mr. Mason, who has for some years prosecuted, on the part of the United States, has, in all cases for assault and battery, issued a capias.

Mr. Harper. And this under the law of Virginia?

A. Yes, sir. The laws of Virginia are, by act of Congress, made the law for Alexandria.

Mr. Lee. Is a capias the mode of process for misdemeanors used in Virginia?

A. That is either used, or a warrant.

Mr. Randolph. I wish to know whether it is regular to take the professional opinions of witnesses?

President. Gentlemen are inquiring into the practice.

Mr. Lee. Is not a capias the usual mode of process for arresting offenders for misdemeanors?

A. I never knew any other mode.

Mr. Randolph. You have mentioned that it is usual for a capias to issue on an indictment. Did you ever know a capias to issue on a presentment?

A. I have not, when the punishment is only fine.

Mr. Randolph. When a capias issued in the cases you have mentioned, when was it returnable?

A. To the next court.

Mr. Clark. Where bail is required, is it not the practice to take the engagement of the attorney instead of security?

A. I have never known an instance.

Mr. Randolph. I think you said you have not been much engaged in this kind of practice?

A. Except in the district court, and some counties of Virginia.

Mr. Harper. You have stated that, in cases where indictments have been found, you have known a capias ordered, but not on a presentment. Have you ever known a man, for an offence of an indictable nature, taken on a magistrate's warrant, and held to bail?

A. Yes, sir; in a case of assault and battery, a magistrate brought the man before him, and compelled him to give security to appear at the next court.

Mr. Harper. In cases of presentment for indictable offences, before the indictment was found, have you ever known a summons issued?

A. No; I do not recollect an instance of any process issued before the finding the indictment.

Mr. Harper. Suppose process should issue before, what do you conceive it would be?

A. I do not know.

Mr. Harper. I will examine one witness more, as to this very variable and doubtful practice.

Philip Gooch, called.

Mr. Gooch said that he had practised thirteen or fourteen years in the district court of Charlotte, and in the county courts, and observed that, when the punishment was only pecuniary, it was usual to issue a summons; and if the party did not appear on the return day, a capias was issued. If the case were important, the general practice was to apply to a magistrate for a warrant, or for the by-standers to carry the offender before a magistrate.

Mr. Harper. It is not, then, an object in your part of the country that offenders should escape?

A. No, sir. A magistrate may issue his warrant, and apprehend persons punishable for misdemeanors. I do not recollect any instance of the kind on a presentment. But at the district court, where Judge Tucker presided, I understood that a capias issued against a person for throwing a stone at the court.

Mr. Harper. Was it on an indictment or presentment?

A. Neither. It was for a contempt of court.

Mr. Harper. They do then punish for contempts in Virginia?

A. Certainly.

Mr. Harper. I will ask you a question relative to another part of this case. Have you ever known an instance in Virginia in which a question was proposed to a juror of this kind—"Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion respecting the matter in issue?"

A. In the county where I resided, the British merchants had a great many claims against the citizens, called British debts, some of which I was employed to prosecute. It was found that it would be impossible to get a jury, if the having formed an opinion was admitted as an excuse, as every man had formed an opinion. The court determined that unless a man had delivered as well as formed an opinion he was a good juror.

Mr. Harper. As the Virginia practice is extremely unsettled, I will proceed to show what the practice of Maryland is, in which Judge Chase was brought up.

Mr. Randolph. I am of opinion that the counsel might as well adduce the law in Turkey. The article only charges the respondent with a breach of the Virginia law.

Mr. Lee. I hold it as undeniable that when a high officer is brought before this high tribunal, charged with high crimes and misdemeanors, he may produce evidence from any source whatever that rebukes the evil intention wherewith he is charged. When testimony is produced by the Managers to show what the judge said in the presence of strangers, jocosely, and with unsuspicious freedom, to prove an evil intent, how comes it, when we attempt to show by indisputable evidence that there was no evil intent, that we are denied the right? This high Court which I have the honor of addressing, is, I apprehend, a court of impeachment, and not of errors. When an error is alleged to have been committed by the judge, shall we be denied the right of adducing evidence to show, that if it was an error, it was common to the judicial tribunals before he was raised to the high place he now holds; that during the whole course of his professional career he retained the opinion, now charged as an error; that in all cases he held and supported this opinion, and that he ever acted under the conviction that he was faithfully discharging his duty; that he sat as a judge in criminal cases for six years; and that it was his uniform practice to have the capias returned to the same term on which it issued, and that it was his practice to try for offences at the same term that they were indicted. Will the court deny this right? If the conduct of the judge shall be deemed an error, will not this be considered as some excuse?

Mr. Randolph said, had he known that his remark would have occasioned so long an argument, he would not have said a word. He was ready to admit as proven that for which the gentleman meant to produce testimony—that the practice was such as they stated it to be in Maryland.

Mr. Key. I understand then that it is admitted to be the universal practice in Maryland in criminal cases, before the indictment is found, to issue a capias or bench warrant.

Mr. Randolph. I admit it.

Mr. Key. And in all cases where there is a presentment, a capias or bench warrant issue instantly.

Mr. Randolph. I admit that it is the general practice.

Mr. Key. That is sufficient.

Mr. Martin. And that it is the general practice to try the first term.

Mr. Nicholson. I admit that this is the case in capital cases; but not in lighter cases, if the party accused oppose it.

Mr. Martin. The reverse is the case. The court will rather avoid pressing a trial in capital cases, where the life of a party is involved.

Mr. Wright said he wished to put a question to Mr. Martin in his capacity of a witness. In what cases have you ever known a bench warrant to issue?

Mr. Martin. I have practised for twenty-seven years: and the invariable practice is to issue a bench warrant immediately on the presentment; in all cases, from the lowest to the highest offences.

President. Is there any difference between a capias and a warrant?

Mr. Martin. They are the same, except that one is issued by a magistrate, and the other by the court.

Mr. Lee here adduced a number of authorities, (the greater part of which he barely referred to,) for the purpose of exhibiting fully the grounds of the defence. As these were again introduced in the arguments of counsel, we shall only, in this place refer to them. He referred to the 14th and 34th sections of the judicial act of the United States; to 2d Dallas, 411—Gilbert's law of evidence, page 307, 308—also page 333—2d Dallas 235, 341.

Mr. Harper said they would proceed to adduce testimony relative to the 7th article.

Mr. Harper. Please to state to the court whether you were present in your judicial character at a circuit court held at Wilmington in 1800, and relate the circumstances which occurred?

A. I attended that court on the 27th of June. Judge Chase presided. I arrived in the morning about half an hour before Judge Chase. We went into court about eleven o'clock. The grand jury was called and empanelled. The judge delivered a charge: they retired to their box; after an absence of not more than an hour they returned to the bar. They were asked by the judge whether they had any bills or presentments to make to the court. They said they had none. The court called on the attorney of the district to say whether there was any business likely to be brought forward. He replied that there was none. Some of the grand jury then expressed a wish to be discharged. Judge Chase said it was unusual for the court to discharge the grand jury so early in the session; it is not the practice in any circuit court in which I have sat. He turned round to me, and said, Mr. Bedford, what is your usual practice? I said it depended upon circumstances, and on the business before the court; that when the court was satisfied there was nothing to detain them they were discharged. Judge Chase then turned to the jury, and observed, "But, gentlemen of the jury, I am informed that there is conducted in this State (but I am only informed) a seditious newspaper, the editor of which is in the practice of libelling and abusing the Government. His name is —, but perhaps I may do injustice to the man by mentioning his name. Have you, gentlemen of the jury, ever turned your attention to the subject?" It was answered, no. "But, resumed the judge, it is your duty to attend to things of this kind. I have given you in charge the sedition act, among other things. If there is anything in what is suggested to you, it is your duty to inquire into it." Headed, "It is high time that this seditious printer should be corrected; you know that the prosperity and happiness of the country depend upon it." He then turned to the attorney of the district, and said Mr. Attorney, can you find a file of those papers? He answered that he did not know. A person in court offered to procure a file. The attorney then said, as a file was found, he would look it over. Can you, said the judge, look it over, and examine it by to-morrow at ten o'clock. Mr. Attorney said he would. Judge Chase then turned to the grand jury, and said, gentlemen, you must attend to-morrow at ten o'clock. Other business was gone into, and the court adjourned about two o'clock.

On my way to Judge Chase's lodgings, I said to him, my friend, I believe you know not where you are; the people of this country are very much opposed to the sedition law, and will not be pleased with what you said. Judge Chase clapped his hand on my shoulders and replied, "my dear Bedford, no matter where we are, or among whom we are, we must do our duty."

The next day we went into court about ten o'clock. The grand jury went to their chamber, and I believe Mr. Read returned with them into court. They were asked if they had anything to offer to the court; and the attorney was called on again to state whether he had found anything in the file of a seditious nature. He had a file of the paper before him, and he said he had found nothing that was a proper subject for the notice of the jury, unless a piece, relating to Judge Chase himself. The judge answered, take no notice of that, my shoulders are broad, and they are able to bear it; but where there is a violation of a positive law of the United States it is necessary to notice it.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase say nothing about a seditious temper in the town of Wilmington in Newcastle county?

A. I do not recollect that he did. The subject has occupied my attention since I saw Mr. Read's testimony given to the committee of inquiry of the House of Representatives; and I have not been able to trace in my mind any recollection of the kind. What I said to the judge shows that I did not hear such remarks. Another circumstance strengthened my conviction that no such remarks fell from him. There was a publication in the Mirror, on the fourth of July, giving an account of the proceedings of the court; in which many circumstances that occurred appeared to me to be highly exaggerated; and yet in that publication no such remarks are ascribed to the judge.

Mr. Harper. Was there anything authoritative or commanding in the language of Judge Chase to the attorney of the district; or was what he said in the nature of a request?

A. It was a request, made in the usual style of a request.

Mr. Harper. Was the business conducted with apparent good humor?

A. It appeared so to me.

Mr. Harper. From what source did the printer obtain his statement of the proceedings of the court?

A. The printer stated that he had it from a person in court.

Mr. Randolph. Was the title of the paper mentioned at the time?

A. I think not. I believe, I suggested the title, when inquiry was made as to the procuring a file.

Mr. Rodney. In what manner did the judge address the grand jury?

A. In his usual manner of speaking; but without passion.

Mr. Rodney. Do you recollect whether on the second day there was not an unusual concourse of people in court?

A. I believe there was.

Mr. Rodney. Did not Judge Chase ask whether there were not two printers in town?

A. I believe he did ask that question.

Mr. Rodney. You do not recollect a suggestion by the district attorney that the paragraph you have alluded to did not come within the sedition law?

A. I do not recollect it.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect the particular expression of Judge Chase when he asked if there were not two printers?

A. He spoke very much in these terms—"Perhaps I am going too far—I may do the man injustice. Have you not two printers?"

Mr. Nicholson. In the town or State?

A. I do not recollect. I think it is more than probable that he mentioned the town.

Mr. Nicholson. You are not certain whether Judge Chase cited the title of the paper?

A. I am not certain.

Mr. Nicholson. What induced you to consider what he said as applicable to the Mirror?

A. We had two papers printed in Wilmington, one of which was federal, and the other, the Mirror, democratic.

Mr. Rodney. Do you recollect whether it is the general practice in Delaware to discharge the grand jury the same day they are empanelled?

A. I believe it is the general practice.

Mr. Randolph. Do you recollect whether the judge, when speaking of the printer, said, "and one of them, if report does not much belie him, is a seditious printer and must be taken notice of. I consider it a part of my duty, and it shall or must be noticed. And it is your duty, Mr. Attorney, to examine minutely and unremittingly into affairs of this nature; the times, sir, require that this seditious spirit, which pervades too many of our presses, should be discouraged and repressed."

A. I have no recollection of such words.

Mr. Harper. Do you know who gave the information to Judge Chase about the printer—was it yourself?

A. It was not—I had not the opportunity, as I came to town at a late hour.

Mr. Harper. Please to state whether you were at the circuit court for Delaware in the year 1800?

Trial of Judge Chase.

A. I attended the circuit court held in Newcastle on the 27th and 28th June, 1800. I was not present when the court opened; but I think I entered the court house while Judge Chase was delivering a charge to the grand jury. After its delivery the grand jury retired; they were absent a short time; and as well as I can recollect before and when they returned, I was either out of the court house, or engaged in conversation with some person out of the bar. I think so, as I have no recollection of the question put to the grand jury, whether they had found any bills, and that put to the district attorney. I entered the bar while there was a pause, and silence prevailed. I recollect that the first circumstance that attracted my attention was the observation of Judge Chase to the grand jury, that since he had come among them, he had been credibly informed that there was a seditious printer within the State, in the habit of libelling the Government of the United States, and having received this information, he thought it his duty to call the attention of the grand jury to the subject. He appeared to me to be proceeding to state the name of the printer; but he did not name him. He said that might be doing injustice to the man, or that it was improper in him. I cannot say which was the term he used. I think he then asked the district attorney if there were not two printers in the State. He answered, that there were. There was then some conversation between the judge and the district attorney. My impression was that it conveyed a request from Judge Chase to the district attorney to inquire into the subject on which he had previously spoken to the jury. Mr. Attorney said that he had not seen the papers. The judge asked him whether he could not procure a file of them. I do not recollect that the name of the printer was mentioned then, or during the whole sittings of the court. Some person at the bar said a file could be procured. Judge Chase asked the attorney, if he could make the inquiry by to-morrow at 10 o'clock. About this time I heard some observations made respecting the discharge of the grand jury on that day. Some of the gentlemen said it was a busy season, that they were farmers, and were desirous of returning to their homes. Judge Chase replied, that might be very true; but that the business of the public was also important; it must be attended to: and therefore he could not discharge them. I do not pretend to say I have pursued the language used. I have only attempted to give my impression of the facts that occurred.

Mr. Harper. Did you hear any such phrase, as this: that a seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington?

A. I do not think I heard such expressions.

Mr. Harper. What was the manner of Judge Chase in addressing the District Attorney?

A. His usual manner; which is always warm and earnest.

Mr. Harper. Did he say anything that was authoritative or imperious to the District Attorney?

A. It did not strike me so.

Mr. Harper. But made a request in the usual way?

A. Yes, sir.—On the second day, a short time after I entered the court, some person spoke to the District Attorney, who soon after, as I supposed, went to the grand jury; in a short time after he returned, and then the grand jury, with a file of papers. The judge inquired of the jury whether they had anything to lay before the court. They said they had not. The same question was put to the District Attorney, who answered there was nothing, unless a certain piece against Judge Chase. Judge Chase said, that was not a proper subject of inquiry; it was only matter that tended to libel the Government of the United States, that was a proper subject of inquiry for the grand jury.

Mr. Nicholson. Is your recollection of what occurred very perfect?

A. I cannot say that it is, after so long a lapse of time, I only state my present impressions of what occurred.

Archibald Hamilton, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform the court whether you were present at a circuit court for Delaware in 1800?

A. I recollect that I was present on the 27th of June. I arrived about ten o'clock, at which time Judge Chase was not there. Some time after, the court was formed, the grand jury was sworn, and Judge Chase delivered a charge. Having retired for about an hour, the grand jury returned to the bar. Judge Chase asked them if they had any bills or presentments to make. Their reply was that they had not. Judge Chase then asked the Attorney of the District if he had no business to lay before them. He said he had not. The jury requested to be discharged. Judge Chase said, it was not usual to discharge them so early, some business might occur during the course of the day. He told them, he had been informed that there was a printer who was guilty of libelling the Government of the United States; his name is—; here he stopped, and said, "perhaps I may commit myself, and do injustice to the man. Have you not two printers?" The attorney said there were. Well, said Judge Chase, cannot you find a file of the papers of the one I allude to? Mr. Read said he did not take the papers, or that he had not a file. Some person then observed that a file could be got at Mr. Crow's. Judge Chase asked the attorney if he could examine the papers by the next morning. Mr. Read said, that under the directions of the court, he conceived it to be his duty, and he would do it.

On the second day the same questions, whether they had found any bills, were put to the grand jury. They answered that they had not. Mr. Chase asked the Attorney of the District if he had found anything in the papers that required the interposition of the jury. He said that he had found nothing which in his opinion came within the sedition law; but there was a paragraph against his honor. Judge Chase said, that was not what he alluded to. He was abused from one end of the continent to the other; but his shoulders were broad enough to bear it.

Mr. Harper. Did the judge say anything of a seditious temper in that State?

A. I do not recollect any such expressions.

Mr. Harper. Were you in the court the whole time?

A. I was.

Mr. Harper. How were you situated?

A. I was directly under Judge Chase, and nothing could fall from him without my hearing it.

Mr. Rodney. Do you recollect whether he mentioned the name of the paper?

A. I do not recollect that he did.

Mr. Rodney. What was the manner of the judge?

A. I saw nothing unusual.

Mr. Rodney. Do you recollect whether his manner made any impression at the bar?

A. On nobody but the printer.

Mr. Rodney. Do you recollect that the District Attorney said he conceived it his duty to inquire into matter of the kind he alluded to?

A. I do.

John Hall, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Were you present at the circuit court for Delaware held in June 1800?

A. I believe I was in court when they met, and when the grand jury were called, and returned into court. I have but a faint recollection of what passed between the court and the jury after they returned; I was at a considerable distance from the court. I was not present the second day.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect what occurred the first day about a printer?

A. I recollect that Judge Chase said, he was credibly informed there was a seditious paper published in the State of Delaware; and he made inquiry of the jury whether anything of that nature had come under their notice. They said it had not.

Mr. Harper. What did Judge Chase then say?

A. I cannot recollect particularly.

Mr. Harper. What did he say afterwards?

A. There was some conversation between Judge Chase and the District Attorney. The judge asked him whether he had seen anything of the kind he had alluded to. He said he had not. The judge asked him if he could procure a file of the papers.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase say anything about a seditious temper in the State of Delaware, or Newcastle county, or in the town of Wilmington?

A. I do not recollect.

Mr. Rodney. Was Mr. McMechin a member of the grand jury?

A. Yes, sir.—He and Judge Chase went to court together.

Gunning Bedford, called.

Mr. Rodney. Did Judge Chase, in a conversation with you, subsequent to the discharge of 8th Con. 2d Sess.—10 the grand jury, complain that he could not get a person indicted in Delaware for sedition, though he could in Virginia.

Mr. Bedford. I have no distinct recollection of that kind. I have some indistinct recollection that in a small circle of friends, though not to me personally, he said some such thing in a jocular way.

Samuel Moore, affirmed.

Mr. Harper. Were you in the circuit court held in Delaware in June, 1800, when it met?

A. No, sir.—I did attend early enough on the first day to hear the charge given to the grand jury. I think I did not attend before twelve o'clock. I attended as a juror. On the next day I attended early, and was in the court-house when the court met. When the jury returned into court, inquiry was made whether they had any bills or présentments to make. They answered no. The court then inquired of the Attorney of the District whether he had any business to lay before the grand jury. He said he had not. While he was making this reply, he rose, and laid hold of a file of newspapers, which I took to be the Mirror of the Times, and while he was in the act of presenting it, he observed that he had not seen anything that in his opinion required notice, unless it were a publication reflecting on Judge Chase, which did not appear to him to come under the sedition law. Judge Chase answered, no, sir; they have abused me from one end of the continent to the other; but it is the Government, and not myself, that I wish protected from calumny. Immediately after the grand jury were discharged.

Mr. Harper. Have you ever seen the printed deposition of Mr. Read on this subject? If you are acquainted with any particular circumstances relative to it, please to state them.

A. I do not know any particular circumstances respecting it.

Mr. Harper. I mean to inquire whether there was any consultation?

A. If you mean a private conversation, it may be improper to state what may be considered as confidential.

Mr. Harper. I will not then ask it.

Mr. Nicholson. If these questions are stated with a view to impeach the testimony of Mr. Read, I hope they will be put and answered.

Mr. Harper. I will state the object of the question. It is to discredit the testimony of Mr. Read by particular circumstances that occurred in a conversation between the witness and him. If the witness knows of no such circumstances, I have been misinformed.

Mr. Rodney. Conscious that nothing which can be stated will in the least invalidate the testimony of Mr. Read, it is my wish, and that of the Managers, to allow the fullest liberty to the witness to state anything he knows.

Mr. Moore. I will answer any questions put, but unless directed, I shall not consider it correct to relate a confidential conversation.

Mr. Harper. I will waive all further inquiry, if the witness deem it indelicate.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Moore intimated that he did so deem it.
Mr. Randolph. I will ask the witness if he ever had a conversation with Mr. Read on the subject?

A. Frequently.

Mr. Randolph. I understand you to say that you do not know anything that goes to invalidate Mr. Read's testimony.

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Randolph. That is all we want.

Mr. Hopkinson here adduced a charge delivered by Chief Justice McKean in November, 1797, in Philadelphia, printed in Claypoole's paper in December, 1797, (respecting alleged libellous publications of William Cobbett.)

Mr. Harper. We will now adduce testimony relative to the 8th article. But before we call our witnesses, I will ask a question or two of Mr. Montgomery.

Mr. Montgomery was called.

Mr. Harper. Will you look at that paper? Is it the publication referred to in your testimony as having been sent to the press?

Mr. Montgomery. Yes, sir.

Mr. Harper. Did you ever send any other publication of the same kind to a newspaper?

A. No, sir.

Mr. Harper. I will offer this publication in evidence, and I will proceed to read it.

Mr. Montgomery. A short time after I returned home, from my recollection at that time, I committed to paper what I conceived to be the substance of the charge delivered by Judge Chase, and made my comments upon it. The court will observe that it refers to other conduct of Judge Chase, in the State of Maryland.

Mr. Harper here read the paper above alluded to from the Baltimore American of the 30th June, 1803, and added, this is the temper of the witness who has on a previous day given his testimony in this court.

Mr. Harper. I will now proceed to show that Mr. Montgomery, in his strong anxiety to get Judge Chase impeached, has remembered things which nobody else remembers, and has heard things which nobody else heard.

Mr. Randolph. I will ask of this court whether the witnesses we have called are not under their protection?

The President. If the counsel, in the testimony they adduce, come up to what they state they can prove, they will not be subject to reproach; if they do not, they merit it.

Mr. Randolph. I have no objection to the counsel impugning the veracity of one witness by the evidence of another, and descanting upon it; but I think they take an improper liberty when they undertake to say, before it is proved, that what is deposed by a witness never passed.

The President. I understand the gentleman to say that he will prove, by another witness, that what has been deposed never did pass.

Mr. Harper. Precisely so, sir.

Mr. Harper. I will ask you whether you were in the circuit court of the United States, held at Baltimore, in May, 1803? I will, however, previously observe that it is not my intention to say or to prove that the witness, when he deposed to certain facts, knew that they had not passed. I mean only to impeach his correctness, and to infer that, as he was angry, he gave to what he heard the coloring of his own feelings.

Mr. Winder. I was present at that court when it was opened, and the jury empanelled, and I heard Judge Chase deliver his charge. After delivering the general and usual charge to the grand jury, he said he begged leave to detain them a few minutes, while he made some general reflections on the situation of public affairs. He commenced by laying down some abstract opinions, stating that that Government was the most free and happy that was the best administered; that a republic might be in slavery and a monarchy free. He also drew some distinctions with regard to the doctrine of equal rights, and said that the idea of perfect equality of rights, more particularly such as had been broached in France, was fanciful and untrue; that the only doctrine contended for with propriety was, the equal protection of all classes from oppression. He commented on the repeal of the Judiciary system of the United States, and remarked that it had a tendency to weaken the Judiciary, and to render it dependent. He then adverted to the laws of Maryland respecting the Judiciary, as tending to the same effect. One was a law for the repeal of the county court system. He also alluded to the depending law for the abolition of two of the courts of Maryland. He said something of the toil and labor and patriotism of those who had raised the fair fabric, (constitution of Maryland,) and said that he saw with regret some of their sons now employed in destroying it. He also said that the tendency of the general suffrage law was highly injurious, as, under it, a man was admitted to full political rights, who might be here to-day and gone to-morrow.

This is the amount of my recollection; and I think I have stated the language of the judge in as strong terms as he himself used. Since I was summoned as a witness I have never seen the charge of the judge, or that published in the National Intelligencer, or by Mr. Montgomery. I concluded that it was most proper not to avail myself of those publications. My impressions, therefore, are altogether unassisted by them.

Mr. Harper. Did you attend carefully to the charge?

A. I did. I am sure no part of it escaped me.

Mr. Harper. Did Judge Chase appear to read it from a paper?

A. I so took it. Occasionally he raised his eyes, but not longer than I should imagine a person would who was familiarly acquainted with what he was reading.

Mr. Harper. Did you hear him use any of those expressions deposed by one of the witnesses—that the Administration was feeble, and inadequate to the discharge of its duties, and that their object was to preserve power unfairly acquired. Did he use any such words?

A. To my best belief, he did not. I have a strong reason for considering my recollection on this point correct. Immediately after the charge was delivered, I conversed with several gentlemen respecting it. It was complained of as harsh, and as containing reflections on those who had brought about the measure alluded to. I reflected on it, and the result on my mind was, that it was couched in polite terms, and that the reflections it contained were entirely matters of inference.

Mr. Harper. Did the judge use any arguments against pending measures?

A. Certainly.

Mr. Harper. Did he mention the present Administration?

A. I believe not. If he had, it would have struck my mind very forcibly.

Mr. Harper. Did he use any such phrase as "degenerate sons?"

A. I have a particular recollection of that, or some such expression. I considered it as a very happy allusion to events which occurred in the State Legislature.

Mr. Harper. You considered it as calculated to have a persuasive influence?

A. That was not my language. The sentiment I think was this: He regretted to see sons taking part in destroying the fair fabric their fathers had raised. He spoke feelingly on this point.

Mr. Harper. Had you any other conversation which tended to impress the substance of the charge on your memory?

A. I do not recollect. I was very attentive to the charge. I observed Mr. S. H. Smith to be present; and it was observed at the time that we might expect to see an accurate statement of the charge from him, as he could detail what he heard with great precision. I recollect to have looked at the statement published in the National Intelligencer at the time it appeared, and I thought it gave a faithful view of the substance of the charge, quite as strong as the charge itself.

Mr. Nicholson. Did Judge Chase say anything of the motives of the members of the Legislature of Maryland?

A. He did, according to my impression.

Mr. Nicholson. What were the motives he ascribed to them?

A. As I understood him, the motive he ascribed to them, was to get rid of the judges, and not the system.

Mr. Nicholson. He did certainly, then, allude to the motives of the members of the Assembly of Maryland?

A. I think he did. If he did not, that was the impression produced on my mind by what he said.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect whether Judge Chase did at the close of his charge recommend to the members of the grand jury to return home, and prevent certain laws from being passed?

A. I think that was the result which he drew from what he had previously said.

James Winchester, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Please, sir, to state to this court your recollection respecting a charge delivered by Judge Chase in the circuit court of Maryland in May, 1803?

Mr. Winchester. As already stated, that court sat in May, 1803, in a room in Evans's tavern. The court and gentlemen of the bar sat round several dining tables. I sat on the left of Judge Chase, and the jury were on his right. He addressed a charge to them; the beginning of which was in the usual style of such addresses. He then commenced what has been called the political part of the charge, with some general observations on the nature of government. He afterwards adverted to two measures of the Legislature of Maryland; the first related to an alteration of the Constitution on the subject of suffrage; the other contemplated an alteration in the judiciary. He commented on the injurious tendency of the principle of universal suffrage, and deprecated the evil effects it was likely to have. Incidental to these remarks, he adverted to the repeal of the judiciary law of the United States. I say incidental, for my impression was that his object was to show the dangerous consequences that would result to the people of Maryland from a repeal of their judiciary system, and to show that as the act of Congress had inflicted a violent blow on the independence of the federal judiciary, it was more necessary for the State of Maryland to preserve their judiciary perfectly independent. I was very attentive to the charge for several reasons. I regretted it as imprudent. I felt convinced that it would be complained of; and I am very confident from my recollection, and from the publications respecting it, which I afterwards perused, that all the political observations of the judge related to the State of Maryland.

Mr. Harper. Did the judge appear to deliver the charge from a written paper?

A. I have sat in the circuit ever since 1800. Judge Chase has a kind of standing form in his charges on the general subject of crimes and offences. When there is much business expected to be transacted he goes into a detailed view of the duties of a grand jury. When there is little business he contents himself with a charge of a different form. When he delivered this charge, he had in his hand a marble covered book.

Mr. Harper. (Showing him a book.) Do you think this was the book?

Mr. Winchester. I believe it was. There were occasional pauses during the delivery; he turned backwards and forwards, and read sections from different parts of the book. At the conclusion of particular sentences he lengthened out the tones of his voice, and made a pause, as if to arrest the attention of the jury. Though I cannot say that there was not a word or expression introduced that was not written, yet my impression is that he delivered the whole from the book before him.

Mr. Harper. Did you hear any expressions applied to the present Administration, or was the Administration mentioned at all?

A. My impression is very strong that neither the present Administration was mentioned, or the views or designs of any member of it in any manner whatever. I am confident of this, because if such remarks had been uttered, they would have made a strong impression on my mind.

Mr. Harper. Did you ever hear the judge allude to such topics in his charges?

A. I never heard Judge Chase in any of his charges reflect on any Administration. I have heard a great many charges of his, containing political matter, and they have been all rather calculated to support the existing Administration.

Mr. Harper. Have you heard any since 1800?

A. I recollect no particular charge delivered by him since that time.

Mr. Harper. Was the general tenor of his charges since and before 1800 calculated to support the laws?

A. I think there has been this difference. Those delivered before 1800 called on the jury to support the measures of the Government as wise and upright; since that period he has made no allusion to the measures of the Administration.

Mr. Harper. But his general practice has been to recommend to them the observance of law, and the support of government?

A. He generally addressed the jury on the necessity of obeying the laws: that has been the tenor of his charges at all times.

Mr. Key. In a criminal case, when a question of law arises, is not the opinion of the court always taken?

A. Except in a case which occurred between the present Secretary of the Navy and myself. [The details of this case were not heard.] I never knew an instance in which the direction of the court was not taken, and I know no instance in which counsel attempted to controvert the opinion of the court on a point of law.

Mr. Key. Have you ever known counsel address a jury on a point of law after it had been decided by the court?

A. Never.

Mr. Martin. Would it not be deemed indecorous to do so?

A. I have always thought so.

Mr. Nicholson. I will ask you whether Judge Chase recommended to the jury, on their return home, to use their exertions to prevent the adoption of a depending law?

A. I do not know whether the recommendation came from the judge in language and terms. I rather think it flowed as an inference from what he had said.

By a Senator. In any criminal or civil case, did you ever know the court give an opinion without being required by counsel?

A. I recollect no instance, except in a general charge to the grand jury, or in summing up the testimony at the end of the trial?

Mr. Randolph. I will ask whether the case you allude to is, after both parties have been heard, at the end of the trial?

A. Certainly, sir.

Mr. Martin. I will ask you whether in any case, where the law is settled, and counsel go into an argument on the point of law, the court do not frequently stop them?

A. It is difficult to give a correct answer to this question. It is certain that it often happens, that in arguments on points of law, the court check the counsel, and say they are too clear to be controverted, and, to prevent delay, beg the counsel to pass over them.

TUESDAY, February 20.

The Court was opened at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Present: the Managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives, and Judge Chase attended by his counsel.

At the instance of Mr. Harper,

Edward Tilghman was called.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect any instance of an adjournment of the circuit courts of the United States?

Mr. Tilghman. I recollect in the year 1801, that at a circuit court of the United States, where Judges Tilghman, Griffith, and Basset were on the bench, which was held at Philadelphia, there was an adjournment on the 26th or 27th of October to some day early in January ensuing. The court adjourned because they were obliged to hold a court in Bedford, which was in the western district of Pennsylvania. I recollect that in the court held in Philadelphia, they were not able to go through the business before them, particularly in the case of Peter Blight's assignees. The court consulted with the bar on the adjournment, and the sentiment was unanimous that an adjournment could take place. After the court was held in Bedford, it was again held in Philadelphia, in the month of January; the cause I have mentioned was tried, and I believe several others.

Mr. Harper. What is the distance of Bedford from Philadelphia?

Mr. Tilghman. I believe between one hundred and one hundred and fifty miles. In the last year in the month of May, while Judge Washington was holding a court in Philadelphia, he learned that an attempt had been made to set fire to his house; in consequence of that circumstance and the situation of his family he was obliged to leave town. He and Judge Peters consulted on the course proper to be pursued in case the yellow fever should be in Philadelphia at the usual time at which the court met, and it was agreed that Judge Peters should in that case open the court and adjourn it over to January. This was agreed after consulting the bar, and I do not recollect that there was any difference of opinion among them. The court had commenced in April, and this determination was made some time in May.

Mr. Martin. Did the judges, after holding a court at Bedford, return to their homes before the adjourned court was held in Philadelphia?

Mr. Tilghman. According to my impression they certainly did; there was little or no business done at Bedford, where they either broke up the day on which they met, or on the day after.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Randolph. Have you ever known of a bill of exceptions in a criminal case in the courts of the United States?

Mr. Tilghman. Never. I recollect in the case of the United States vs. Worrell, which was an attempt to corrupt Mr. Tench Coxe, the verdict was against the defendant, and there was an arrest of judgment. There was a division of opinion whether it was an offence at common law, and there was a talk of a writ of error. It was said at the bar a writ of error would not lie, and I think when it was mentioned to the court, they said the same thing, under the idea that writs of error were confined to civil cases.

Thomas Chase, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Please to look at that paper, (showing a paper.) Do you know the handwriting of it?

Mr. Chase. I do not.

Mr. Harper. Will you look at that book; do you know whose handwriting it is?

Mr. Chase. I do.

Mr. Harper. Did you copy it?

Mr. Chase. I did.

Mr. Harper. This is exhibit No. 8, (charge of Judge Chase,) it contains the whole of the charge; from what page did you copy it?

Mr. Chase. From page 13 to the words "fathers erected."

Mr. Harper. From what did you copy the book?

Mr. Chase. From a paper in my father's handwriting, except some few words interlined by way of correction.

Mr. Harper. When did you copy it?

Mr. Chase. A few days before May term 1803.

Mr. Martin. Have you made any alterations in it since?

Mr. Chase. No, sir.

Mr. Harper. We will offer this book in evidence.

Philip Moore, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Do you know that book? (Showing him the same book above referred to.)

Mr. Moore. Judge Chase is in the practice of delivering his charges from a book. I saw him deliver his charge in May, 1803, from a marble-covered book, which I believe is the same with that book.

Mr. Harper. Did he appear to read the whole time he was delivering that charge?

Mr. Moore. He appeared to me to do so; he occasionally raised his eyes from the paper before him, and spoke with more than common emphasis, but he still appeared to speak from the book.

Mr. Harper. Did you hear anything said by him about the present Administration?

Mr. Moore. I have never heard the judge in courts of justice speak of the present Administration.

Mr. Harper. Do you think in the charges he said anything about the Administration?

Mr. Moore. I do not.

Mr. Harper. Had he made any such remarks, are there any peculiar reasons why they would have made a strong impression on your mind?

Mr. Moore. I think they would have made a strong impression, as my impressions were always in favor of the administration, while Judge Chase's were against them.*

Mr. Randolph. Was there any recommendation to the jury, when they returned home to use their influence to prevent the passage of certain laws?

Mr. Moore. I do not know that there was; there may have been, but if there was, I have no recollection of it.

Walter Dorsey, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform the court whether you were at a circuit court held at Baltimore in 1803?

Mr. Dorsey. I was.

Mr. Harper. Were you present when Judge Chase delivered a charge to the grand jury?

Mr. Dorsey. I was.

Mr. Harper. Was you in such a situation as to hear that charge?

Mr. Dorsey. I was.

Mr. Harper. Were you near Mr. Montgomery?

Mr. Dorsey. I was; I think there was only one person between us.

Mr. Harper. Did you attend to the charge?

Mr. Dorsey. I attended to what is generally called the political part of it, because it was novel, and contained speculations with respect to government in general, and remarks on national and State laws.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect anything in it respecting the Administration?

Mr. Dorsey. I do not, I recollect a part of it relating to the State and national judiciary, and to universal suffrage. I did not hesitate to state that it was an indiscreet thing; my attention was particularly drawn to it by seeing in the room the editor of a newspaper, and from expecting that it would be the subject of newspaper animadversion.

Mr. Harper. Do you think Judge Chase made any remarks relative to the present Administration?

Mr. Dorsey. I do not. I have no distinct recollection of any such. I think if he had made such remarks, I should recollect them; there is another circumstance of which I am not positive, whether he did at the end of the charge, recommend to the jury to use their exertions to repeal certain laws of the State of Maryland, or whether I drew a construction in my own mind to that effect, from what he said, I cannot say, though it is impressed on my mind that the former was the case.

Mr. Harper. Did he appear to read the charge?

Mr. Dorsey. He did, he appeared occasionally to throw his eyes off the paper.

Mr. Harper. Did he appear to throw his eyes off for a longer time than is usual with a person who is reading his own composition?

Mr. Dorsey. No, he did not.

Mr. Harper. You are of opinion that he read the whole from a book?

Mr. Dorsey. It appeared so to me.

Trial of Judge Chase.John Purviance, sworn.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable Court whether you was present at a circuit court held at Baltimore in May, 1803?

Mr. Purviance. I was.

Mr. Harper. State what happened on that occasion.

Mr. Purviance. I do not pretend to recollect everything which occurred; but as I attended to what Judge Chase said in his charge to the grand jury, I think I have a pretty distinct recollection as to the manner in which he delivered that address; he appeared to me to read the whole from a written paper laying before him. I never expected that this inquiry would have been made of me, and after such a lapse of time I can only speak of the impressions now on my mind.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect whether Judge Chase made any mention of the present Federal Administration, and what was it?

Mr. Purviance. I have no recollection that he mentioned it, but as it was identified with the repeal of the law for establishing the circuit court of the United States, and so far as the Executive composed a part of the Legislature, he may have mentioned the Administration.

Mr. Harper. Was there any particular mention or allusion to the Executive of the United States?

Mr. Purviance. No, sir, nothing of the kind; I have endeavored to retrace in my mind everything which was said, and I have not the smallest recollection that any remark was made upon the Executive Department of the United States.

Mr. Harper. Was there nothing said about preserving power unfairly obtained?

Mr. Purviance. I think if such an expression had been used, it would have struck me forcibly, for shortly after the charge had been delivered, in a conversation among some gentlemen on its contents, it was declared that the sentiments expressed by Judge Chase were impeachable. I thought these kind of charges ought not to be delivered from the bench, but I did not observe that anything which had fallen was of a nature to warrant an impeachment.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable Court whether you are accustomed to practice law in the courts where Judge Chase presides?

Mr. Purviance. I am, sir.

Mr. Harper. Is it not his practice frequently to interrupt counsel?

Mr. Purviance. I think so; but I always attributed it to his quickness of apprehension, which induced him rather to anticipate counsel than to listen to them; this I always ascribed to his superior sagacity.

Mr. Harper. Have you seen any difference in his interruptions between counsel with whom he was supposed to be on ill terms, and those with whom he was on good terms?

Mr. Purviance. I never observed any difference in his conduct arising from a consideration of persons, but it always appeared to me to arise from the manner in which gentlemen treated the subject.

Mr. Harper. Were there gentlemen at the bar with whom Judge Chase was not on good terms?

Mr. Purviance. I think there were.

Mr. Harper. Did you ever know Judge Chase after having decided a point, hear counsel against his own opinion, and upon hearing, induced to decide differently?

Mr. Purviance stated a case in which the judge had retracted his opinion upon argument in a case in which he had been employed, and added that notwithstanding the pride of opinion to which men were liable, he had observed in Judge Chase an almost unparalleled disposition to hear his opinions contested, and when mistaken to relinquish them.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable Court whether you was at a circuit court held in May, 1803, when a charge was delivered by Judge Chase to the grand jury.

Mr. Brice. I was there and attended to the charge very particularly.

Mr. Harper. Was that charge spoken extempore or was it read from a book?

Mr. Brice. I kept my eyes steadily upon the judge, and I conceived that he read the whole from a paper, as is customary with him in delivering a charge to the grand jury.

Mr. Harper. Have you a distinct recollection of the latter part of the charge?

Mr. Brice. I have no recollection of the words, but I think I recollect their general nature and tendency.

Mr. Harper. Did he say anything respecting the present Administration?

Mr. Brice. Not in the slightest manner, further than mentioning the repeal of the judiciary law of the United States, which he mentioned incidentally in the course of his observations on the alterations of the Judiciary system in the State of Maryland. One thing more I will add, with respect to the advice which it is alleged he gave to the grand jury: shortly after the charge was delivered, in talking over this subject with Mr. Stephen, I recollect that I rather thought it was an inference drawn from the charge, than any express advice of the court on that point. Indeed I am pretty sure the words were not used.

Mr. Martin. Do I understand you right? You say he had no allusion to the present Administration, but in connexion with the repeal of the law of the United States as it was likely to affect the State of Maryland.

Mr. Brice. So far as I recollect, he made use of no other expression, but mentioned the repeal of that law to show the evil tendency of such measures as it regarded the judiciary of Maryland.

Mr. Harper. Please to inform this honorable Court whether you were present at the circuit court held in Baltimore in May, 1803, and what occurred at that time?

Mr. Boyd. I was there, but I do not know whether I was there at the opening of the court, but I was there when the charge was delivered to the grand jury. After Judge Chase had gone through that part of the charge which is an instruction to the grand jury relative to the duties of their office, he proceeded to make some further observations, to which I paid particular attention because they were novel to me. I was under an impression at the time that Judge Chase was watched.

Mr. Harper. Did the judge read the charge from a book?

Mr. Boyd. To the best of my recollection he did read it, but he cast his eyes off from time to time, in the manner described by Mr. Montgomery. I thought at the time the political part of the charge would bear hard upon him, because I observed Mr. Montgomery paying particular attention to the address of the judge, which was an animadversion upon the measures Mr. Montgomery had been anxious to carry in the Legislature of Maryland. I do not, however, recollect the words which were used; those who paid it more attention are likely to be more correct.

Mr. Harper. Did that charge contain a sentiment like those you have heard, that the present Administration was weak, or wicked, &c.?

Mr. Boyd. I have not a scintilla of recollection of a word of the kind, no further than as an inference to be drawn from what was said in relation to the repeal of the Judiciary law. I have, however, a faint trace of the idea in my mind, not from my own recollection, but from having repeatedly heard it stated that there was such a remark made in the charge.

Mr. Harper. Have you any reason to believe that if such an expression had been used it would have struck you so forcibly as to enable you now to recollect it, and what is the reason?

Mr. Boyd. The reason is this. I thought a charge of that kind was both imprudent and improper; reflecting on the present Administration, of which he formed a part, I should have remarked it in a particular manner; and it is for this reason I think he did not use it. If he did, it has wholly escaped my recollection.

Mr. Harper. Inform this honorable Court whether you was present at the circuit court held at Baltimore, in May, 1803?

Mr. McMechin. I was present and heard the charge delivered by Judge Chase to the grand jury.

Mr. Harper. Was you in a situation to hear the charge distinctly? How near was you to the judge?

Mr. McMechin. I was near the door of the room, about five yards distant from the judge. I saw the judge delivering the charge, but whether he kept his eyes constantly on the book I cannot say, as I did not keep my eyes steadily upon him; but it appeared to me that he read from the book throughout.

Mr. Harper. Have you a recollection of the latter part of that charge?

Mr. McMechin. I think I have.

Mr. Harper. Have you any recollection of his having said anything against the present Administration?

Mr. McMechin. I have no recollection of anything of the kind, either that they were weak, or of their having unfairly acquired power; such an idea was mentioned in no way, unless it be inferred from the remark on the repeal of the law establishing the sixteen circuit judges.

Mr. Harper. If such a sentiment had been uttered, it would not have escaped your notice?

Mr. McMechin. I think it would not.

Mr. Harper. Had you any conversation about this charge? If you had, please to inform when, with whom, and what was it?

Mr. McMechin. About five minutes after the charge was delivered I left the court room: going down stairs I met Mr. Montgomery, and I asked him, or he asked me, what was thought of the charge? After a few observations, he said it was such an one as Mr. Chase would be impeached for. This drew my attention pointedly to the charge itself; after this, I heard of the publication in the American, but I did not see it. I met afterwards with a publication in the Anti-Democrat, which paper I took, purporting to be the charge of Judge Chase. I have conversed with gentlemen of both parties on the publication, and it appeared to them as it did appear to me, and as I still think it is, substantially the charge delivered by the judge.

Mr. Harper. Has that opinion rested on your mind ever since you heard the charge and read the publication?

Mr. McMechin. It has always so rested on my mind, and I have never read anything on the subject since.

Mr. Harper. Was you at the circuit court of Baltimore in May, 1803?

Mr. Govane. I was, and heard the charge delivered by Judge Chase. The room in which the court was held was a long one, in a tavern; a range of tables formed the bar, and the seats around were occupied by professional gentlemen. I went to the bottom of the table, opposite to Judge Chase, and directed my attention towards him. Whilst he was delivering his charge he appeared to read it from a book, but generally ended the sentences by looking towards the grand jury; except this circumstance, he appeared to read the whole time.

Mr. Harper. Do you retain a distinct recollection of the substance of what the judge said?

Mr. Govane. I think I do.

Mr. Harper. Do you remember any part containing animadversions on the present Administration, such as that they were weak, feeble, or incompetent?

Mr. Govane. I think no such words were used. If I could swear to a fact negatively after such a lapse of time, I could swear that no such expressions fell from the judge. He said that a Monarchy might be free, and a Republic a tyranny; and then proceeded to define what a free government was.

Mr. Harper. Then you have no recollection of any reflection made upon the present Administration?

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Govane. I have not the most distant idea that such an expression was used.

Mr. Harper. Would you have remembered them if they had been used?

Mr. Govane. I think I should, as I had a conversation with a friend respecting it soon after it was delivered; and I paid particular attention to the charge, because it came from Judge Chase, a man of great celebrity, and I wished to draw what information I could from such a respectable source; everything arrested my attention, and it appeared that the attention of the whole company was fixed upon the judge.

Mr. Harper. Did you attend the circuit court held at Baltimore in 1803, and in what capacity?

Mr. Campbell. I attended that court as a grand juror and was appointed foreman.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect the charge that was then delivered by Judge Chase?

Mr. Campbell. I recollect some parts of it, but not the whole. I paid a particular attention to that part which described my duties as a grand juror, and have some recollection of the latter part. I kept my eyes constantly upon the judge.

Mr. Harper. Did he read the charge, or speak it extempore?

Mr. Campbell. He appeared generally to read it, taking off his eyes from the book from time to time, but never for a longer time than what is usual for men to express the words they retain in their memory from their own composition.

Mr. Harper. Have you a distinct recollection of the latter part of the charge?

Mr. Campbell. I cannot say I have a distinct recollection of any particular part of the charge, though I remember its general tendency.

Mr. Harper. Do you remember to have heard the present Administration censured as weak, feeble, or incompetent, &c.?

Mr. Campbell. I have not the slightest recollection of any such expressions, if they were used they have altogether escaped my memory.

Mr. Harper. Was there any allusion to the present Administration?

Mr. Campbell. No, sir.

Mr. Harper. If such words were uttered, is there any circumstance which would have impressed them on your memory?

Mr. Campbell. I should have thought them very improper, and that would have fixed them in my mind, but I have no trace of any such impression.

Mr. Nicholson. You gave a deposition before the committee on this point?

Mr. Campbell. I did, sir.

Mr. Nicholson. Did you say that the judge recommended to the jury, when they returned home, that they should use their influence to prevent the passage of certain laws then pending before the Legislature of Maryland?

Mr. Campbell. It does appear still to me that I heard some such expression. I have thought of it repeatedly since; and I continue to believe that the judge gave the jury that advice.

Mr. Harper. Was the exhortation made by the judge, or is it an inference you draw in your own mind?

Mr. Campbell. Some such expression fell from him, and it is not an inference formed in my mind.

Mr. Harper. Were you present at the circuit court held at Baltimore in 1803?

Mr. Cranch. I was. The court was held at Evans's tavern, in Baltimore. Judge Chase was seated in an arm-chair, at one end of a long table placed before him. The grand jury were on his right, some sitting on benches placed along the wall and others standing. I stood myself about fifteen feet from the judge, who was sitting during the whole time he was delivering his charge; he generally held the book in his hand.

Mr. Harper—(showing a book.) Is that the book?

Mr. Cranch. He appeared to be reading from such a book.

Mr. Harper. Did he read the whole, and did he read constantly?

Mr. Cranch. He appeared to me to read the whole charge, but I did not keep my eyes so constantly fixed upon him as to declare positively that he did.

Mr. Harper. Were there variations in his manner of delivering the charge, as if he was at one time reading and at another speaking ex tempore?

Mr. Cranch. He delivered some parts with more emphasis than others. He often raised his eyes from the book, but I did not observe that he repeated more than one sentence without recurring to the book; he repeated no more than a man might repeat after running his eyes hastily over a passage.

Mr. Harper. Did he raise his eyes for a longer time than a man might be supposed to do who was reading a composition of his own?

Mr. Cranch. I do not think he did.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect the latter part of the charge?

Mr. Cranch. I recollect more of the latter part than of the beginning, because I paid more attention to the latter part.

Mr. Harper. Do you recollect any sentiments expressed relating to the weakness of the present Administration, and that they were not employed in promoting the public good, but in preserving ill-gotten power?

Mr. Cranch. No, sir, there was no such expression, as I recollect.

Mr. Harper. Was there any expression at all relative to the present Administration?

Mr. Cranch. Not as an Administration, nor anything alluding to the Administration separate from the Government of the United States.

Mr. Harper. In what way was the Government alluded to?

Mr. Cranch. By alluding to the repeal of the act of February, 1801, for the establishment of the circuit judges. I recollect no other measure of the General Government which was alluded to, or any allusion to the present Executive.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Harper. I will now offer in evidence the book containing the charge of Judge Chase at Baltimore, which has been proved to be that from which he read his charge; it will be unnecessary to read it as it is left on file, and we wish to save the time of the court.

The written book was then returned to the clerk's table.

Mr. Harper said he wished to ask a question of Mr. McMechin.

Mr. McMechin was called, and Mr. Harper inquired if he had rightly understood him, when he said that a few minutes after he had left the court room he met Mr. Montgomery on the stairs, and Mr. Montgomery stated to him that Judge Chase would be impeached. Did Mr. Montgomery at that time say for what he would be impeached, or that he would be impeached for reflecting upon the Administration?

Mr. McMechin. He said the judge would be impeached, but I do not recollect that he said any thing about his being impeached for reflections upon the present Administration. I thought he felt hurt on the subject of the alterations in the Judiciary of Maryland, which had been much talked of, and for which he had been an advocate in the State Legislature.

Mr. Harper. In order to show that it is the custom of the courts in this country to deliver political charges to the grand juries (a practice which I am ready to admit is indiscreet,) I wish to be indulged in a narration of what has been the practice, and then this honorable Court will be convinced that it did not originate with the present respondent, but that he followed the track which had been a long time marked out. For this purpose I will refer to several transactions which have taken place. First in the year 1776, on the 27th April, an address was made to the grand jury in the State of South Carolina, by William H. Drayton, (vol. 1 of Ramsay's history of South Carolina, page 103.) A further evidence that the custom obtained is derived from the address of the executive council of Pennsylvania, wherein it is recommended that the judges of the Supreme Court make mention in their charges of various subjects of a political nature; it is under date of October 8th, 1785—American Museum, vol. 1, p. 228. I will also offer in evidence a charge delivered by Judge Iredell in Pennsylvania, previous to the trial of Fries in 1799. I will adduce that part only which may be denominated political.

I will also offer in evidence the general notoriety of the practice in this country for thirty years past, to enforce from the bench political principles, and to defend political measures; a practice which we contend universally prevailed.

I will submit a paper yesterday referred to as evidence on the 7th article; a charge delivered by Chief Justice McKean on the 27th November, 1797. In this charge the learned judge, whose eulogium has been so boldly pronounced, discusses the doctrine of libels, and after a variety of pertinent observations, goes on as follows:

Exhibit No. 7 contains extracts from the Mirror of the Times, which are offered for the purpose of verifying the statement of the respondent; the first is contained in the paper of Wednesday, February 5, 1800, and the second in that of February 8th.

Mr. Randolph. The exhibits are those which accompanied the respondent's answer and pleas.

Mr. Martin. They are, and we here close our testimony, adding only the letter of Governor Claiborne, who has acted on the same principle, and given to the world his political opinions on various subjects.

Mr. Randolph. One of our witnesses has arrived in town, and we wish that he should be called.

Thomas Hall was called, and sworn.

Mr. Nicholson. Were you at Baltimore when the charge was delivered by Judge Chase, and do you recollect the language he made use of in addressing the grand jury?

Mr. Hall. I do not recollect the particular language used. I paid very little attention to what was there transacted.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect the subjects generally on which he spoke?

Mr. Hall. I have a general impression, but I cannot be particular.

Mr. Nicholson. Did he mention the present Administration as weak and feeble?

Mr. Hall. My impression is that he mentioned them, or I inferred it from what was said.

Mr. Nicholson. Did he mention them in such a way as to cast an odium upon them?

Mr. Hall. I could not identify the language of Judge Chase, even if it were laid before me.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect his recommendation to the jury to use their exertions to prevent the passage of particular laws?

Mr. Hall. I think he used language in substance to that effect.

Mr. Nicholson. In what way did he speak of the Administration?

Mr. Hall. I do not recollect particularly the manner.

Mr. Nicholson. Is it your general impression that he mentioned the Administration?

Mr. Hall. I think he did, or else I inferred it from what he said.

Mr. Randolph. Although you do not recollect the precise expressions of the judge, you inferred from what he said that his design was to convey to the by-standers the idea that the Administration was weak or wicked?

Mr. Hall. Yes, sir, those are my impressions.

Mr. Nicholson. Were you on the jury?

Mr. Hall. Yes, sir, I was on the petit jury.

Mr. Rodney here adduced a list of the grand jury for the circuit court held in the year 1800, in the State of Delaware.

Mr. Randolph wished that Mr. George Hay might be called to explain part of his testimony; that part which related to the conversation between the marshal and himself, when the former was in pursuit of Callender.

Trial of Judge Chase.

George Hay was accordingly called.

Mr. Randolph. Did you endeavor to dissuade the marshal from the execution of his duty in the arrest of Callender?

Mr. Hay. I certainly did not, and Mr. D. M. Randolph could not mean to convey to this honorable court that idea. I should have been prevented from doing this by two considerations, one exclusively relating to myself, which I need not explain; the other, that I had a better opinion of Mr. Randolph than to suppose he would listen to any such suggestions. I did tell him that in my opinion he would not be able to get Callender, as I understood that he had attempted to make his escape, and in the place in which he was, it would be impossible for the marshal to discover him.

Mr. Randolph. Did you mention to him that he (Callender) would surrender at the next term?

Mr. Hay. I am not certain, but I believe I did.

Mr. Randolph. Were you at that time retained as counsel for Callender?

Mr. Hay. I was not retained as his counsel at that time, nor ever after; but I intended to appear in his defence for the sake of defending the cause, not for the man.

Mr. Randolph. Were you averse to proceed in the trial at that term for any particular reason?

Mr. Hay. I did not wish to appear before Judge Chase, from an impression that had been made on my mind in conversations with persons who knew him. I conceived it would be an unpleasant business for me to carry into execution the intention I had formed to defend Callender. This impression arose principally from the conduct the judge had manifested towards Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, on the trial of Fries, at Philadelphia. He had there, as I understood, restrained them from managing the defence in the way that they thought proper. I did not expect any greater indulgence or advantage than had been allowed on that occasion. I had therefore made up my mind to meet all the exigencies of the case with temper, but with firmness. The conduct of the judge on the trial of Mr. Thomas Cooper had also its weight upon my mind. A great deal was said about the judge's conduct on that trial, whether correct or not, I do not say; but it made me unwilling to appear as counsel before Judge Chase, though I was perfectly willing to undertake Callender's defence at the next term, before any other judge.

Mr. Randolph. What was the political complexion of the jury which tried Callender?

Mr. Hay. I am not personally acquainted with the gentlemen who composed that jury. I believe some of them did not live in the city of Richmond, but the impression on my mind was, and still is, that all the persons on the jury were not only opposed to Callender, but decidedly so; and were distinguished for the warmth of their political sentiments.

Mr. Randolph. Are you acquainted with Colonel John Harvie; what is his political character?

Mr. Hay. I know Colonel Harvie, but what is his political character I do not know. I lived at Petersburg and he at Richmond. I only knew that it was said that he did not vote with the Republican party.

Mr. Randolph. Are you acquainted with Mr. William Radford? what are his politics?

Mr. Hay. He was ranked among those called moderate, but I am not well enough acquainted with him to decide upon his political character.

Mr. Randolph. Are you acquainted with Mr. Marks Vandervall, and what is his political character?

Mr. Hay. He is a very reserved man, but has been uniformly regarded as a Republican, though not a zealous one.

Mr. Randolph. In criminal actions, did you ever hear of a bill of exceptions being filed in Virginia?

Mr. Hay. Never, sir; there can be no such thing, it would answer no purpose; because, from a criminal court there is no court which has appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. Randolph. But cases are transferred from the district courts to the general court.

Mr. Hay. There is a particular process for that purpose; criminal cases are not carried up after trial for the decision in that case is final; but if the district court are unwilling to decide, it is then carried up to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Harper. I understood you to say that it was your intention to argue the point. What point did you mean?

Mr. Hay. I meant to contend against the constitutionality of the second section of the sedition law.

Mr. Harper. Did you not mean to argue it before the public, although you knew it would be unavailing if addressed to the court? Did you mean by that argument to acquit the traverser, or to produce a political effect out of doors?

Mr. Hay. I meant to address my arguments to the court; if they should work the acquittal of the traverser, or operate any wise in his favor, it was a thing to be desired; if they should affect also the public mind, that, too, was a desirable circumstance.

Mr. Harper. I ask you now, whether you did not say to the marshal that Callender could not be defended, and that your object in requiring a continuance of the cause was, to gain time, and bring the trial nearer that period in which it was probable he might get a pardon?

Mr. Hay. I have no recollection of having said anything of this kind, but if Mr. Randolph (the marshal) says that I expressed myself to him in that manner, I shall not contradict him.

Mr. Harper. I understood him to say so in his testimony.

Mr. Hay. I do not recollect it.

D. M. Randolph was called in by Mr. Harper, and asked whether Mr. Hay had not said to him that Callender could not be defended, and that his purpose was to keep off the trial till the next court, in order to obtain a pardon?

Mr. Randolph. I do not recollect the words which were used, but I understood that Callender could not then be defended, and that he would surrender himself at the next term. I think it proper to remark one thing further: there never was a panel of the jury made out or presented to Judge Chase, or any other person, till the morning I made it out in court, before the commencement of Callender's trial, except in the case of the grand jury, when it is handed to the judge to appoint a foreman. In setting down their names on the list, I arranged them according to my own idea of their respectability.

Mr. Nicholson. In your conversation with Mr. Hay, did he tell you that he wished to delay the cause, in order to bring it nearer the time in which he might obtain Callender's pardon?

Mr. Randolph. He did not use the words, but I thought he had it in his mind. I inferred it from the conversation.

Mr. Randolph wished to ask another question of Mr. Hay, who was thereupon called.

Mr. Randolph. Did you ever say that Callender could not be defended?

Mr. Hay. I cannot recollect what I may have said on that point, but I recollect perfectly that I was impressed with the idea that he could not be defended, if the charge was either for writing or publishing the Prospect Before Us, for these facts were too notorious to be called in question. But I did then think, and always since have thought, that he might be defended on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the sedition law.

Mr. Randolph. Do you mean, when you say that he might be defended on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the sedition law, that you would not have defended him on any other ground, such as a flaw in the indictment, or a misstatement of the matter of the book in the indictment?

Mr. Hay. Most certainly, sir, I meant to take advantage of any mistake or defect that might appear in the indictment or in the evidence; and that may be evinced by recurring to my objection against the witnesses who were concerned with Callender in the publication, when I told one of them that he was not bound to give testimony which would go to criminate himself.

Mr. Key. Do they ever arraign a person for a misdemeanor in Virginia?

Mr. Nicholas. I do not recollect that they do.

John Montgomery was called in at the instance of Mr. Nicholson, who desired him to explain some parts of his testimony.

Mr. Montgomery. When I was before this honorable Court the first time, I stated that I should not be able to state all the charge delivered by Judge Chase at Baltimore, or any particular part in the precise language which he used. From the examination of a great number of witnesses before this honorable court, I am induced to believe that I have been misunderstood. When I first used the word Administration, I used it not as the precise word he uttered, but what struck my mind as being his sense. The judge seemed to lay down a proposition that the administration of Government was so and so, and stated that their acts were not guided by a view to promote the general welfare, but principally to keep themselves in the possession of unfairly acquired power. I thought the judge explained his position by his allusion to the repeal of the law creating the sixteen circuit judges, the general suffrage law of Maryland, and the contemplated alteration of the Judiciary law of that State. I did not mean to state that he said Mr. Jefferson was weak or feeble, but that the Administration or the Government was so. This is the impression I then had, and now have, with respect to that part of the charge. But I did not then say, nor do I now, that I use the precise words of the judge; but I think I follow his spirit and his meaning.

Mr. Nicholson. At the concluding part of the charge, did Judge Chase recommend it to the jury when they returned home, to use their influence to prevent the passage of the Judiciary bill, or was that an inference from what he delivered?

Mr. Montgomery. That part of the charge was in the express words, and not an inference at all. I recollect that shortly after I had a conversation with several gentlemen, who concurred with me in opinion that these expressions were used; and I recollect that on the very day the charge was published in the Anti Democrat, or the day after, I called these expressions to the recollection of the son of Judge Chase, and observed that these parts were omitted in the printed statement.

Mr. Harper. I am desired by Judge Chase to make of this honorable court the request contained in the following letter, which I will read:

"MR. PRESIDENT: The state of my health will not permit me to remain any longer at this bar. It is with great regret I depart before I hear the judgment of this honorable court. If permitted to retire, I shall leave this honorable court with an unlimited confidence in its justice; and I beg leave to present my thanks to them for their patience and indulgence in the long and tedious examination of the witnesses. Whatever may be the ultimate decision of this honorable court, I console myself with the reflection that it will be the result of mature deliberation on the legal testimony in the case, and will emanate from those principles which ought to govern the highest tribunal of justice in the United States."

The President observed that the rules of the Senaté did not require the personal attendance of the respondent; whereupon Judge Chase bowed in a very respectful manner, and withdrew.

Mr. Hay came again to the bar to explain the motives which induced him to undertake the defence of Callender. He said he was not without some hope that his arguments against the unconstitutionality of the sedition law, although they might not be conclusive with the court, would nevertheless have some weight with the jury, and might operate to produce the acquittal of Callender.

Mr. Randolph. On behalf of the Managers, I have to request of the court that further progress in the trial be postponed until to-morrow, in order to give those gentlemen who follow, time to digest, compare, and collate the great volume of testimony which has been given. We shall be ready to proceed to-morrow. There is also another reason for this request; we expect hourly some important witnesses, and are in hopes that they will make their appearance in town before the next meeting of the court. If, however, this should not be the case, we shall proceed without them. If they come, we presume we shall be permitted to take the benefit of their testimony.

President. I understand that gentlemen have nothing further to offer.

Mr. Randolph. Not, sir, at this time.

Mr. Harper. I beg leave to state that we do not join in the motion for delay, though we do not oppose it.

President. Is the course of the arguments on each side understood?

Mr. Nicholson. We understand that the Managers will open; that reply will be made by the counsel for the respondent, and that the Managers will then close.

Mr. Key. This is the usual course, and we have no objection to it.

The Court then rose.

WEDNESDAY, February 20.

The Court was opened at ten o'clock.

Present: the Managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole; and the counsel of Judge Chase.

Mr. Nicholson. We expected a witness from Virginia; but he has not arrived: a witness, however, from Maryland is present, whom we wish to examine.

Philip Stewart, sworn.

Mr. Nicholson. Were you a member of the grand jury summoned to attend the circuit court held at Baltimore, in May 1803?

Mr. Stewart. I was.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect any particular expressions used by Judge Chase in his charge to the jury?

Mr. Stewart. I have but an imperfect recollection. I have never seen the charge, nor have I heard it read since it was delivered.

Mr. Nicholson. Had you not some reason for attending to the charge, other than your duty as a grand juror?

Mr. Stewart. There were some things which struck my mind with some force.

Mr. Nicholson. Had you not been a member of the Legislature of Maryland?

Mr. Stewart. I had.

Mr. Nicholson. Did he not throw some censure upon the members of that State Legislature?

Mr. Stewart. I felt something of the kind, but I cannot tell his expressions.

Mr. Nicholson. Do you recollect his speaking of the sons of some gentlemen who had assisted in framing the constitution of Maryland; what were his expressions?

Mr. Stewart. If I were to hear the charge read I could perhaps point them out.

Mr. Nicholson. I will state the question more precisely.—Did he use the words degenerate sons, and apply that epithet to the members of the Legislature?

Mr. Stewart. To the best of my recollection he did; he spoke of degenerate sons of fathers who had formed the constitution of the State, which they were about to destroy by the introduction of the general suffrage bill.

Mr. Nicholson. Did he recommend to the grand jury when they returned home, to use their influence to have such men elected as would vote against the judiciary bill then pending before the Legislature?

Mr. Stewart. I do not recollect.

Mr. Harper. I will ask you, sir, whether the word degenerate was inferred by you, or did you actually hear it.

Mr. Stewart. I believe I heard it.

Mr. Martin. Have you ever seen any publication of the charge?

Mr. Stewart. I have not.

The President. If no further witnesses are to be introduced, I would inquire whether gentlemen consider it necessary to detain those who have been examined?

Mr. Nicholson. It is possible that gentlemen may differ in their account of the testimony; but if there is no dispute on that point the witnesses I think may be discharged.

Mr. Martin. There is a list of the grand jury summoned at the circuit court in Delaware; I do not know for what it is filed; until we are informed on that point we shall be under the necessity of detaining the witnesses from that State. Is it intended to show that there were men of different political sentiments on that jury?

Mr. Rodney. We have nothing more to prove from that list than what has already been stated.

Mr. Harper said the counsel for the respondent would have no objection to discharge all the witnesses; but must object to discharging part of them.

The President. If the gentlemen do not agree upon the discharge of the witnesses, I will take the sense of the Senate upon the point.

Mr. Harper. The particular situation of Mr. Tilghman's family requires his return to Philadelphia. I must therefore request that his further attendance be dispensed with.

The Managers consented, and Mr. T. was discharged.

The question was then taken by the President on the discharge of the witnesses, and lost; there being sixteen votes in the affirmative, and seventeen in the negative.

Mr. Rodney requested the discharge of the witnesses from Delaware; which being consented to by the respondent's counsel, they were discharged.

It may be proper here to notice that, from time to time, during the trial, witnesses were discharged with consent of the parties.

The testimony having been closed on both sides, Mr. EARLY rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President.—There is no attitude, in which the Government of this nation can be viewed more completely demonstrative of the efficacy of its principles than that in which it is now placed. We are now occupied in an act well calculated to test the practicability of those principles, and to prove their fitness or unfitness for the condition of that country over which they are destined to rule. There is presented before this great depository of national justice, a highly important officer of the Government, charged with acts violative of some of its leading and most essential principles. An officer who has been clothed with the function of administering to a great and rising people the blessings of freedom in their most vital relations, is the object against whom charges of this serious nature are exhibited. He stands charged with violating the sacred charter of our liberties, and with setting at naught the most holy obligations of society. He stands charged with perverting the high judicial functions of his office for the purposes of individual oppression, and of staining the pure ermine of justice by political party spirit. These charges are founded upon transactions which have passed in review before an inquiring world, and which in the estimation of the representatives of the American Government have cast a foul reproach on their national character. To this tribunal have they appealed for a vindication of that character. Hither do they appeal for the preservation of the dearest principles of their liberty, and for the sure support of their most sacred rights. It is here they must enter the complaints of the nation. It is here they must drag the guilty to punishment.

The first article, preferred by the House of Representatives in support of their impeachment, charges a conduct upon the respondent, which strikes at one of the most vital principles of the Government of this nation; the right of "trial by an impartial jury." It ought never to be forgotten that the deprivation of this right was one of the injuries for which the people of this country put to the risk of a revolution all that was dear. Nor ought it to be forgotten that the security of this right forms one of the great safeguards of the Federal Constitution. "In all criminal trials the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district."

The relative rights of judges and juries have at some periods of judicial history been so little understood, and the limits of each so indistinctly marked, that the benefits of the institution of jury trial were left much at the mercy of arbitrary and overbearing judges. But it was reserved for the honor of modern times to dissipate this uncertainty so baneful to justice, and to fix down the establishment upon its only proper foundation; that of the right to determine without control, both the law and the fact in all criminal cases whatsoever. This right has now been so long practised upon in the United States, and may be considered as so well established, that it is scarcely to be expected we shall witness upon that point any difference of opinion. Still less is it to be expected that we shall witness such difference, when we are discussing principles which apply to cases capital. In such case it is the glory of the laws of this country, that the offence of the accused should be left exclusively to the judgment of those least liable to be swayed by the weight of accusing influence. It is no part of my intention to deny the right of judges to expound the law in charging juries. But it may be safely affirmed that such right is the most delicate they possess, and the exercise of which should be guarded by the utmost caution and humanity.

The accused shall enjoy the right to a "trial by an impartial jury." We charge the respondent with deliberately violating this important provision of the Constitution, in arresting from John Fries the privilege of having his case heard and determined by an impartial jury; for that the respondent took upon himself substantially to decide the case by prejudging the law applying thereto, at the same time accompanying the opinion thus formed and thus delivered, by certain observations and declarations calculated necessarily to create a prepossession against the case of Fries in the minds of those who had been summoned to serve upon the jury, thereby making them the reverse of impartial.

These were the acts of a man, who, from his own declarations, appears to have well understood upon what points the defence would turn. It was the act of a man, who, it appears, had been well informed of all that passed at the previous trial of Fries; who knew that there was no dispute as to facts, and that the whole of the defence depended upon the discussion and determination of those very principles of law which he had thus prejudged, and upon the application of those authorities which he had thus excluded in the hearing and very presence of those who were to pass upon the life and death of the accused. No argument had been heard from counsel; no opportunity had been afforded to prove that the offence committed did not amount to the crime charged; no defending voice had been raised in behalf of the accused; but, without being heard, and without having had any opportunity to be heard, his case was adjudged against him. I say, adjudged against him without the chance of being heard. For surely the case was adjudged against him, when the only point upon which it was defensible was determined against him, and that determination publicly announced from the bench. That this was done before the accused could possibly have had a chance of being heard, is placed beyond contradiction by all the testimony. And that the judge knew the point which he thus prejudged, to be the only ground upon which the defence rested, is perfectly clear. For, from his own declarations at the time of announcing the opinion, it appears that he was well acquainted with all that had passed at the previous trial of Fries.

But, sir, we must look further into the progress of this transaction. It was not enough that the poor, trembling victim of judicial oppression should thus have his dearest privileges snatched from him, by a prejudication of his case; it was not enough that the impartiality of those who were to compose his jury should be converted into a prepossession against him, by the imposing authority of solemn declarations from the bench;

but the small remaining, darling hope of life, was to be smothered by a preclusion of his counsel from arguing the law to the jury. This fact, though sternly denied in the answer of the respondent, has, nevertheless, been established in a manner which must irresistibly force conviction upon the mind. Mr. Lewis affirms it positively. Mr. Dallas confirms it in a manner peculiarly strong. Not being himself present when the opinion was delivered to the bar, he received from Mr. Lewis a statement of what had passed, and, in an address to the court afterwards, repeated distinctly this statement, and particularly that part which attributed to the judge a declaration, that, if the counsel had anything to say upon the law, they must address themselves to the court and not to the jury. To this statement no reply was made by the court, either correcting or denying it. Thus stands the evidence in the affirmative. Opposed to this we have the negative testimony of Messrs. Rawle, Tilghman, and Meredith, who have no recollection of any such declaration. I address myself to those who well know the difference between affirmative and negative testimony. I address myself to those who well know the established rule in the law of evidence, that the testimony of one affirmative witness countervails that of many negative ones; and I am sure that I address myself to those who must feel the complete coincidence of this rule with the dictates of common sense. Upon this ground alone we might safely rest our proposition; but, sir, we will not rest it here. It appears from the testimony of the witnesses on both sides, that almost every observation from the counsel to the court, on the second day, was predicated upon the idea that something had been said on the preceding day, restrictive of their privileges. These observations, although addressed to the court, and carrying this feature prominent in their face, were neither contradicted nor corrected by the court. This was a strong tacit admission of the correctness of the idea upon which they were bottomed. But, sir, we have not only this tacit admission, but we have in testimony, this strong and impressive declaration from Judge Chase, that "the counsel might be heard in opposition to the opinion of the court, at the hazard of their characters."

But, Mr. President, we have the positive admission of the respondent, in page 18 of his answer, that certain observations were made by him condemning the use of common-law authorities upon the doctrine of treason, and also condemning authorities under the statute of treasons, but prior to the English Revolution. [Here the passage was read.] By a recurrence to page 22 of the answer, it will be found that the respondent admits that these observations of his were made on the first day; yet, sir, nothing of all this is remembered by Messrs. Rawle, Tilghman, or Meredith. How light, then, how extremely light, must their bare want of recollection weigh against the positive affirmative testimony of Messrs. Lewis and Dallas!

Considering my position as uncontrovertibly established, I will proceed to observe that the offence with which Fries stood charged, was the highest possible offence which can be committed in a state of society. The punishment annexed to its commission, was the highest possible punishment known to our laws. The accused was, therefore, entitled to every possible indulgence. In favor of life, not only every possible ground should be occupied by counsel to the jury, but every possible argument listened to and weighed with patience and forbearance; and it should never be forgotten that Judge Chase had such a conduct set as an example before him, in a previous trial of the same case. Yes, sir, a brother judge of his, who has since gone to the world of spirits, had set him an example conspicuous for the purity of its excellence, and which should have arrested his career in the commission of this cruel outrage upon all humanity. But Judge Chase predetermines the law, then prohibits the counsel from proving to the jury that the law was not as laid down. This was, in effect, an extinguishment at once of the whole right of jury trial. All the privileges and all the benefits of that institution were swept at once from an American court of justice, and scarcely the external form preserved. The law was predetermined by the judge, and the accused was debarred from pleading it to the jury. Of what avail is it, sir, that the jury should be made judges of law and of fact, when the law is not permitted to be expounded to them? Of what avail is it that the accused should have a trial by jury, when he is prevented from stating and explaining to the jury the only grounds upon which his case is defensible? The right to hear and determine facts is not more the right of a jury, than the right to hear and determine the law. To deprive them, then, of the privilege of hearing and determining the law, is as much a violation of their rights, as to deprive them of the privilege of hearing and determining facts. The right of the accused to be heard upon the facts, to the jury, is not more his right, than the right of being heard upon the law, to the jury. To deprive him, then, of the privilege of being heard upon the law, to the jury, is as much a violation of his rights, as to deprive him of the privilege of being heard upon the facts to the jury.

But, sir, we are assailed by a train of reasoning on the part of the respondent, in exculpation of his conduct, which it may be proper to notice in part at this stage of the argument. He informs us in his answer, that the law of treason having been solemnly settled by prior adjudications, he was not at liberty to depart from the principles so settled, even had he thought them incorrect, and he enters into lengthy discussion to show the importance of uniform adherence to doctrines properly considered and solemnly established. It is no part of my intention to dispute either the correctness of the decisions previously made upon the Constitutional doctrine of treason, or the propriety of an adherence to those decisions on the part of Judge Chase. For although I consider both extremely questionable, they yet appear to me to constitute no part of the present inquiry. This inquiry is whether the judge was authorized or can be excused for delivering an opinion upon the law before counsel were heard on the part of the accused, and for debarring counsel from the exercise of their Constitutional privilege to address the jury on the law as well as the facts, thereby making the opinion thus prejudged and thus extrajudicially delivered completely decisive of the case. And give me leave to say, sir, that the reasoning, resorted to by the respondent to excuse this conduct on his part is, in my opinion, an aggravation of his offence. It is of importance truly that juries should be guarded against improper impressions from counsel, by having the law previously explained to them! And it is a favor to counsel to be informed that the ground they mean to occupy is not tenable, that they may look out for other resources! Would not this reasoning go to authorize a judge in all criminal prosecutions to settle the law before the case was heard? He has nothing else to do, sir, according to this doctrine, than to inform himself of the facts, as in Fries's case, and then, before any trial is had, settle the law; at the same time prohibiting counsel from arguing that to the jury. And if the reason that the law has been so solemnly settled that it cannot be departed from is to form an excuse, the more settled the law, the longer practised upon, the stronger the reason. In every case of murder or theft then it is to confer a favor on the counsel to inform them what grounds are not tenable. It is of importance to instruct the jury what the law is upon the case, that they may be guarded against improper impressions, and then to render this object effectual prevent the counsel from arguing the law to the jury. In the case of Fries I hold it that the knowledge of the judge that the case depended solely upon legal principles is a circumstance highly aggravating his offence. He knew that there was no dispute as to facts, and that by thus prejudging the law, he fixed the destiny of the accused. But it was material to do this to guard the jury from improper impressions! My God! has it come to this? And is this the amount of our boasted Constitutional right of jury trial, that they whose exclusive right it is to determine both the law and the fact, are to be guarded from improper impressions by the prejudged, extrajudicial opinion of him who possesses no right to determine either!

We are told by the respondent, that he not only never interdicted the counsel for Fries from arguing the law to the jury, but that he afterwards on the next day expressly offered to let them take as wide a range as they pleased. Mr. President, I must confess I have been disappointed. I had expected that much of the defence against the first article would have rested upon the transactions of that day. I had so expected, not because of any opinion of my own, that from them any substantial excuse could be extracted; but because public opinion had somewhat inclined to rest an excuse upon that foundation. For myself, it has been my misfortune to be unable to perceive in this part of the transaction any features other than such as afford additional proof of the unjust and oppressive intent with which the judge appears to have acted. Indeed, sir, the respondent must himself have considered the transactions of the second day, as dangerous topics. He has touched them lightly indeed. If his conduct had been so free from blame as is contended in the answer, why was an appearance of fairness to be cast over the scene by having papers recalled upon which the opinion had been written, whilst the opinion itself remained? A short view of this part of the transaction may not be unimportant. It may afford us some strong proofs of the motives of the respondent. We are involuntarily led to inquire why the papers were recalled? Was it because of the oppressive tendency with which they operated upon the case of the accused? Was it because of any conviction on the part of the judge of the impropriety of the steps he had taken, or compunction for the cruel situation in which he had placed poor Fries? No, sir! The papers were recalled because of the firm and manly stand made by the counsel. It was because those counsel were men of character, too independent, and were governed by a sense of duty too high to submit to such a prostration of their rights. The determination to recall the papers was not taken until after it was seen that the counsel would abandon their cause rather than acquiesce in a conduct so oppressive and so injurious.

This recalling of the papers was a farce acted for the purpose of giving a specious appearance to the face of things; but the folly thereof could only be exceeded by the criminality of the first act. Was the crime the greater because the opinion was written? Was it the act of writing the opinion and throwing down the paper to the bar which constituted the evil to Fries? Or was it the formation of a prejudged and extrajudicial opinion completely decisive of the case, and the communication of that opinion in the very presence of those who were to try the accused? In my opinion it was the last. The evil was complete by the act of prejudication, and withdrawing the paper could have no possible effect. The case of the accused had been predetermined—had been extrajudicially predetermined—predetermined by the judge who had no right to determine it at all; and the counsel were left to the forlorn hope of convincing the judge that the opinion delivered by him was erroneous. "They might be heard in opposition to the opinion of the court at the hazard of their characters." This is his declaration on the second day.

If then I were asked, as were Fries's counsel, on the second day, by the other judge, and as I know many are now disposed to ask, whether, if an error had been committed, I would not suffer it to be corrected? I would answer that this was an act which from its nature admitted of no correction. It was a crime complete in its performance, and complete in all its baneful consequences. Repentance, even had there been any, could have afforded no relief; it came too late. As well might a man, after he had inflicted a mortal wound upon another, ask to be forgiven, because before the death of the wounded he was brought to relent, from an apprehension of the consequences. In my opinion, Judge Chase had committed the sin not to be repented of.

As to the proffered permission to the counsel, on the second day, that they might proceed without the restrictions before imposed, it has been my misfortune to be unable to perceive either any proof of a disposition to relent on the part of the judge, or any privileges to the counsel which placed them or their client upon ground more advantageous than that on which they had before stood. On the contrary, I think I perceive, in the whole of the judge's conduct taken together, on the second day, a deliberate design to impose upon the understanding of those present, by exhibiting the external form of fairness, whilst he continued to hold on upon the substance of injustice. For, notwithstanding there appeared from his expressions at first a disposition to permit the counsel to argue the cause without any restraint, yet it ought to be kept in constant recollection, that, when brought to explain himself, the general permission which had been thus apparently given was subjected to restrictions of very serious import. The counsel were permitted to argue the law to the jury, but the manner in which they should do so would be regulated by the court. The counsel were permitted to lay down the law, but should not read cases which were not law. That common-law cases, and cases under the statute of treason, but prior to the revolution in England, were not law, and should not be read. Look at the consequence? The counsel might argue the law to the jury, but were interdicted from the use of those authorities which in their opinion bore most strongly upon the case, and upon which, it was within the knowledge of the judge, they had principally relied in the prior trial. They might lay down the law to the jury, but should not read cases which were not law. And who was to determine whether the cases offered by counsel were or were not law? The judge. And pray, sir, was not the right of the jury to determine the law as effectually invaded by the judge taking upon himself to determine each case as it was offered, as their right was invaded by the judge determining upon the whole together? I maintain, sir, that it is not the right of the judge in criminal, and especially in capital causes, to determine that any case is not law: for, if he can determine that question as to a single authority, and upon that ground arrest it from the jury, he may do so as to all, and thus as effectually abolish the great privilege of trial by jury. I know it may be objected to this reasoning, that unless some restriction is imposed upon counsel, they may abuse their privileges by reading anything, however inapplicable to the jury. This, sir, is to suppose an extreme case, and it is never correct to reason from extreme cases. It is no proof against a privilege, that it is subject to be abused. And there is security against extreme abuse in this privilege from the regard which professional men necessarily feel for their professional reputation.

Here, Mr. President, we might close the argument upon the first article; but it is not possible—no, sir, not possible—here to stop our reflections.

When we review the ground which has been already travelled over; when in that review we behold an American citizen summoned to the bar of justice to undergo a trial in which his life is at stake; when we behold his judge, contrary to all precedent, and in violation of every feeling of humanity, pre-occupying the only ground upon which the case of the accused was defensible, and closing upon him this only possible avenue to safety, truly I feel that my feeble powers of language are not competent to a description of the scene: it must be left to the strong expression of silence. For this transaction, then, in the name of the American people, we denounce Judge Chase. We denounce him for invading their most valuable privilege, the trial by jury. We denounce him for taking into his own unhallowed hands the disposal of the life of an American citizen, and we invoke the justice of the nation to expiate by the proper punishment, this unholy sin.

The second, third, and fourth articles, exhibited by the House of Representatives, charge the defendant with a course of conduct upon a particular trial which affords many grounds of accusation. In this case it is true no unfortunate individual was charged with an offence which demanded his life as an expiation; yet, sir, there were other rights involved equally sacred in the laws of a free country. The liberty and the property of the accused were the price of a conviction. In casting our eyes over the ground upon which the different scenes of the transaction now about to be examined are spread, we are struck with a feature not usual in the history of human concerns. It would seem that even the restraint of appearances was no longer felt. We find the respondent setting out with a conduct, which seemed to prove that the fate of the accused was fixed. We find him pursuing a system of conduct throughout, which arrested from the accused some of his established and most valuable privileges. We find him endeavoring to heap shame and odium on those who occupied the station of advocates, because they would not tamely yield to his unwarrantable invasion of long established rights.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the labored attempts made by the defendant in his answer to exculpate himself from imputation in compelling Mr. Basset to serve upon the jury in the trial of Callender; yet, sir, I must be permitted to say that those attempts appear to me to be only the exertions of a mind conscious of impropriety, and seeking to impose upon the understanding of others. The test adopted, by which to try the impartiality of the jurors, in that case may possibly by some be held a correct one; but the manner of applying that test as then practised upon, is what I believe can be accounted for upon no other supposition than that of a determination on the part of the judge to procure the conviction of the accused. Upon what other principle can it be accounted for, that the jurors should be asked whether they had formed and delivered an opinion upon the charges laid in the indictment, when they knew, not and were not suffered to know what those charges were? Why else could it be laid down by the judge, that because the individuals called to serve upon the jury did not know what charges were in the indictment, (having never seen it nor heard it read,) that therefore they could not have formed and delivered an opinion upon the subject? And why else did the judge, when this monstrous logic was contradicted by the fact of one of the jurors delivering in open court an opinion upon the whole subject of those charges, without having seen, or heard the indictment read; why else did the judge, in the teeth of this damning fact, order the jurors sworn?

Every juror sworn might, like Mr. Basset, have formed and delivered an opinion which concluded the conviction of the accused, and yet because they did not know that the subject-matter of such opinion constituted the charges in the indictment, having neither seen it nor heard it read, the expression of such opinion created no disqualification. Unworthy evasion! An evasion which prevents the doctrine of disqualification in a juror from receiving any practical operation. An evasion which effectually puts at naught that principle of the Constitution so often adverted to in a former part of the argument, that "the accused shall enjoy the right of a trial by an impartial jury." Upon this point I beg leave to read two authorities. [Mr. Early here cited 3 Bac. Abr. 176, and Co. L. 157.]

But we are told by the respondent in his answer, that the declaration made by Mr. Basset did not disqualify him, because it contained no direct opinion as to the guilt of the traverser. This I understand to be the amount of all the labored reasoning and nice distinctions drawn by the respondent upon this point. There is, sir, a plain common sense rule to govern us upon this subject, which in my opinion is as safe in its application as it is reasonable in its principle. A juror must be indifferent. How must he be indifferent? What kind of indifference is this which is made necessary? The manner in which Judge Chase has stated and explained this rule is certainly calculated to confuse and mislead. "The juror, says he, must be indifferent between the Government and the accused as to the subject-matter."

Must the juror in reality be indifferent between the parties as to the subject-matter of prosecution only? Will not a prejudice against the accused, flowing from other causes, create a disqualification? I address myself to those who well know that partiality arising from a variety of relations in society, as well as prejudice arising from a variety of causes, destroys that character of indifference necessary to render a juror competent, and that this partiality or prejudice need not relate to the subject-matter of prosecution.

So also I apprehend that character of indifference is as effectually destroyed by a prejudice as to the subject-matter, without any prejudice as to the person. I mean the prejudice of a prejudication of the criminality of the subject-matter. We meet with the rule every day, that it is good cause of challenge to a juror that he hath expressed an opinion upon the subject-matter of prosecution. Wherefore then the manner of stating the rule, which we find adopted in the answer? Most evidently to suit the respondent's case. What, sir, must a juror, to be so prejudiced as to be disqualified, have expressed an opinion not only that the subject-matter of prosecution was criminal in law, but that the person prosecuted was the author of the crime? Yes, sir, according to the doctrine of the answer, he must have prejudged both law and fact. In other words, although Mr. Basset had formed and delivered an opinion that such a book as "The Prospect Before Us," came within the sedition law, yet, not having said that Callender was the author or publisher, he was still a competent juror. Suppose a man indicted for murder, in a case where there is no dispute as to the fact of killing, (and here there was no dispute as to the fact of publishing,) but the defence set up was that he was excusable. A juror has given his opinion, in reference to the act, that such a killing does amount to murder, but without saying that the person prosecuted was the murderer; will any man say this expression would not disqualify him? I am bound to presume not. Sir, in the case of Callender, although Mr. Basset did not say that the person prosecuted was guilty, yet he did in effect say that whoever wrote or published the book was guilty. And give me leave to remark here that in prosecutions for libels, the question of law, as to their criminality, is generally the only question of dispute. The fact of publication is one about which there seldom occurs any difficulty, and has to be proven merely because not admitted. To have expressed an opinion then upon the question of law in such cases is substantially to have prejudged the whole case. A juror under such circumstances cannot be called impartial. As well might it be alleged that Judge Chase himself was impartial, as to the case of Fries, after he had delivered the opinion which we have before discussed.

We are told in the answer that the guilt of the traverser was not prejudged by Basset, for another reason; that as the charges to make them criminal must have been false, so Callender might have exculpated himself by proving their truth. But, sir, the traverser was at liberty to rest his defence either upon a justification or want of criminality in law, or upon both. He was not bound to disclose which, nor could the judge officially know which. Both and each of these grounds were proper for the jury to determine under the plea. The acquittal of the traverser then did not depend exclusively upon the proof of the truth of the charges.

Again, we are told that the juror barely expressed his opinion upon the book, as the contents thereof had been represented to him. The same may be said of almost every other case. Few, very few, jurors are spectators of a murder, or an act of treason. Any opinion they may have formed and delivered of the actual guilt of the person charged must be, in nine cases out of ten, from representation. Few, very few, of the jurors who were summoned in the case of Fries, had been spectators of the acts which were alleged to have been treasonable; probably not one of them. Yet we learn from the answer of Judge Chase, that in that very case several were repelled from serving, because of the opinions which they acknowledged they had given. Such opinions must, in nine cases out of ten, be bottomed upon representation. There are numerous secret crimes, which, from their very nature, preclude the possibility that an opinion concerning them; however positive, and however decisive of the conviction of the accused, should be founded upon any previous knowledge of facts. And yet, sir, I presume no person will deny that, in such cases, a juror may, nevertheless, so express an opinion as to disqualify himself from serving.

But, sir, the scene rises upon us. We have now to examine a part of the transaction for which, I had supposed, human invention might be tortured for a palliation in vain. I allude to the rejection of Mr. Taylor's testimony. The reason assigned for that rejection was, that the witness could not prove the truth of the whole of any one charge. Let us, for a moment, examine the consequences of this doctrine. According to the judge's own decisions then, as well as his doctrine now, each charge laid in the indictment must have constituted a separate offence. For it is explicitly declared both by Mr. Hay and Mr. Nicholas, that when an application was made to continue the case, because of the absence of some material witnesses, the application was rejected, upon the ground that it did not appear from the affidavit filed that the witnesses, so absent, could prove the truth of all the charges. That proof of the truth of a part only, would be of no avail, and that the whole must be proved to entitle the traverser to an acquittal. Each charge in the indictment, then, must have constituted a separate offence; for the charges cannot be made to help each other out. One charge, however, it seems might consist of different facts. This was the case with several in that indictment. It was particularly the case with the very charge, the truth of which Mr. Taylor was called to prove. "The President was a professed aristocrat. He had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest." Here was a charge made up of two distinct facts; so distinct in their nature, that the knowledge of their truth might not only rest with different persons, but was extremely likely not to rest with any one witness. Put the case of a man charged with any offence—murder, theft, or any other crime you please. There may be a string of facts upon the proof of which the defence may depend; some within the knowledge of one man; some within that of another. Was it ever heard of before, that, because one witness could not prove the existence of all those facts, that, therefore, such witness should not be examined as to what he did know? Or, if some of the facts depended upon written testimony, was it ever heard of before that, therefore, a witness should not be examined as to those resting on oral testimony? To these questions no man will answer in the affirmative. Why, then, was an unheard-of and palpably absurd doctrine brought to bear in Callender's case? Was the defence of justification, under the seditious law of the United States, such an anomaly in its nature, that none of the established rules of jurisprudence would apply to it? Was it a thing so entire in its nature, that it could not consist of different parts? I have always been taught, and the respondent's answer confirms the principle, that a defence must apply to the whole of a charge. If, then, a charge consist of different parts, surely, so must the defence. But, according to Judge Chase, be the parts ever so many, they shall not be proven, unless the proof can all be made by one witness, or unless it appear that the defendant has proof in reserve to establish all. I ask this honorable Court how it can appear that the defendant has proof in reserve applying to all the parts of a charge? Suppose a witness called to substantiate one part, how is it to be known to the court whether there is or is not other testimony behind, in the power of the party, by which the residue of the charge may be established? We are told, by the respondent, that none of the questions propounded to Colonel Taylor had any application to the charge, except the first, and this only to a part of the charge; and that this question was repelled because no proof was offered as to the residue. I answer, sir, that the judge had no right to know, nor were the counsel bound to disclose whether there was such testimony in reserve or not. It is a new doctrine, sir, that the legal admissibility of testimony is to depend upon what the party can afterwards prove by other testimony. It is the right of the party to establish his defence as far as he can, and if he fail in establishing it completely, the evil is to himself alone. And, permit me here to add, sir, that whether he succeed in establishing his defence or not, is a question for the jury to determine, and not the judge. The judge possesses no right to determine, even after the testimony is finished, whether that testimony has or has not established the defence; still less, then, can he, before it is heard, determine that it will not make good the defence.

We are told, in the respondent's answer, that his rejection of Colonel Taylor's testimony can be no proof of a determination on his part to oppress, as such an intention might have been gratified by the conviction of the traverser upon the other articles. This is true, very true, upon the principle that the judge and not the jury was to determine the question of law in criminal cases. If the criminality of the charges in point of law, was to be settled by the judge, his conclusion is certainly correct. But if, as I apprehend, the criminality of the charges was to be exclusively determined by the jury, then it was not entirely certain that the judge might have been sure of his object, notwithstanding the tenth charge had been proved. For aught he knew, or ought to be presumed to have known, the jury might have been of the opinion that the other charges did not come within the seditious law, and might have, therefore, given a verdict of acquittal.

But, Mr. President, this apart, it is a novel proof of innocence to me, at least, that a man should have the magnanimous boldness to disregard appearances. It is a novel proof of innocence that a man should possess a spirit daring enough to insult the common sense of mankind. Yes, sir, I yield to the respondent the full share of glory, which he is desirous of accumulating from this source.

The last of the three articles now under examination goes on to charge the defendant with various acts of injustice, partiality, and intemperance, highly derogatory to his character as a judge, and equally injurious to the reputation of the American bench. Without fatiguing the patience of the honorable Court with an inquiry into the proofs and an investigation of the criminality of all the particulars here enumerated, I beg leave to call their attention to one part of the judge's conduct, which appears to me to stand pre-eminent for its open defiance of all justice, and its flagrant violation of the Constitution of this country. I allude to the refusal to continue the cause. The reasons assigned for that refusal, were, we learn, that it did not appear by the affidavit exhibited, and upon which the motion for a continuance was founded, that the witnesses, whose testimony was wanted, could prove the truth of all the charges laid in the indictment. This conduct, Mr. President, strikes me as being of the same family with the rejection of Mr. Taylor's testimony. The charges in the indictment are in number many. They embrace a numerous collection of facts, some of them assimilated, others extremely variant in their nature, many of them involving legal difficulties as to their criminality. Under the plea of not guilty, to the indictment, it was competent to the traverser not only to prove the truth of the charges in point of fact, but also to prove that any of the charges were not criminal in point of law. It was competent for the defendant to prove the truth of a part of the charges, and to contend that the rest were not seditious. Both these grounds of defence were proper for the jury, and the jury possessed the right to pass without control upon both. With what propriety, then, could the judge pronounce from the bench that to entitle the accused to a continuance, it must appear that he could prove the truth of all the charges? What, sir, was the question of law as to their criminality, a point which the judge here again arrogated to himself the exclusive right to determine, and that, too, before the traverser was heard? Indeed, it would appear that, in this case also, as in the case of Fries, the law was to be arrested from its proper organ, the jury, and to be exclusively passed upon by the judge himself. What other construction can be given to his determination that the truth of all the charges must be proven? There surely could be no necessity for this, unless they were all seditious within the act of Congress. By determining, then, that all must be proved true, the judge did determine that all were seditious. This, sir, it was the exclusive right of the jury to determine.

The Constitution of this country has most wisely provided, that "the accused shall have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. Of what avail is this provision if time be not given for their attendance? Of what avail to grant the process, and, before the witnesses can by any physical possibility reach the place, force the accused to trial? This conduct, sir, is worse than mockery. It is an insult to the common sense of mankind. It is high treason against the majesty of the Constitution of a free country. The Constitution of the United States gives to the accused the right of process to compel the attendance of his witnesses. But, Judge Chase so administers, that the accused is indicted, arrested, tried, convicted, and punished, all in the same term, whilst his witnesses are distant hundreds of miles.

After all this, Mr. President, surely we shall not be asked for proofs of corrupt intent. They are too thick upon every feature of the transactions which have been examined. The defendant is, on all hands, acknowledged to possess an acquaintance with the laws and Constitution of his country, which yields not to that of any other man in this nation. He is, on all hands, acknowledged to possess talents which might do honor to any tribunal. With such knowledge and such talents, permit me to ask, if it was within the compass of possibility that he should mistake in points so familiar as those in which he is charged with criminal conduct? Although all things are possible, yet there are things the extreme improbability of which defies belief. Among those I rank the supposition of mistake on the part of Judge Chase in the trial of James T. Callender. We might just as well be asked for proof of malice in a case where a man wilfully and without provocation kills another. In such a case as the one now under consideration, the answer is, that the criminal intent is apparent upon the face of the act. And there is a question, sir, which strikes me as applying itself with almost irresistible force to the present discussion. Can it be that such outrages should be committed upon the most ordinary principles of law and justice, and yet the conduct of the judge not be influenced by corrupt motives? Can it be that everything should be done to favor the prosecution and stifle the defence, and yet justice be administered "faithfully and impartially and without respect to persons?" But, if all this be insufficient, I pray this honorable Court to recollect the declarations of the judge in relation to the case, as attested by several witnesses.

The fifth and sixth articles rest upon grounds so extremely simple, and so easily comprehended, that it appears totally unnecessary to fatigue the patience of the honorable Court by dwelling upon them.

The seventh article is as follows:

"That at a circuit court of the United States, for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle, in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge, and stoop to the level of an informer, by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared, through their foreman, that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury, that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood 'that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order; that the name of this printer was—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing, added, 'that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter,' or words to that effect; and that with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question, the said Samuel Chase did, moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the District Attorney of the United States, the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded, (and which were understood to be those published under the title of 'Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser,') and, by a strict examination of them, to find some passage which might furnish the ground-work of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper; thereby degrading his high judicial functions, and tending to impair the public confidence in, and respect for, the tribunals of justice, so essential to the general welfare."

The respondent stands here charged with a conduct, than which, in my opinion, nothing could be more at war with his official duty—nothing more tarnish his official character. The Constitution and laws of this country certainly intended in erecting high judicial tribunals, that those who might be appointed to minister therein, should be impartial dispensers of justice between such as might resort thither for an adjustment of their differences. In public prosecutions more especially was it intended that such dispensation should be made without respect to persons. In these, above all other cases, ought a judge to stand aloof from influence, free from predilection towards one, or prejudice against the other. Most peculiarly here is it his duty to stand firm at his post, resisting the overbearing influence of a powerful public, and protecting the rights of the accused in so unequal a contest. But Judge Chase, disregarding these principles, always held sacred in a land of laws, converts himself into a hunter after accusations. He who, in the humane language of the laws, should be counsel for the accused, becomes himself an accuser. He, whose duty it is impartially to decide between the prosecutor and prosecuted, becomes himself the procurer of prosecutions.

I have always been taught that the character of an informer, in any station of life, was deservedly considered as the reverse of reputable. What, then, shall we say of him who descends from the judgment seat of the nation to inform against and direct the prosecution of one against whom he avows the strongest antipathy, and over whose trial he himself has to preside? Surely, sir, his thirst for punishment was great. Surely it was extreme indeed when he could not wait for the tardy motion of the public prosecutors. If our judges are thus to turn informers—if they are thus to seek after objects for themselves to try and themselves to punish—then indeed must this country, heretofore considered an asylum from oppression, become itself the nursery of oppression in its most odious form. And this Government, heretofore the pride of humanity, will be held up as an object of scorn and derision to the nations of the earth.

The eighth article is in these words:

"And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those Governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony, without which there can be no public happiness; yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred and three, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with an intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against their State government and constitution—a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, moreover, that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against the Government of the United States, by delivering opinions, which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion, and in a proper manner, were at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extrajudicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested, to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan."

It is not my intention, Mr. President, to trouble the court with many observations upon this article; not because of any opinion that it is unimportant. I believe it equally important with any in the catalogue. I believe it possesses a peculiar importance in affording, from the testimony by which it is supported, proofs of the spirit by which Judge Chase was usually governed in his official conduct.

There are features too in that part of the judge's official conduct, charged in this article, which place him in a point of view awfully grand. We have heretofore been viewing him as bringing his talents to bear upon individuals. Here we see his genius rising, in the majesty of its strength, to far higher objects. Here we see him consigning over whole governments to the scourge of his own avenging wrath. Whithersoever he turned his eyes, whether to the State constitution and laws, or to the laws and Constitution of the whole Union, they were equally exposed to the whip and the rack.

Mr. President, there is no truth more forcible than that expressed in the language of this article, that "mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those governments respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony, without which there can be no public happiness." Indeed, sir, it may with truth be said, that this respect and confidence are essential to that harmony, without which we can enjoy no public happiness. What words then can describe in its proper colors the conduct of an officer of the highest judicial tribunal of the General Government, who abuses the duty and perverts the privilege of his station to destroy the confidence and excite the odium of the people against not only their State government, but that of the United States? He who was seated on the judgment-seat of the nation to execute the laws of the Union, converts that very judgment seat into a forum, from whence to pronounce a Philippic not only against the State government with which he there had no right to meddle, but against that very government under whose authority he was there sitting, and whose laws he was sworn there to execute. Not content with endeavoring to excite discontent and odium against the government of the State of Maryland, the Congress of the United States must be held up as sacrilegious destroyers of the national Constitution.

Mr. President, I have taken those views of this subject which presented themselves most forcibly to my mind. I have finished all I intended to say upon this argument. There has, in my opinion, been established against the respondent a volume of guilt, every page of which calls for punishment at the hands of this nation. I leave the case and the respondent in your hands. I leave them where the Constitution of this country has placed them. I leave them where I hope, and I believe, there will be found a different measure of justice from that which Judge Chase has been accustomed to administer. I leave them where justice will be administered "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons."

Mr. CAMPBELL then rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. President, and Gentlemen of the Senate: It is with peculiar diffidence I rise, in compliance with the duty assigned me, to address this honorable Court on this important occasion. Sensible of my own incompetency to do that justice to the investigation of this cause which its importance, and the influence that the whole transaction is calculated to have on the jurisprudence of our country, would seem to require, I should have felt disposed to decline the undertaking; but called upon by the representatives of the nation to aid in supporting a prosecution which they have deemed it proper to institute for the public good, I conceive it my duty to yield up, in some degree, my own feeling to obey the voice of my country, and perform the duties imposed upon me thereby. Under this impression I shall endeavor to execute the trust reposed in me on this occasion in such manner as the very short time left me from other public avocations, and the limited means of information on subjects of this nature, which the present situation of this place affords, will enable me. I feel, however, sir, considerable confidence in this undertaking, from the consideration that there are other gentlemen associated with me on this occasion, who are fully competent to do complete justice to the subject. And a still higher degree of confidence arises from a perfect conviction that the honorable members who compose this high tribunal, and who are to pronounce the final decision in this cause, are well qualified to investigate its merits; and that their talents and experience are such as to preclude even the possibility of a defeat of justice taking place, in consequence of any deficiency that may exist in the exertions of counsel on either side.

The scene, presented to the nation by this trial, is more than usually interesting and important. One of the highest officers of the Government, called upon by the voice of the people, through their representatives, before the highest tribunal known to our Constitution—that same tribunal that sanctioned his elevation—to answer for the abuse of the power with which he had been entrusted! It is a melancholy truth, that derogates much from the dignity of human nature, but it is a truth that has been for ages established by experience, that high and important powers have a tendency to corrupt those on whom they are conferred. Few minds are possessed of sufficient integrity and independence, when elevated above the ordinary level of the great mass of their fellow citizens, to resist the impulse their high station gives them, to grasp at still greater powers, and prostitute those which they already possess.

Hence it has been the great exertion of all governments, who regard the rights and liberties of the people, and still must continue to be so, to watch over the conduct of the high and confidential officers of State, and guard against their abusing the powers reposed in them. For this purpose the mode of trial by impeachment was resorted to in very early times in that country from which we have derived most of our laws and usages. Near five hundred years ago, the representatives of the people in that nation felt themselves clothed with sufficient authority to check the abuses of power, in the highest officers under the Crown, by calling upon them by impeachment to answer before the House of Lords for their conduct, and punishing them for such acts as were unauthorized, illegal, or oppressive.

It was a wise and politic measure to have charges of this nature tried by the highest tribunal in the nation, that would not be awed by the great powers and elevated standing of the accused, nor influenced by the popular voice of the accusers, further than a strict regard to impartial justice would require. As I conceive, therefore, that pure and unstained impartiality ought to be the characteristic feature in the trial by impeachment, I shall for myself, and I conceive I may in the name of the representatives of the people, utterly disclaim any design or wish that party considerations, or difference in political sentiments, should, in the remotest degree, enter into the investigation, or affect the decision of this question. Yet, in order to ascertain the motives that actuated the respondent, it may become necessary to notice the difference of political sentiments, so far as regarded the accused, and those who are stated to have been injured by his conduct, at the time those transactions took place, that gave origin to this prosecution.

In the view which I propose taking on this subject, I shall in the first place notice the provisions in the Constitution relative to impeachment, and endeavor to ascertain the precise object and extent of such provision, so far as the same may relate to the present case.

The first provision in the Constitution on this subject, (art. 1st, sec. 3,) declares, that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. Here we discover the great wisdom of the framers of the Constitution. The highest and most enlightened tribunal in the nation is charged with the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizens against oppression from the officers of Government under the sanction of law; unawed by the power which the officer may possess, or the dignified station he may fill, complete justice may be expected at their hands. The accused is called upon before the same tribunal, and in many instances, before the same men, who sanctioned his official elevation, to answer for abusing the powers with which he had been entrusted. Men who are presumed to have had a favorable opinion of him once, are to be his judges; no inferior or co-ordinate tribunal is to decide on his case, which might from motives of jealousy or interest be prejudiced against him and wish his removal. No, sir, his judges, without the shadow of temptation to influence their conduct, are placed beyond the reach of suspicion.

The next provision in the Constitution declares that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Here the Constitution seems to make an evident distinction between such misdemeanors as would authorize a removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office, and such as are criminal, in the ordinary sense of the word, in courts of common law, and punishable by indictment. So far as the offence committed is injurious to society, only in consequence of the power reposed in the officer being abused in the exercise of his official functions, it is inquirable into only by impeachment, and punishable only by removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office; but so far as the offence is criminal, independent of the office, it is to be tried by indictment, and is made punishable according to the known rules of law in courts of ordinary jurisdiction. As, if an officer take a bribe to do an act not connected with his office, for this he is indictable in a court of justice only. Impeachment therefore, according to the meaning of the Constitution, may fairly be considered a kind of inquest into the conduct of an officer, merely as it regards his office; the manner in which he performs the duties thereof; and the effects that his conduct therein may have on society. It is more in the nature of a civil investigation, than of a criminal prosecution. And though impeachable offences are termed in the Constitution high crimes and misdemeanors, they must be such only so far as regards the official conduct of the officer; and even treason and bribery can only be inquired into by impeachment, so far as the same may be considered as a violation of the duties of the officer, and of the oath the officer takes to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of his oath of office; and not as to the criminality of those offences independent of the office. This must be inquired into and punished by indictment.

This position is strongly supported by the mode of proceeding adopted by this honorable Court in cases of impeachment. You issue a summons to give notice to the accused of the proceeding against him; you do not consider his personal appearance necessary; you issue no compulsory process to enforce his personal attendance; and you pass sentence, or render judgment on him in his absence. But, in all criminal prosecutions, compulsory process must issue at some stage of it to enforce the defendant's appearance; unless outlawry in England be considered an exception, which, it is believed, is not resorted to in this country, and his personal appearance is considered absolutely necessary; and in almost every case he must be present when sentence is pronounced against him. This construction of the Constitutional provision appears to be absolutely necessary, to avoid the absurd consequence that would arise from a different construction; that of punishing a man twice for the same offence, which could not have been intended by the framers of the Constitution. The nature of the judgment which you are bound to render, and not to exceed, appears also conclusive on this head. You can only remove and disqualify an individual from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit. This cannot be considered a criminal punishment; it is merely a deprivation of rights; a declaration that the person is not properly qualified to serve his country. Hence, I conceive, that, in order to support these articles of impeachment, we are not bound to make out such a case as would be punishable by indictment in a court of law. It is sufficient to show that the accused has transgressed the line of his official duty, in violation of the laws of his country; and that this conduct can only be accounted for on the ground of impure and corrupt motives. We need not hunt down the accused as a criminal, who had committed crimes of the deepest dye; and this honorable Court are not authorized to inflict a punishment adequate to such crimes, if they had been committed and could be established. With this view of the meaning of the Constitutional provision relative to impeachments, I shall proceed to examine the articles now under consideration, and the evidence given to support them. In the course of this examination, we apprehend it will clearly appear that the whole conduct of the judge in these several transactions, for which charges are alleged against him, had its origin in a corrupt partiality and predetermination unjustly to oppress, under the sanction of legal authority, those who became the objects of his resentment in consequence of differing from him in political sentiments; turning the judicial power, with which he was vested, into an engine of political oppression. So completely, it is conceived, has this motive pervaded the whole of his judicial transactions now in question, that there is not a single act charged in the articles of impeachment, that is not strongly marked with manifest oppression, springing from political intolerance, under the mask of administering justice. This is the corrupt origin from which have issued all the evils complained of; this has for ages been the scourge of society; and it is all important that, in our country which is yet in its infancy, when this poisonous germ cannot have taken deep root, it should be crushed in its embryo, and not permitted to gather strength by the sanction of high and superior authority.

In order to observe some arrangement in the investigation of this subject, I propose to consider, first, under one general view, the conduct of the judge on the trial of Fries for treason, as stated in the charges contained in the first article; and,

Secondly, I will consider also, under one general view, the conduct of the judge in the trial of Callender for a libel, as stated in the several charges contained in the impeachment. The fifth and sixth articles I will leave to be supported by those gentlemen associated with me in the management of this prosecution, who have been more conversant than myself with the laws of, and practice of the courts in Virginia, upon which the support of these articles materially depend; and the remaining articles, to wit, the seventh and eighth, will be chiefly relied upon by me, to show the spirit of oppression, partiality, and political intolerance, that marked the whole judicial career of the judge during the course of these transactions, thereby establishing more clearly the motives that actuated his conduct in the several acts charged as misdemeanors in the articles already noticed and relied upon.

In examining the first article, I shall rely upon the following positions:

First—That, under the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution of the United States, (referred to in this article of the impeachment,) which secures to the defendant, in all criminal prosecutions, the assistance of counsel, he is thereby entitled to the right of such counsel being heard in his defence by the court, before a decision be made and declared against him on the law arising in his case; and, also, that such counsel should exercise their professional rights in making his defence, according to the known and established laws and usages of the nation, free from any arbitrary control or restriction whatever.

Secondly—That, in the trial of Fries for treason, the judge did, by delivering an opinion in writing on the law arising in the case, before counsel were permitted to be heard in his defence, effectually deprive the defendant of any benefit from the assistance of counsel.

Thirdly—That he imposed on the counsel engaged for the defendant, arbitrary restrictions and control, in the exercise of their professional rights, unknown to, and unauthorized by the laws and usages of the nation, which compelled them to relinquish the defence of the prisoner.

Fourthly—I will then insist that this conduct was such a flagrant violation of his duty, as could only spring from corrupt motives, and a disposition to oppress those who became the objects of his resentment.

With regard to the first position, that counsel ought to be permitted to be heard for a defendant before a decision should be declared against him; and, also, that the counsel ought to be protected in the exercise of their professional rights, according to the usages and practice of courts, it appears to me substantially supported by the Constitutional provision already noticed, securing to the defendant the assistance of counsel, and to be a necessary consequence of that provision; and essential, in order to give it effect. For, in the first place, as to the law, of what use would the assistance of counsel be to the defendant, if a decision of the law arising in his case should be deliberately made up by the court, committed to writing to give it more solemnity and effect, and delivered, or made known, before such counsel were permitted to be heard in his defence? What hopes could the counsel entertain of being able to convince a court that an opinion thus deliberately formed and solemnly made known, was incorrect, and ought not to be given? Surely, if the right of the assistance of counsel, secured to a defendant, means anything, it must mean that he should have an opportunity, through his counsel, to make his case known to the court, to explain the law arising thereon, and show, as far as it could be done, that, according to the true construction of the law applying to his case, or under which he is charged, he is not subject to its penalties; before their opinion be declared on the subject, while the mind of the court is unbiassed, open to conviction, and capable of duly weighing the arguments that may be advanced on either side. But when an opinion is deliberately declared, or made known, against a defendant, before he is permitted to be heard by counsel, his case is prejudged, the character of the court is committed in a very great degree to support such opinion, the arguments of counsel cannot be expected to be heard by such a court with impartiality and fairness, that go to prove such opinion to be erroneous; and under such circumstances, the aid of counsel is a mere name without a benefit; a form without substance. But again, if such counsel were subject to the arbitrary control and restriction of a court, of every capricious and irritable judge; if they were not protected in the performance of their professional duties, so long as they acted within the laws of their country and the known usages and practice of courts, of what use would their assistance be to the accused, or what substantial aid could they afford him in making his defence? The counsel would have no rule to direct them in shaping their client's defence. When they had prepared to examine his cause in the manner heretofore usual in courts, and upon grounds which they conceived most likely to establish his innocence and procure his acquittal, they might be stopped at the very threshold of the defence; surprised with a new and unheard-of mode of proceeding; presented with a digested and formal opinion upon the very points they intended to contest; and informed that, in the remarks they might be permitted to make to the court, to show that such opinion was not correct, they must confine themselves in their endeavors to establish the doctrine they might advance, to the producing of authorities of a certain description; and must not extend their researches after decisions, on similar cases, beyond certain prescribed limits, as to time and the kind of decisions. Under such circumstances no counsel could render any substantial service to the accused; none would be found to submit to the tyranny of such a practice.

Further, it is conceived an universal rule of construction, that when a right is secured to any person, by a law, the means of acquiring the benefit of that right are thereby also secured to him. The Constitution secures to the defendant in all criminal cases the assistance of counsel in his defence; the only means by which the benefits of that right can be obtained by such defendant, it is conceived, must be, by permitting counsel to be heard in his behalf, before his case is decided against him, and by protecting such counsel in the due performance of their professional duties. These rights are secured to counsel for the benefit of those for whom they are concerned, and whose interests they advocate; and not for their own advantage. And here it may be proper to observe, that though counsel may be considered in some respects as officers of the court, and in a certain degree subject to their control and direction; yet, it is certain, while they act within the line of their duty, and the known sphere of their action as counsel, their rights are as sacred as those of the court; and they are, in performing their professional duty, in a certain sense, as independent of the court, as the court are of them.

The second position proposed to be established and relied upon, to wit, that the judge did, in the trial of Fries for treason, by delivering an opinion in writing on the law arising in the case, before counsel was permitted to be heard in his defence, effectually deprive the defendant of any benefit from the assistance of counsel, is in part a deduction from the preceding position, and supported by it. The fact of the judge's delivering an opinion in writing, in this case, against the defendant, previous to permitting counsel to be heard in his defence, is admitted by the judge in his answer, and is also established beyond a doubt by the evidence of Messrs. Lewis, Dallas, Tilghman, and indeed of all the witnesses on the subject. No difference exists in the evidence of the different witnesses with regard to the written opinion being delivered before the cause was heard. The statement briefly is, that after the court met, the jury were called, and many of them answered and appeared; the prisoner was (Mr. Lewis believes) in court; the counsel assigned the prisoner had not all got to the bar, when the judge handed down, or threw on the clerk's table, several papers, each containing the opinion of the court on the law that was to decide the defendant's fate: one of these copies, the judge said, was to be given to the counsel for the defendant; one to the Attorney for the United States, and one to be delivered to the jury before they retired on the case. Some of the gentlemen about the bar began to copy these papers: Mr. Lewis, one of the counsel for the defendant, refused to receive or read, it, declaring his hand should never be tainted by reading a prejudged opinion in any case, but especially in a capital one. The papers were subject to public inspection; the jurymen then might, and probably did, read the opinion. Thus the formal opinion of the court on the law, being made known to the jury before the cause was heard, would bias their minds against the defendant, and, render an impartial inquiry into his case next to impossible. The counsel had no hopes of changing an opinion thus deliberately and formally made up, and stamped with the solemnity of a written sentence; the judge by deciding the law seemed to have decided the facts also, as he must have assumed them as proved, in order to found his opinion upon them; and indeed the answer states that no doubts existed with regard to the facts or evidence in the case, on either side; the jury would, therefore, consider such opinion as a decision of the whole case, and would be prepared, so far as they could be influenced by the judge, to pronounce the defendant guilty, before they heard the cause examined, or even a syllable of the evidence. In a case thus situated, how could the defendant be said to enjoy the benefit of the assistance of counsel; when the whole case was decided before the counsel was permitted to be heard; and no ground left for them to occupy? This mode of proceeding, adopted by the judge, was, therefore, a direct violation of the Constitutional right secured to the defendant, of having the assistance of counsel in all criminal prosecutions; for it cannot be pretended that to hear counsel after the cause was substantially decided, would be complying with the true intent and meaning of the Constitution; for this would render the provision totally futile and useless, and would be calculated only to deceive unfortunate defendants, who might place reliance upon it. The judge, in delivering this opinion, introduced a mode of proceeding new and before unknown in our jurisprudence; and contrary to the known and established usages and practice of the courts in our country. All the legal characters that have been examined as witnesses on both sides, and most of the witnesses to this article were legal characters, prove the fact, that no such practice ever did exist in this country; not one solitary case can be adduced of a similar proceeding by a judge, either in this country or in that from which we have taken most of our laws and usages. The writers on the laws of England afford no instance of this kind; and it was left for Judge Chase to introduce this extraordinary and before unheard-of mode of administering justice.

But it is insisted on, by the judge in his answer, that the opinion was a correct one, as to the law of treason, supported by former decisions, and, therefore, there would be no harm in making it known, at the time and in the manner he did; that it could not mislead the jury, but would guard them against being imposed upon by the ingenuity of counsel. Though this reasoning may appear plausible at first view, it will be found, upon examination, to be fallacious, tending to establish a dangerous doctrine, that would in principle go the whole length of justifying a judge, for dispensing with the intervention of a jury altogether in trials for crimes. If a judge may give a solemn opinion against a defendant in a criminal case, without permitting counsel to be heard in his behalf, when the party is entitled of right to the assistance of counsel, and then justify such conduct by showing that the opinion itself was correct, and must have been delivered by him in some stage of the trial; why may he not pass sentence of execution upon a criminal without the verdict or intervention of a jury? And, when charged with this conduct as unconstitutional and illegal, justify himself by showing that the sentence he passed was a correct one, that the facts in the case were notorious and admitted on all hands; that the law was clear and had been established by former decisions that could not be shaken; and that, therefore, the intervention of a jury could be of no service to the defendant, as they must find him guilty; and that, as he would have to declare the same sentence he had pronounced, after their verdict should have been rendered, it could do no harm to pronounce it without such verdict; as it could not do an injury to pass a correct sentence at any time? This reasoning would be of the same kind with that advanced by the judge in the case before you, to justify him in delivering a written opinion, before the cause was heard, or the defendant permitted to make his defence by counsel; for if in the one case it would be a violation of the Constitutional right of a trial by jury, secured to defendants in criminal prosecutions, so in the other case it would be equally a violation of the Constitutional right secured to defendants of having the assistance of counsel in their defence. The reason therefore of the judge, if it proved any thing, would prove too much; it would virtually destroy the most valuable provisions in our Constitution for the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizen; and authorize a judge or court at pleasure to dispense with Constitutional restrictions, when they found it convenient so to do.

But in the present investigation, the correctness or incorrectness of the written opinion delivered by the judge, is not in question; this opinion is not charged to be in itself incorrect or erroneous, but the offence charged is in the manner and time of delivering it; the attempt, therefore, by the judge, to justify his conduct by insisting that the opinion delivered was correct, and authorized by former decisions, is a mere evasion of the real charge alleged in the impeachment, and an exertion to prove what was not denied or put in question. It cannot therefore, in fact, aid the accused, or make his case better than it would be if such opinion had been evidently erroneous; but it is not intended, in this place, to admit the correctness of the opinion delivered by the judge in writing, by not going into the discussion of it; but this discussion of the opinion is omitted here, because its correctness or incorrectness is irrelevant to the present question, and, therefore, unnecessary to be discussed.

I will now proceed to consider the third position stated, to wit: That the judge did impose on the counsel engaged on behalf of Fries, arbitrary restrictions and control in the exercise of their professional rights, unknown to and unauthorized by the laws and usages of the nation. In support of this part of the charge there is the evidence of Mr. Lewis, who states that when the judge delivered the written opinion in the manner already noticed, he observed that on the former trials there had been a great waste of time by counsel making long speeches to the jury, on the law as well as on the fact, and stated his disapprobation of their having been permitted to read certain statutes of the United States, relating to crimes less than treason, which he, or the court, declared they would not suffer to be read again; and that cases at common law, or under the statute law of England previous to the English Revolution, had nothing to do with the question, and that they would not suffer them to be read; that they had made up their mind on the law. This is, in substance, the evidence of Mr. Lewis on this point, and it is strongly supported by that of Mr. Dallas, who, though he was not present when this statement was made by the judge, yet corroborates the truth of it by the statement he made to the court afterwards on the same day, as made to him by Mr. Lewis, and by the circumstances that took place in consequence thereof. Mr. Dallas also states that the judge said, as he thinks on the next day, that in arguing upon the law the counsel must address themselves to the court alone, and not the jury. The evidence of Messrs. Rawle and Tilghman support most of these facts in substance, except as to the judge refusing to permit the statutes of the United States to be cited, and differ only as to the time at which the judge made these declarations; these facts, therefore, are supported by evidence that cannot be shaken; and were the evidence given by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, different from that given by Messrs. Tilghman, Rawle, and others, more weight and credit ought to be given to the evidence of the former gentlemen than to that of the latter, though all may be men of equal integrity and veracity ; for there is a material distinction between the credit due to witnesses as men of integrity and veracity, and the weight or credit that ought to be given to their evidence as containing a correct and full statement of facts. Two men may be of equal credibility in society, and equally tenacious of deposing the truth ; yet the evidence of the one as to a particular transaction, may deserve much more weight and credit than that of the other, in consequence of his possessing better means of information, and being so circumstanced as to feel more interest in, and receive stronger impressions from the facts that may have taken place ; so in the question before us, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas felt the strongest interest in the transaction that took place ; their rights as counsel were invaded, and the impressions they received were strong and not easily effaced. Mr. Lewis had the most correct means of information ; his attention was arrested by the paper containing the opinion being handed or offered to him ; the statement of the judge containing the restrictions already stated, immediately followed, to which he attended ; he could not, therefore, possibly be mistaken ; and the impression so strongly made, by so extraordinary a transaction, could not be erased from his memory. This was not the case with Messrs. Rawle and Tilghman, for though Mr. Rawle was concerned for the prosecution, he states he was much engaged with other business ; the opinion delivered was also in favor of his side of the question, and of course the affair was not likely to excite so much the interest of those gentlemen, or make so deep an impression on their minds. The evidence, therefore, of Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas may be considered as a correct statement of this transaction. These restrictions, therefore, imposed upon the counsel, of not citing such authorities as were usually permitted to be used, and not arguing the law to the jury, are unauthorized by the laws of our country, and contrary to the usages and practice of our courts of justice, and in the case in question amounted to a prohibition to argue the cause in any possible way that could be of the least service to the defendant. That these restrictions were unauthorized by the practice in our courts, is established by the evidence of every witness that has been examined to this point, who declare that no such restrictions had ever been imposed on counsel, concerned in criminal cases, in any courts with which they had been acquainted, and particularly by the practice of the circuit court of the United States in the same State, in the trial of the same cause before, and in other similar trials, when the utmost latitude was given the counsel in making their defence. This was, therefore, a direct and arbitrary innovation on the known and established modes of proceeding in courts of justice in criminal cases, and an unwarrantable attack on the privileges secured to defendants by the Constitution and laws of the country. That judges are not authorized to substitute their own arbitrary will in place of law, and to dispense at pleasure with the established rules of proceeding in the tribunals of justice, is proved by every principle of reason and of law. To show that this position has been expressly recognised by law writers, and legal decisions for ages, I will refer the court to 2. Bac. Ab., (new edition) page 97, where it is declared that, "judges are to determine according to the known law and ancient customs of the realm ;" and to 4 Com. Dig. 418, where it is stated that "judges ought to act conformably to law, and not according to discretion."

These authorities, when we consider the country from which they come, and the times in which they were written, strongly mark the limits that ought to circumscribe the conduct of the judge. And shall the judges in our country assume greater latitude in their proceedings than those of England, and depart at pleasure from what are known to be the customs of the country ? I should presume not. But the judge states in his answer, that decisions at common law, and before the Revolution in England, could throw no light on the doctrine of treason here, but might mislead the jury ; and, therefore, ought not to be admitted to be read, not being law ; and he wades into the dark ages of the history of England, when the judges were corrupt and under the influence of the Crown. This reasoning of the judge is evidently an evasion of the point in question. The object of the counsel for Fries, in wishing to cite those authorities, both at common law and under the statute of Edward the Third, was not to show by them what the construction of the words of our Constitution with regard to the treason ought to be ; but to show first, the absurd and ridiculous lengths to which those decisions had gone, in determining what acts amounted to treason there, and then to prove that since the English Revolution, the judges in England considered themselves bound by cases decided before the Revolution, and that as the decisions on treason in England, since their revolution, were bottomed upon those cases before the revolution, they ought not to govern the courts in this country, in giving a construction to the words of our Constitution, in order to determine what acts amounted to treason. This was evidently the object of the counsel, and it is proved to have been so stated by them, by the evidence of Mr. Lewis, Mr. Dallas, and Mr. Rawle. There was, therefore, no ground for the pretence the judge makes for refusing these authorities to be introduced.

It is admitted by the answer that the jury have the right to decide upon the law as well as upon the fact ; and if it were denied, it could be shown by clear and undoubted authorities, of ancient and modern times. From what motives, therefore, and under what plausible pretence, could the judge refuse to permit the law to be argued before the jury ? How could they decide upon it properly, without hearing it discussed ? And with what color of reasoning can the judge say that the jury have the right to decide the law, and yet that they have not the right to hear it argued and explained by counsel ? Does not this show the greatest absurdity, and prove that the accused must have had some object in view, that he did not choose to avow, and that would not bear examination? In this case there was no dispute about the facts; the answer states, they were admitted on both sides. The judge makes up his opinion upon the law, commits it to writing, and makes it known as the opinion of the court; before the jury are impanelled in the case. For what purpose was counsel assigned to the defendant? What remained for the counsel to examine or contest, when the facts were admitted and the law decided by the court? Would not the assistance of counsel, under such circumstances, be to the defendant a mere phantom, a name without substance? Was not the assignment of counsel, in this case, and with such views as the judge must have had, an useless ceremony, an empty compliance with form, a mere mock of justice? The clear inference from the whole transaction must be, that the judge was determined the defendant should derive no benefit from the assistance of counsel, and only affected to permit them to argue the facts to the jury, because he knew they were not disputed, even by the defendant himself. It must, therefore, be a fair inference that the defendant was deprived of the assistance of counsel, by the unwarrantable, illegal, and unauthorized restrictions imposed upon them in the performance of their professional duties by the judge.

It remains on this part of the subject, to show that this conduct of the judge was such a flagrant violation of his duty, as could only spring from corrupt motives, and a disposition to oppress those who became the objects of his resentment. I lay it down as a settled rule of decision, that when a man violates a law, or commits a manifest breach of his duty, an evil intent or corrupt motive must be presumed to have actuated his conduct; as every man is presumed to know the law, and every officer or judge to understand their duty; and if the party will undertake to excuse himself, for misconduct, on the score of pure motives and unintentional error, it is incumbent on him to make the same appear by satisfactory and incontestible evidence. In some instances, erroneous conduct may be explained, excused, or palliated, by the weakness or ignorance of the delinquent, and the circumstances that attended the case. But in this whole transaction, what marks of innocence or pure motives, are to be discovered?—What excuse to be offered for the conduct of the accused? Ignorance of the law cannot be relied upon as forming a ground of excuse. The legal talents, long experience, and distinguished abilities of the judge, are too well known to admit of such a plea. It was no new and difficult case, wherein he might be easily mistaken. There were no former precedents to lead him astray. The proceeding was entirely new, and of his own invention; a total deviation from all former practice, and a manifest innovation upon the established usages in our courts of justice. The whole bar were agitated by the proceeding; counsel of near thirty years practice felt embarrassed and astonished at it. The common sense of the whole audience appeared shocked at the transaction, as being altogether new and extraordinary. The accused, in his answer, states that he relied upon the decisions of the circuit courts, wherein Judges Iredell and Paterson presided, with regard to the law of treason, as forming a precedent from which he would not even dare to depart. Why did he not consider himself equally bound by the practice they adopted in criminal cases? They gave the utmost latitude to counsel in making their defence to the jury, both on the law and the fact, did not restrict them as to the authorities they should cite, and delivered no opinion until the cause was heard. Judge Chase reversed the whole of this mode of proceeding. What good reason can be given for his adhering to their opinion in the one instance, and totally departing from their practice and example in the other? No excuse can be formed for this conduct. This is the strongest possible evidence of corrupt motives, of partiality, and a determined design to overleap all former rules of proceeding, to oppress the unfortunate defendant that was arraigned at his bar for trial. The whole course of the judge's conduct in this transaction goes to establish the same spirit of oppression. Counsel are assigned the defendant, merely for the sake of form, and, as it were, to mock him in his misfortunes. The day of trial arrives. In the mean time the judge makes up his opinion on the law arising in the case, and, to add solemnity to the act, commits it to writing. There is no doubt, no dispute as to the facts. The prisoner is brought to the bar. Not a voice is permitted to plead his cause, until the solemn sentence of his legal conviction is made known; and thereby the avenues of his defence, that might lead to his acquittal, for ever closed.

Here let us pause a moment, and behold the unfortunate, and, in the language of his able counsel, poor Fries, trembling before his condemning judge, stripped of the aid of counsel, his only and forlorn hope; the fatal fiat of his condemnation pronounced in the solemn language of a written opinion; and thus friendless, unprotected, and unheard, about to be consigned to the hand of the relentless executioner! Let us view this spectacle, and then let me ask, if this can be considered an impartial administration of justice? I might here charge the accused with having knowingly and wilfully trampled on the laws of his country, and overleaped the bounds of legal justice, to oppress a friendless individual brought before him for trial. I might call upon this honorable court to vindicate the character of insulted justice, and demonstrate to the American people, that when their rights and liberties are invaded, even though under the sacred sanction of judicial authority, this high tribunal will always be found ready and willing to avenge their wrongs and protect their interests.

But it is alleged by the judge that the offensive written opinion that had been made known was withdrawn, and that next day full latitude was offered to the counsel to argue both the law and the facts to the jury. This was a fallacious offer. It came too late to be of service to the defendant, or excuse the judge. The act on his part was done—the offence was complete—and it was only the sternness of the counsel that made him retract. The impression had been made on the minds of the jury that could not be erased—the flame had been kindled by the fire-brands he had scattered, which could not be extinguished by withdrawing the instruments that occasioned it. The experiment was as dangerous as it was novel, and can only be ascribed to the same spirit of oppression and political intolerance that will be found to distinguish the whole conduct of the judge in his judicial career during these transactions.

The respondent further insists, in his answer, that he cannot be impeached, except for some offence for which he may be indicted at law. This position cannot be supported by any fair construction of the provision in the Constitution on this subject. It has already been attempted to be shown, in the view taken of this Constitutional provision, that in order to support an impeachment it is not necessary to show that the offence charged is an indictable one, but only that it is a breach and violation of official duty; and I conceive that this is the only construction that can be adopted to give consistency to the Constitution; to the mode of proceeding adopted under it in cases of impeachment; to reconcile with justice the nature of the judgment that must be rendered upon conviction, and to avoid the palpable absurdity that would follow a different construction of punishing a man twice for the same offence. To the exposition already given of this provision in the Constitution, I beg leave to refer the court as controverting the position here relied upon by the judge. But I would here further observe, in support of this doctrine, that according to the laws of England, a judge of a court of record is not accountable by indictment for anything done in open court, in his judicial capacity, and that he may plead to an action brought against him, for any such act, that he did it, (that is, what he was charged with) as a judge of record; and it would be a good justification. In support of this doctrine the court are referred to 2 Bac. Ab. (new ed.) page 97; 2 Hawk. 113; Jac. Law Dictionary, (new ed.) verbum Judges. It appears from the same authorities that the judges in England are accountable in Parliament only for opinions delivered by them in court; and are not, for such opinions, to be questioned before any other tribunal. This is the great protection and security that judges of courts of record have, that they are accountable for their official conduct only to the legislature, and are punishable at law only for such acts as would be indictable offences, independent of their official character. This view of the subject renders the judges, so far as regards their judicial conduct, independent of all tribunals except the legislature, and is certainly better calculated to preserve the independence and dignity of the judges, than that contended for in the answer. I cannot, therefore, entertain a reasonable doubt that the true intent and meaning of the Constitution will support this doctrine, and that it will be sanctioned by the opinion of this honorable Court.

Mr. Campbell here observed that he had closed the remarks he proposed making on the first part of the subject, and, finding himself indisposed, expressed a wish that the Court would adjourn.

Whereupon the Court rose.

MR. CAMPBELL, in continuation.

I will now proceed, as well as my indisposition will permit, to examine in a brief manner the second part of the subject, containing the several charges founded on the trial of Callender, at Richmond, as stated in the second, third, and fourth articles of the impeachment. I will consider these several articles in the order in which the transactions on which they are founded took place in court. In order to ascertain the motives that actuated the judge in this whole transaction, it will only be necessary to view his conduct as proved, so far as the same relates to this subject, previous to the trial. The first account we have of the intended prosecution, or I might say persecution, of Callender, is at Annapolis. Here the judge received the famous book called the "Prospect Before Us," upon which the prosecution was founded, and here the determination was formed to convict and punish Callender. The respondent said he would take the book with him to Richmond; that the libellous parts had been marked by Mr. Martin, and that before he returned he would teach the lawyers of Virginia to know the difference between the liberty and licentiousness of the press; and, that if the Commonwealth of Virginia was not totally depraved, if there was a jury of honest men to be found in the State, he would punish Callender before he returned from Richmond. This is the evidence of Mr. Mason, nearly in his own words, and no person will pretend to doubt its correctness. What language could be used that would more clearly show the partiality and predetermination of the judge to punish Callender, and the spirit of persecution by which he was actuated. Again: on his way to Richmond, according to the evidence of Mr. Triplett, the judge reviles the object of his intended vengeance; states his surprise and regret that he had not been hanged in Virginia; remarks that the United States had shown too much lenity to such renegadoes; and after arriving at Richmond, informs the deponent he was afraid they would not be able to get the damn'd rascal that court. Thus evincing in every stage of this business that intolerant spirit of oppression and vengeance that seems to have given spring to all his actions. After the indictment is found against Callender, the panel of the petit jury is presented to the judge; he inquires if he had any of the creatures called Democrats on that panel, directs the marshal to examine it, and if there were any such on it, to strike them off. This is the evidence of Mr. Heath, whose character and standing in society are known to many of the members of this honorable Court. And though his evidence is opposed to the negative declarations of Mr. Randolph, who affirms that he did not present the panel of the jury to the judge, or receive such directions, yet I conceive the court will give more weight to the affirmative declarations of Mr. Heath, with regard to these facts, than to the negative assertions of Mr. Randolph, who may have forgotten the transaction. This point rests upon the integrity and veracity of Mr. Heath. He could not receive the impression of these facts, unless the transaction had taken place; he could not reasonably be mistaken; the affair was new and extraordinary, and must have arrested his attention; and in this case there is no ground to make allowance for a treacherous memory, for it is not pretended that the witness, Mr. Heath, has forgot the facts, but that they never existed. If you do not, therefore, believe the statement he makes, it must follow that you admit the witness has wilfully and corruptly stated a falsehood. This, I presume, will not be admitted. But on the other hand, Mr. Randolph may have forgotten the transaction in the bustle of business, and this will account for the difference in the evidence of the witnesses without impeaching the veracity of either. This mode of reconciling the evidence is agreeable to the rules of law. I take the facts, therefore, as stated by Mr. Heath, to be correct, and they afford an instance of judicial depravity hitherto unequalled and unknown in our country—a direct attempt to pack a jury of the same political sentiments with the judge to try the defendant. This is a faint representation of the previous conduct of the judge relative to this subject, before whom the defendant was about to be tried, or rather before whom he was to be called for certain conviction and punishment, for it ought not to be dignified with the name of a trial. With this view, therefore, of the temper and disposition of the judge, and of his previous conduct on this occasion, we will examine the first important step taken in the trial, in which the designs of the judge begin more clearly to unfold themselves, viz: his refusal to postpone or continue the trial until the next term, on an affidavit regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses and the places of their residence, being the second charge in the fourth article.

It is admitted by the respondent, in his answer, that an affidavit was filed, which he exhibits to the court, and a motion made thereupon by the counsel of Callender to continue his cause for trial until the next term; and it is proved by the evidence of Mr. Hay and Mr. Nicholas, that, as counsel for Callender, they insisted for a continuance of the case on the grounds stated in the affidavit, and also on other grounds; that they were not prepared to argue the law arising in the case, for want of time to examine the subject, and that the defendant was not, by the laws of Virginia, bound to come to trial that term. Here it may be proper to show what are the grounds for a continuance known in law, and to inquire whether those stated in the affidavit come within the decisions heretofore made in courts of justice. On this subject I will refer the court to one authority only, but one equally respectable with any that can be produced on criminal law.—Foster Cr. Law, pp. 2, 3. Here Mr. Campbell read the case at length, and then observed that this decision took place in a country where criminal law is executed with as much rigor as in any in the world where there is the shadow of liberty; and yet the affidavit filed in this case, upon which a continuance was granted, only states the absence of material witnesses and the places of their abode; the defendants were not required to state the facts that those witnesses would prove. In ordinary cases, the courts do not require this, and in many cases it would be impossible for the defendant to know all that a witness could give in evidence; nor is the defendant bound, except in ordinary cases, to disclose the evidence that his witnesses, who are absent, can give, as it might endanger his defence and give an advantage to the prosecutor, if so disposed, to procure evidence, whether true or false, to controvert that of the defendant. The court, in the case cited, was held by a special commission from the Crown, for the purpose of trying offenders for crimes of the deepest die, and such as are punished in that country with the utmost rigor; yet the court continued the cases of those defendants for such a length of time as was deemed sufficient to procure their witnesses, according to the distances at which they resided. There were in this case no stated terms to which the court could adjourn and continue the causes; they therefore fixed upon a reasonable time, and adjourned over to such day, in order to enable the defendants to prepare for trial; and it was observed by the court, in that case, as an additional ground for continuance, that the indictments had not been found until the court sat, and that, therefore, the defendants had not time to prepare for trial. This was the case with Callender; he had no notice of this prosecution until after the indictment was found, and during the same term; he therefore could not have had time to prepare for his trial. The affidavit he filed was stronger and much more full than that in the case cited; it states the absence of a number of witnesses whose evidence the deponent declares material to his defence. This would be sufficient to authorize a continuance upon a first application, and more ought not to have been required; but the affidavit goes further, and states the substance, as far as the defendant knew, of the evidence the witnesses could give; and also states the want of papers and books, material to the defence, that could not be obtained without allowing a considerable time to procure them. What more could be stated in an affidavit for a continuance on the ground of want of testimony by any defendant who wished to adhere to the truth? Yet a continuance is refused, and the judge states in his answer, as the principal cause of such refusal, that the evidence of all the witnesses stated in the affidavit to be in writing would not prove the truth of all the charges in the indictment, and would not, therefore, make a complete justification if procured, and enters into an examination of the charges and evidence to prove this position. This excuse of the accused is founded on a train of the most fallacious and sophistical reasoning that can be resorted to, and is no more than a groundless apology, by which, if possible, to evade the true question, and avoid the odium that ought and must attach to such a transaction. It is not denied by the judge that the absent witnesses would prove in part the charges in the indictment; but he says it ought to appear, they could prove the whole. By this rule, in order to obtain a continuance, the party must show to the court the whole of the evidence necessary to support his case, and the judge is to compare the evidence with the charges, and must be satisfied that it is sufficient to cover the whole of the case, or he will not grant a continuance. This doctrine is too absurd to require a refutation; it would destroy all the benefit that could arise to parties from the right, so well established in law, of continuing causes upon affidavit of absent material witnesses; and subject the right to a fair and impartial trial to the mere arbitrary will of a judge, who would thus assume the right to weigh the evidence wanted, and measure its materiality by his prejudice against the party. This would, in fact, tend in many instances to destroy the trial by jury, and reduce it to a mere form without substance; for the party could not state on oath all that his witnesses could prove once in a hundred times. But the answer states that the court proposed to postpone the trial for a month, and some of the witnesses go further than the accused himself, and say for six weeks; and this is relied upon as showing the disposition of the judge to accommodate the defendant. This is a pretence to accommodate that could answer the defendant no valuable purpose. The absent witnesses resided at such great distances, that most of them could not be procured in that time, and this the judge well knew. He even states in his answer that they lived at such great distances as left no reasonable ground to believe they could be procured at the succeeding term, being six months, and yet pretends that one month or six weeks would be sufficient. But here I must notice, that it is remarkable the counsel for the defendant never heard of this proposed postponement, and I must therefore conclude it was not seriously made; but if it was, it only proves that the judge was determined to try Callender himself, and would not, therefore, on any ground whatever, continue the cause to a succeeding term, at which he was not to be present. He had, therefore, determined to punish Callender, and could not trust his case to the management of any other judge. This is of a piece with the rest of his conduct on this occasion, and presents this honorable Court and the world with an instance of the most flagrant abuse of common justice, under the sacred sanction of administering the law for the correction of offenders.

The next charge which I propose to examine is contained in the second article of the impeachment, and consists in the judge's overruling the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the trial of Callender, because he had made up his mind as to the book from which the words charged to be libellous in the indictment had been drawn. The Constitution secures to defendants charged with crimes, the right of a trial by an impartial jury; anything, therefore, that goes to show that a man has made up an opinion with regard to the guilt or innocence of the accused, or with regard to the matter in question, or decided it in his own mind, proves him to be disqualified to serve as a juror, because it proves he is not impartial, has a bias upon his mind, and cannot be said to be indifferent. The same doctrine is supported by the laws of England. In order to show this, I will refer the court to 3 Bac. Ab. (new ed.) 756, and also Co. Litt. 158; where it is stated, if a juror has declared his opinion, touching the matter in question, &c., or has done anything by which it appears that he cannot be indifferent or impartial, &c., these are principal causes of challenge; and therefore such juror would be disqualified. Here it is manifest, that though declaring an opinion is good cause of challenge to a juror, if it is not necessary he should declare such opinion in order to disqualify him; it is sufficient that he has done something, whether making up an opinion, or doing any act whatever, by which it appears he is not indifferent, is not perfectly impartial. The objection, therefore, made to Basset as a juror, ought to have been sustained, and he ought to have been excused from serving on the jury, upon two grounds. First, because he had made up an opinion with regard to the matter of the charge against Callender. This is proved by the evidence of Basset himself, who says, he had seen in a newspaper, extracts stated in the publication to have been taken from the Prospect Before Us; and he stated to the court on the trial, that he had made up his opinion that those extracts were seditious, and that the author of the book called the Prospect Before Us, or that from which these extracts were taken, was within the sedition act, and therefore punishable under it. It was at the time notorious and well known that Callender was the author of the Prospect Before Us; it was equally notorious and known that the indictment against him was founded on that book: and Mr. Basset stated, he had no reason to doubt that the extracts were taken from that book as stated in the papers. Is it not, therefore, clear, that forming an opinion with regard to the extracts, was forming an opinion with regard to the matter charged as libellous in the indictment? No reasonable doubt can exist on this point, and though Mr. Basset did not hear the indictment read, as the court refused to permit it to be read until the jury were sworn, a measure under such circumstances as extraordinary as it was new; yet he knew the subject-matter it contained as well as if he had heard it. The opinion, therefore, that he had made up his mind on this subject, clearly proves he was not indifferent, was not impartial; he had decided the guilt of Callender, in fact, in his own mind, and could not be expected to shake off the effect of such prejudication. He was, therefore, according to the Constitution, and the law already cited, disqualified from being a juror, having done an act that showed he was not indifferent, was not impartial, and ought of course to have been excused from serving on the jury. He ought also to have been rejected as a juror on a second ground; because he had not only made up an opinion on the matter in question, but had declared that opinion in public: It is proved by the evidence of Mr. Basset himself, as well as by that of Mr. Hay and Mr. Nicholas, and also by that of Mr. Robinson, that when he was asked whether he had formed and delivered an opinion upon the charge in the indictment, he stated, that although he had never heard the indictment read, yet he had formed an opinion that the author of the Prospect Before Us was within the sedition act. This, as has been already insisted upon, was the same as forming an opinion upon the charges in the indictment, as he knew the indictment was founded upon that book; and this opinion, which he had formed, he then declared in open court, in the hearing of all bystanders, and before he was sworn as a juror. This was, therefore, according to the rule laid down by the judge and the question he declared proper to be asked, a complete disqualification of Mr. Basset from serving as a juror on that trial. For he had formed and delivered an opinion on the matter in question. And what difference could it make, whether such opinion was delivered a minute or an hour before the juror was sworn on the trial, or a week, or a month before? Certainly the effect on his mind must be the same, and he must be equally unfit to serve as a juror in either case. On both of these grounds, therefore, Mr. Basset ought certainly to have been rejected from serving as a juror on the trial of Callender; and this is so glaring an innovation on the impartiality of trial by jury, (the security of our rights and great bulwark of our liberties,) that when taken in connexion with the rest of the judge's conduct, it strongly evinces an overbearing disposition, that would not stop at the use of any means, however unjust and illegal, to obtain a desired object. He had told the marshal, if he had on his list of jurors any creatures called democrats, to strike them off. He, therefore, knew the political sentiments of those who were called as jurors, to be favorable to his wishes, as no doubt this direction was pursued. Mr. Basset had declared his opinion, that the author of the Prospect Before Us was within the sedition law, who was notoriously known to be Callender. He therefore knew the sentiments of the juror; knew he must be disposed to convict the defendant, and for this reason he would not excuse him from serving on the trial, but would pervert the meaning of the law to make it subservient to his own views.

The next charge to be inquired into, is that stated in the third article, in rejecting the evidence of Colonel Taylor, a material witness in favor of the defendant, on the pretence that he could not prove the truth of the whole of one charge. In this instance the judge acted contrary to all former precedents in courts of justice, and without the shadow of law or reason to justify his conduct. Not a solitary case could be stated by any of the witnesses of a similar conduct in a judge. The rule here adopted, with regard to the admissibility of evidence, would deprive the jury of their undoubted right to decide on the credibility and weight of evidence, as well as on the extent to which it proved the matter in question; would transfer in substance this right to the court, and thereby shake to its very centre the fabric so justly admired, and held so sacred, of trial by jury. It would make it necessary for the party to present to the court, all the evidence relied upon to make out his case: This evidence, the court or judge would first deliberately examine, compare it with the charges or case to be supported, and if it did not, in his opinion, prove the whole of one charge, or go the whole extent of the case to be established by it, he would reject it, and not permit the jury to hear it. This would strip the jury of the very prerogative that renders this kind of trial so much superior to all others, that of deciding on the weight and credit of evidence. There is a manifest distinction between the right which a judge has to decide upon the admissibility of evidence, on the ground of its being proper or improper according to the established rules of law, and the right here assumed of deciding upon the extent to which such evidence, that is admitted to relate to the matter in question, will go to support the case: the former is the exercise of a proper authority to prevent the admission of extraneous and improper matter, wholly irrelevant to the matter in question; the latter is an arbitrary assumption of power, to decide on the extent to which evidence admitted to be relevant, at least in some degree, would go to prove the matter in question; and is a direct innovation on the most sacred privilege of the jury. Nothing can be more absurd and dangerous, than the consequences that would flow from such a doctrine. The judge would first weigh the evidence himself, measure its extent, reject it at pleasure, and call this a trial by jury. But I must here be permitted to notice the reasoning resorted to by the judge in his answer, to excuse his conduct on this occasion, which is as dangerous and absurd, in its consequences, as it is subtle and evasive. It is stated by the judge, that the plea of justice must answer the whole charge, or it is bad on the demurrer; and that when the matter of defence may be given in evidence without being formally pleaded, the same rules prevail. This doctrine of the judge would require the party to show, that the evidence he offered would cover the whole of his case, with the same exactness and formality that he would file a plea to avoid its being held bad on a demurrer: thus narrowing down the province of the jury, and subjecting the decision of all the facts as well as the law to the court. There is no rule of law to warrant such a proceeding, and it is manifestly contrary to all reasoning on the subject. The plea, in order to be good, must state matter sufficient to justify that part of the charge or suit to which it is put in; the demurrer admits all the facts stated in the plea that are well pleaded, but cannot admit facts that are not stated in it, therefore the plea must appear to contain sufficient matter of justification, or it will be held bad on demurrer; but no such rule was ever heard of before to apply to evidence offered to a jury. They alone are the proper and only tribunal to decide whether the evidence offered and given is sufficient to prove the whole matter in dispute or not; and if the jury be deprived of this right, there is nothing left them that deserves the name of a trial.

The judge insists, if he was mistaken, it was an error of judgment. This cannot be presumed. Ignorance of the law is no excuse in any man; but in a character of such high legal standing and known abilities as that of the accused, it is totally inadmissible and not to be presumed. How could any judge with upright intentions commit so many errors, or hit upon so many mistakes in the course of one trial, as are manifest in that of Callender? They must have been the result of design, and a predetermination to bear down all opposition, in order to convict and punish the defendant.

But it is stated that Judge Griffin concurred with him in opinion, and this is insisted upon by the accused in different parts of his answer, as an excuse for the errors he committed, if, as he states, they were errors. This seems to be a kind of forlorn hope resorted to, when all other expedients fail. To this argument of the judge I would in this place answer, once for all, that it can be no excuse for him, nor any justification of his offences, that another has been equally guilty with himself; and it must strongly prove the weakness of his defence to rely upon this ground. Though Judge Griffin has not yet been called to an account for his conduct on this occasion, that is no reason why he should not hereafter be made to answer for it. The nation has not said he was innocent, or that he will not be proceeded against for this conduct; and there is no limitation of time that would screen him from the effects of charges of this kind, if they should be brought forward and supported against him hereafter. No ground of excuse therefore can arise from the circumstance of Judge Griffin not having been called upon to answer for his conduct in this respect.

I will now proceed to notice very briefly the conduct of the judge in the subsequent part of this trial. Compelling the defendant's counsel to reduce to writing all questions to be asked the witness, was a direct innovation on the practice in our courts of justice, and tended to embarrass the management of and weaken the defence. It is proved by the testimony of all the witnesses, that no such practice ever prevailed in our courts of justice, for such a purpose as that avowed in this instance; the only cases in which it is required to reduce to writing questions to be asked a witness, and the only cases in which it can be proper or consistent with reason and justice to do so, are those in which an objection is made to a question proposed to be asked, on the ground of its being improper and contrary to the rules of evidence; and in order to ascertain the precise meaning and effect of the question, so as to decide on the objection made to it, it may be proper to require it to be reduced to writing, but it never was before done, so far as we can discover, for the purpose of ascertaining how far the witness could prove the matter in question, and whether he could prove the whole of one charge or not, and thereby decide whether the witness should or should not be examined. According to this rule the judge would first try the cause himself upon the evidence offered, by the questions thus reduced to writing, and if he did not consider such evidence fully sufficient to support the whole of the charge or case to which it was offered, he would reject it, and not permit the jury to hear a word of it, lest they might consider it stronger than he did, and give it sufficient weight to support the case to which it was offered. This mode of proceeding was left to be discovered and adopted by Judge Chase. No other court or judge ever attempted in this manner to trifle with the rights of the jury, and establish a doctrine so tyrannical and oppressive; but this is in perfect conformity with the whole of his conduct on this occasion; a preconcerted system of oppression, to bring the defendant, Callender, to certain conviction and punishment. For the same purpose the defendant's counsel were ridiculed, treated with indignity, and the whole audience entertained at their expense. They were frequently and abruptly interrupted in their arguments; charged with wilfully perverting the law, in order to impose upon and deceive the multitude: called boys, by way of derision, and treated as mere mush-rooms of the day, who ought to cringe submissively when they appear before a circuit court in which the honorable judge presided. He was facetious, witty, and sarcastic, as the occasion required; and it is pretended there can be no harm in this; it was all in jest and good humor! It is too serious a matter, Mr. President, for judges thus to jest and trifle with the rights and liberties of the citizen. Though this proceeding was levelled immediately at the counsel, it was the defendant who was the principal object of resentment, who was intended to be made an example of, and who felt the injury and became liable to the consequences of such illegal and unjust conduct of the judge.

Barely to notice the conduct of the respondent, at Newcastle, in Delaware, as charged in the seventh article is sufficient to show that he was there actuated by the same spirit of persecution and oppression that has, as already stated, marked the whole of his conduct during the course of these transactions. That he should descend from the elevated and dignified station in which he was placed as a judge, to hunt for crimes as a common informer against his fellow-citizens; urge the jury to take notice of, and present certain persons sufficiently designated though not named; and press the attorney for the district to search for evidence among the files of newspapers to support a prosecution, was degrading to the sacred character of a judge, and was perverting the Judicial authority to a mere engine of persecution to answer party purposes. Of the same complexion with this is the conduct of the respondent in delivering an inflammatory and disorganizing charge to the grand jury at Baltimore, as stated in the eighth article of the impeachment. This proceeding evinced a mind inflamed by party spirit and political intolerance; it was calculated to disturb the peace of the community, and alarm the people at the measures of Government: to force them by the terror of judicial denunciation to relinquish their own political sentiments and adopt those of the judge. This was the favorite object of this whole proceeding, and to obtain it no means were left untried. It was attempted to excite the fears of the public mind, to destroy the confidence of the people in the administration of their Government. The judicial authority was prostituted to party purposes, and the fountains of justice were corrupted by this poisonous spirit of persecution, that seemed determined to bear down all opposition in order to succeed in a favorite object. Citizens of all descriptions felt alarmed at this new and unusual conduct. All the counsel at the bar, wherever the respondent went, though consisting of the ablest and most enlightened in the nation, were agitated into a general ferment, and the whole community seemed shocked at such outrages upon common sense; for, to go to trial was to go to certain conviction. Is this, Mr. President, the character that ought to distinguish the Judiciary of the United States? No, sir. The streams of justice that flow from the American bench ought to be as pure as the sunbeams that light up the morning. The accused should come before the court, with a well founded confidence that the law will be administered to him with justice, impartiality, and in mercy. When this is the case, he submits without a murmur to his fate, and hears the sentence of condemnation pronounced against him, with a mind that must approve the justice of the law and the impartiality of those who administer it.

The decision of this cause may form an important era in the annals of our country. Future generations are interested in the event. It may determine a question all important to the American people; whether the laws of our country are to govern, or the arbitrary will of those who are entrusted with their administration. Mr. President, we, on this important occasion, behold the rights and liberties of the American people hover round this honorable tribunal, about to be established on a firm basis by the decision you will make, or sent afloat on the ocean of uncertainty, to be tossed to and fro by the capricious breath of usurped power and innovation.

Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair as follows—Mr. President: I rise only to make a few remarks on two of the articles, the fifth and sixth, that the counsel for the respondent may be possessed of all the points we mean to make. I will endeavor, in a few words, to state the practice which we think ought to have been pursued in the case of Callender. The practice in the federal courts is regulated by that in each State. If this position be correct, we contend, that the proper process in the case of Callender was a summons. An act of Virginia, passed in the year 1792, provides that the grand jury "shall present all treasons, murders, felonies, or other misdemeanors whatsoever, which shall have been committed or done within the district for which they are impanelled."

By another act of Virginia, passed in the same year, it is enacted that, "upon presentment made by the grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons or other proper process against the person or persons so presented, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court, and thereupon hear and determine the same according to law."

In this last provision, the words "or other proper process," have a direct application to the previous provision, which enacts that the grand jury shall present all treasons, murders, felonies, "or other misdemeanors." For treasons, murders, and felonies, we admit that a capias is the proper process; and when the law directs other proper process, it had reference to a class of crimes where a capias was required. It is in vain alleged, that the counsel for Callender made no objection to the process issued. They were not at that time to be considered as his counsel; it was only after he was brought into court that their duty commenced.

Further, whether the proper process was a capias or summons, the law of Virginia requires that it shall be returnable to the next court; and I contend that this point is established by the English practice. To show which I refer to Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, where it is stated that a venire facias, which is in the nature of a summons, is the proper process, and that it is returnable to the next court.

It was surely, then, the duty of the judge to be acquainted with the laws of England, however unacquainted he may have been with the laws of Virginia. He cannot, therefore, on this ground, attempt a justification from ignorance. In his answer he informs us that ignorance of the law is no excuse. If it is no excuse in an unlettered individual, shall it constitute the apology of him who was expressly appointed to expound the law and administer justice? And if, on this occasion, he was not acquainted with the law, did it, therefore, become him to proceed with such fatal precipitancy? No sooner was the presentment made than the marshal, before any indictment was brought in, was despatched after Callender. We can only account for this, by supposing that it was the intention of the judge to act in conformity to his previous declaration, however jocularly it may have seemed to have been made; and that this was one of the means he had determined to pursue in order to convict Callender, regardless of the dignity of his station or the innocence of the man. Having offered these remarks, I am instructed to say that the case is fully opened on the part of the prosecution.

Mr. HOPKINSON.—Mr. President: We cannot remind you, and this honorable Court, as our opponents have so frequently done, that we address you in behalf of the majesty of the people. We appear for an ancient and infirm man, whose better days have been worn out in the service of that country which now degrades him; and who has nothing to promise you for an honorable acquittal but the approbation of your own consciences. We are happy, however, to concur with the honorable Managers in one point; I mean the importance they are disposed to give to this cause. In every relation and respect in which it can be viewed, it is, indeed, of infinite importance. It is important to the respondent to the full amount of his good name and reputation, and of that little portion of that happiness, the small residue of his life may afford. It is important to you, Senators and judges, inasmuch as you value the judgment which posterity shall pass upon the proceedings of this day. It is important to our country, as she estimates her character for sound, dignified, and impartial justice, in the eyes of a judging world. The little, busy vortex that plays immediately round the scene of action, considers this proceeding merely as the trial of Judge Chase, and gazes upon him as the only person interested in the result. This is a false and imperfect view of the case. It is not the trial of Judge Chase alone. It is a trial between him and his country, and that country is as deeply interested as the judge can be, in a fair and impartial investigation of the case, and in a just and honest decision of it. There is yet another dread tribunal to which we should not be inattentive. We should look to it with solemn impressions of respect. It is posterity; the race of men that will come after us. When all the false glare and false importance of the times shall pass away; when things shall settle down into a state of placid tranquillity and lose that bustling motion that deceives with false appearances; when you, most honorable Senators, who sit here to judge, as well as the respondent who sits here to be judged, shall alike rest in the silence of the tomb, then comes the faithful, the scrutinizing historian, who, without fear or favor, will record this transaction; then comes a just and impartial posterity, who, without regard to persons or to dignities, will decide upon your decision. Then, I trust, the high honor and integrity of this Court will stand recorded in the pure language of deserved praise, and this day will be remembered in the annals of our land, as honorable to the respondent, to his judges, and to the justice of our country.

We have heard, sir, from the honorable Managers who have addressed you, many harsh expressions. I hope, sir, they will do no harm. We have been told of the respondent's unholy sins, which even the heavenly expectation of sincere repentance cannot wash away; we have been told of his volumes of guilt, every page of which calls loudly for punishment. This sort of language but pursues the same spirit of asperity and reproach which was begun in the replication to our answer. But we come here, sir, not to complain of anything, we come expecting to bear and to forbear much. It does, indeed, seem to me, that the replication filed by the honorable Managers on behalf of the House of Representatives and of all the people, carries with it more acrimony than either the occasion or their dignity demanded. It may be said that they have resorted for it to English precedent, and framed it from the replication filed in the celebrated case of Warren Hastings. There is, however, no similarity between that case and ours. Precedents might have been found more mild in their character, and more adapted to the circumstances of our case. The impeachment of Hastings was not instituted on a petty catalogue of frivolous occurrences, more calculated to excite ridicule than apprehension, but for the alleged murder of princes and plunder of empires. If, however, the choice of this case as a precedent for our pleadings, has exposed us to some unpleasant expressions, it also furnishes to us abundance of consolation and hope. There, the most splendid talents that ever adorned the British nation, were strained to their utmost exertion to crush the devoted victim of malignant persecution. But in vain; the stern integrity, the enlightened perception, the immovable justice of his judges stood as a barrier between him and destruction, and safely protected him from the fury of the storm. So, I trust in God, it will be with us.

In England, the impeachment of a judge is a rare occurrence. I recollect but two in half a century. But, in our country, boasting of its superior purity and virtue, and declaiming ever against the vice, venality, and corruption of the Old World, seven judges have been prosecuted criminally in about two years. A melancholy proof either of extreme and unequalled corruption in our Judiciary, or of strange and persecuting times among us.

The first proper object of our inquiries in this case is, to ascertain with proper precision what acts or offences of a public officer are the objects of impeachment. This question meets us at the very threshold of the case. If it shall appear that the charges exhibited in these articles of impeachment, are not, even if true, the Constitutional subjects of impeachment; if it shall turn out on the investigation that the judge has really fallen into error, mistake, or indiscretion, yet if he stands acquitted in proof of any such acts as by the law of the land are impeachable offences, he stands entitled to discharge on his trial. This proceeding by impeachment is a mode of trial created and defined by the Constitution of our country; and by this the Court is exclusively bound. To the Constitution, then, we must exclusively look to discover what is or is not impeachable. We shall there find the whole proceeding distinctly marked out; and everything designated and properly distributed necessary in the construction of a court of criminal jurisdiction. We shall find, 1. Who shall originate or present an impeachment. 2. Who shall try it. 3. For what offences it may be used. 4. What is the punishment on conviction. The first of these points is provided for in the second section of the first article of the Constitution, where it is declared that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." This power corresponds with that of a grand jury to find a presentment or indictment. In the third section of the same article, the court is provided before whom the impeachment thus originated shall be tried: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." And the fourth section of the second article points out and describes the offences intended to be impeachable, and the punishment which is to follow conviction; subject to a limitation in the third section of the first article.

Have any facts, then, been given in evidence against the respondent which makes him liable to be proceeded against by this high process of impeachment? What are the offences? What is the Constitutional description of those official acts, for which a public officer may be arraigned before this high Court? In the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, it is declared, that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Treason or bribery is not alleged against us on this occasion. Our offences, then, must come under the general description of "high crimes and misdemeanors," or we are not impeachable by the Constitution of the United States. I offer it as a position I shall rely upon in my argument, that no judge can be impeached and removed from office for any act or offence for which he could not be indicted. It must be by law an indictable offence. One of the gentlemen, indeed, who conduct this prosecution, (Mr. Campbell,) contends for the reverse of this proposition, and holds that for such official acts as are the subject of impeachment no indictment will lie or can be maintained. For, says he, it would involve us in this monstrous oppression and absurdity, that a man might be twice punished for the same offence, once by impeachment, and then by indictment. And so most surely he may; and the limitation of the punishment on impeachment takes away the injustice and oppression the gentleman dreads. A slight attention to the subject will show the fallacy of this gentleman's doctrine. If the absurdity and oppression he fears will really ensue on indicting a man for the same offence for which he has already been impeached, they must be charged to the Constitution itself, which, in the third section of the first article, after limiting the extent of the judgment in cases of impeachment, goes on to declare, that "the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." The idea of the honorable Manager is, that for acts done in the course of official duty a judge must be proceeded against exclusively by impeachment; and that no indictment will lie in such case. The incorrectness of this notion appears not only from a reference to the Constitution, but to the known law of England also. I will remind you of a case, stated, I believe, in the elementary books of the law, in which it is said, that if a judge undertakes, of his own authority, to change the mode of punishment prescribed by law for any crime, he is indictable; for instance, should he sentence a man to be beheaded when the law directed him to be hanged, the judge is guilty of murder, and may be accordingly indicted. When, sir, I contend, that, in order to sustain an impeachment, an offence must be proved upon the respondent which would support an indictment, I do not mean to be understood as admitting that the converse of the proposition is true; that is, that every act or offence which is impeachable, is indictable. Far from it. A man may be indictable for many violations of positive law, which evince no mala mens, no corrupt heart or intention, but which would not be the ground of an impeachment. I will instance the case of an assault, which is an indictable offence, but will not surely be pretended to be an impeachable offence, for which a judge may be removed from office. It is true that the second section of the first article, which gives the House of Representatives the sole power of impeachment, does not in terms limit the exercise of that power. But its obvious meaning is not, in that place, to describe the kind of acts which are to be subjects of impeachment, but merely to declare in what branch of the Government it shall commence. The House of Representatives has the power of impeachment; but for what they are to impeach, in what cases they may exercise this delegated power, depends on other parts of the Constitution, and not on their opinion, whim, or caprice. The whole system of impeachment must be taken together, and not in detached parts; and if we find one part of the Constitution declaring who shall commence an impeachment, we find other parts declaring who shall try it, and what acts and what persons are Constitutional subjects of this mode of trial. The power of impeachment is with the House of Representatives—but only for impeachable offences. They are to proceed against the offence in this way when it is committed, but not to create the offence, and make any act criminal and impeachable at their will and pleasure. What is an offence, is a question to be decided by the Constitution and the law, not by the opinion of a single branch of the Legislature; and when the offence thus described by the Constitution or the law has been committed, then, and not until then, has the House of Representatives power to impeach the offender. So a grand jury possesses the sole power to indict; but in the exercise of this power they are bound by positive law, and do not assume under this general power to make anything indictable which they might disapprove. If it were so, we should indeed have a strange, unsettled, and dangerous penal code. No man could walk in safety, but would be at the mercy of the caprice of every grand jury that might be summoned, and that would be crime to-morrow which is innocent to-day.

What part of the Constitution then declares any of the acts charged and proved upon Judge Chase, even in the worst aspect, to be impeachable? He has not been guilty of bribery or corruption; he is not charged with them. Has he then been guilty of "other high crimes and misdemeanors?" In an instrument so sacred as the Constitution, I presume every word must have its full and fair meaning. It is not then only for crimes and misdemeanors that a judge is impeachable, but it must be for high crimes and misdemeanors. Although this qualifying adjective "high" immediately precedes and is directly attached to the word

Trial of Judge Chase.

"crimes," yet, from the evident intention of the Constitution and upon a just grammatical construction, it must be also applied to "misdemeanors." The repetition of this adjective would have injured the harmony of the sentence without adding anything to its perspicuity. How would this be in common parlance? Suppose it should be said that at this trial there are attending many ladies and gentlemen. Would it be doubted that the adjective many applies to gentlemen as well as ladies, although not repeated? Or, if there is anything peculiar in this respect in this word "high," I will suppose it were said that among the auditors there are men of high rank and station. Would it not be as well understood as if it were said that men of high rank and station are here? There is surely no difference. So in the Constitution, it is said, that "a regular statement of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." Is not the account to be regular as well as the statement? I should have deemed it unnecessary to have spent a word on so plain a point, had I not understood that a difficulty would probably be made upon it. If my construction of this part of the Constitution be not admitted, and the adjective "high" be given exclusively to "crimes" and denied to "misdemeanors," this strange absurdity must ensue:—That when an officer of the Government is impeached for a crime, he cannot be convicted unless it proves to be a high crime: but he may nevertheless be convicted of a misdemeanor of the most petty grade. Observe, sir, the crimes with which these "other high crimes" are classed in the Constitution, and we may learn something of their character. They stand in connexion with "bribery and corruption," tried in the same manner and subject to the same penalties. But if we are to lose the force and meaning of the word "high" in relation to misdemeanors, and this description of offences must be governed by the mere meaning of the term "misdemeanors," without deriving any grade from the adjective, still my position remains unimpaired, that the offence, whatever it is, which is the ground of impeachment, must be such an one as would support an indictment. "Misdemeanor" is a legal and technical term, well understood and defined in law; and in the construction of a legal instrument we must give to words their legal signification. A misdemeanor or a crime, for in their just and proper acceptation they are synonymous terms, is an act committed or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it. By this test, let the conduct of the respondent be tried, and, by it, let him stand justified or condemned.

Does not, sir, the court, provided by the Constitution for the trial of an impeachment, give us some idea of the grade of offences intended for its jurisdiction? Look around you, sir, upon this awful tribunal of justice—is it not high and dignified, collecting within itself the justice and majesty of the American people? Was such a court created—does such a court sit to scan and punish paltry errors and indiscretions, too insignificant to have a name in the penal code, too paltry for the notice of a court of quarter sessions? This is indeed employing an elephant to remove an atom too minute for the grasp of an insect. Is the Senate of the United States solemnly convened and held together in the presence of the nation to fix a standard of politeness in a judge, and mark the precincts of judicial decorum? The honorable gentleman who opened the prosecution (Mr. Randolph) has contended for a contrary doctrine, and held that many things are impeachable that are not indictable. To illustrate his position, he stated the cases of habitual drunkenness and profane swearing on the bench, which he held to be objects of impeachment and not of indictment. I do not desire to impose my opinions on this court as of any value. But surely I could not hesitate to say that both of the cases put by the gentleman would be indictable. Is there not known to us a class of offences, not provided for indeed by the letter of any statute, but which come under the general protection which the law gives to virtue, decency, and morals in society? Any act which is contra bonos mores is indictable as such. And it is so, not by act of Congress, but by the pure and wholesome mandates of that common law which some men would madly drive from our jurisprudence, but which I most sincerely pray may live forever.

If I am correct in my position that nothing is impeachable that is not also indictable, for what acts then may a man be indicted? May it be on the mere caprice or opinion of any ten, twenty, or one hundred men in the community; or must it not be on some known law of the society in which he resides? It must unquestionably be for some offence, either of omission or commission, against some statute of the United States—or some statute of a particular State, or against the provision of the common law. Against which of these has the respondent offended? What law of any of the descriptions I have mentioned has he violated? By what is he to be judged, by what is he to be justified or condemned, if not by some known law of the country; and if no such law is brought upon his case—if no such violation rises on this day of trial in judgment against him, why stands he here at this bar as a criminal? Whom has he offended? The House of Representatives—and is he impeached for this?

I maintain as a most important and indispensable principle, that no man should be criminally accused, no man can be criminally condemned, but for the violation of some known law by which he was bound to govern himself. Nothing is so necessary to justice and to safety as that the criminal code should be certain and known. Let the judge, as well as the citizen, precisely know the path he is to walk in, and what he may or may not do. Let not the sword tremble over his unconscious head, or the ground be spread with quicksands and destruction, which appear fair and harmless to the eye of the traveller.—Can it be pretended there is one rule of justice for a judge and another for a private citizen; and that while the latter is protected from surprise, from the malice or caprice of any man or body of men, and can be brought into legal jeopardy only by the violation of laws before made known to him, the latter is to be exposed to punishment without knowing his offence, and the criminality or innocence of his conduct is to depend not upon the laws existing at the time, but upon the opinions of a body of men to be collected four or five years after the transaction? A judge may thus be impeached and removed from office for an act strictly legal, when done, if any House of Representatives for any indefinite time after, shall for any reason they may act upon, choose to consider such act improper and impeachable. The Constitution, sir, never intended to lay the Judiciary thus prostrate at the feet of the House of Representatives, the slaves of their will, the victims of their caprice. The Judiciary must be protected from prejudice and varying opinion, or it is not worth a farthing. Suppose a grand jury should make a presentment against a man, stating that most truly he had violated no law or committed any known offence; but he had violated their notions of common sense—for this was the standard of impeachment the gentleman who opened gave us—he had shocked their nerves or wounded their sensibility. Would such a presentment be received or listened to for a moment? No, sir—And on the same principle, no judge should be put in jeopardy because the common sense of one hundred and fifty men might approve what is thus condemned, and the rule of right, the objects of punishment or praise, would thus shift about from day to day. Are we to depend upon the House of Representatives for the innocence or criminality of our conduct? Can they create offences at their will and pleasure, and declare that to be a crime in 1804, which was an indiscretion or pardonable error, or perhaps an approved proceeding in 1800? If this gigantic House of Representatives, by the usual vote and the usual forms of legislation, were to direct that any act heretofore not forbidden by law, should hereafter become penal, this declaration of their will would be a mere nullity; would have no force and effect, unless duly sanctioned by the Senate and the approbation of the President. Will they then be allowed, in the exercise of their power of impeachment, to create crimes and inflict the most serious penalties on actions never before suspected to be criminal, when they could not have swelled the same act into an offence in the form of a law? If this be truly the case, if this power of impeachment may be thus extended without limit or control, then indeed is every valuable liberty prostrated at the foot of this omnipotent House of Representatives; and may God preserve us! The President may approve and sign a law, or may make an appointment which to him may seem prudent and beneficial, and it may be the general, nay the universal sentiment that it is so; and it is undeniable that no law is violated by the act. But some four or five years hence there comes a House of Representatives whose common sense is constructed on a new model, and who either are or affect to be greatly shocked at the atrocity of this act. The President is impeached. In vain he pleads the purity of his intention, the legality of his conduct, in vain he avers that he has violated no law and been guilty of no crime. He will be told, as Judge Chase now is, that the common sense of the House is the standard of guilt, and their opinion of the error of the act conclusive evidence of corruption. We have read, sir, in our younger days, and read with horror, of the Roman Emperor who placed his edicts so high in the air that the keenest eye could not decipher them, and yet severely punished any breach of them. But the power claimed by the House of Representatives to make anything criminal at their pleasure, at any period after its occurrence, is ten thousand times more dangerous, more tyrannical, more subversive of all liberty and safety. Shall I be called to heavy judgment now for an act which, when done, was forbidden by no law, and received no reproach, because in a course of years there is found a set of men whose common sense condemns the deed! The gentlemen have referred us to this standard, and being under the necessity to acknowledge that the respondent has violated no law of the community, they would on this vague and dangerous ground accuse, try, and condemn him. The code of the Roman tyrant was fixed on the height of a column, where it might be understood with some extraordinary pains; but here, to be safe, we must be able to look into years to come, and to foresee what will be the changing opinions of men or points of decorum for years to come. The rule of our conduct, by which we are to be judged and condemned, lies buried in the bosom of futurity, and in the minds and opinions of men unknown, perhaps unborn.

The pure and upright administration of justice, sir, is of the utmost importance to any people; the other movements of Government are not of such universal concern. Who shall be President, or what treaties or general statutes shall be made, occupies the attention of a few busy politicians; but these things touch not, or but seldom, the private interests and happiness of the great mass of the community. But the settlement of private controversies, the administration of law between man and man, the distribution of justice and right to the citizen in his private business and concern, comes to every man's door, and is essential to every man's prosperity and happiness. Hence I consider the Judiciary of our country most important among the branches of Government, and its purity and independence of the most interesting consequence to every man. Whilst it is honorably and fully protected from the influence of favor or fear, from any quarter, the situation of a people can never be very uncomfortable or unsafe. But if a judge is forever to be exposed to prosecutions and impeachments for his official conduct, on the mere suggestions of caprice, and to be condemned by the mere voice of prejudice, under the specious name of common sense, can he hold that firm and steady hand his high functions required? No! if his nerves are of iron they must tremble in so perilous a situation.

In England the complete independence of the Judiciary has been considered, and has been found the best and surest safeguard of true liberty, securing a government of known and uniform laws, acting alike upon every man. It has, however, been suggested by some of our newspaper politicians, perhaps from a higher source, that although this independent Judiciary is very necessary in a monarchy to protect the people from the oppression of a Court, yet that, in our republican institution, the same reasons for it do not exist; that it is indeed inconsistent with the nature of our Government that any part or branch of it should be independent of the people from whom the power is derived. And as the House of Representatives come most frequently from this great source of power, they claim the best right of knowing and expressing its will; and of course the right of a controlling influence over the other branches. My doctrine is precisely the reverse of this. If I were called upon to declare whether the independence of judges were more essentially important in a Monarchy or a Republic, I should certainly say, in the latter. All governments require, in order to give them firmness, stability, and character, some permanent principle, some settled establishment. The want of this is the great deficiency in republican institutions. Nothing can be relied upon; no faith can be given either at home or abroad to a people whose systems and operations and policy are constantly changing with popular opinion. If, however, the Judiciary is stable and independent; if the rule of justice between men rests upon known and permanent principles, it gives a security and character to a country which is absolutely necessary in its intercourse with the world and in its own internal concerns. This independence is further requisite as a security from oppression. All history demonstrates, from page to page, that tyranny and oppression have not been confined to despotisms, but have been freely exercised in Republics, both ancient and modern—with this difference, that in the latter, the oppression has sprung from the impulse of some sudden gust of passion or prejudice, while in the former it is systematically planned and pursued as an ingredient and principle of the Government. The people destroy not deliberately, and will return to reflection and justice, if passion is not kept alive and excited by artful intrigue, but, while the fit is on, their devastation and cruelty is more terrible and unbounded than the most monstrous tyrant. It is for their own benefit and to protect them from the violence of their own passions that it is essential to have some firm, unshaken, independent branch of Government, able and willing to resist their frenzy. If we have read of the death of a Seneca under the ferocity of a Nero, we have read too of the murder of a Socrates under the delusion of a Republic. An independent and firm Judiciary, protected and protecting by the laws, would have snatched the one from the fury of a despot, and preserved the other from the madness of a people.

I have considered these observations on the necessary independence of the Judiciary applicable and important to the case before this honorable Court, to repel the wild idea that a judge may be impeached and removed from office although he has violated no law of the country, but merely on the vague and changing opinions of right and wrong—propriety and impropriety of demeanor. For if this is to be the tenure on which a judge holds his office and character; if by such a standard his judicial conduct is to be adjudged criminal or innocent, there is an end to the independence of our Judiciary. In opposition to this reasoning I have heard (not from the honorable Managers) a sort of jargon about the sovereignty of the people, and that nothing in a Republic should be independent of them. No phrase in our language is more abused or more misunderstood. The just and legitimate sovereignty of a people is truly an awful object, full of power and commanding respect. It consists in a full acknowledgment that all power originally emanates in some way from them, and that all responsibility is finally in some way due to them; and whether this is acknowledged or not, they have, if driven to the last resort, a physical force, to make it so. But, sir, this sovereignty does not consist in a right to control or interfere with the regular and legal operations and functions of the different branches of the Government at the will and pleasure of the people. Having delegated their power; having distributed it for various purposes into various channels, and directed its course by certain limits, they have no right to impede it while it flows in its intended directions. Otherwise we have no Government. In like manner the officers of Government are responsible in certain modes, and at certain periods, for the exercise of their duties and powers; but the people have no right to make them accountable in any other manner, or at any other period than that prescribed by the great compact of Government, or Constitution. Having parted with their power under certain regulations and restrictions, they are done with it. They are bound by their own act, and having retained and declared the manner in which they will correct abuses in office, they have no right to claim any other sort of responsibility. If this be not the case, what government have we? What rule of conduct? What system of association? None; but we are truly in a state of savage anarchy and ruthless confusion, with all the vices incident to civilization without the restraints to control them.

Having discussed this necessary preliminary point as to what is or is not impeachable, I will proceed to a consideration of the charges now in issue between the respondent and the House of Representatives of the United States. It will be some relief to this honorable Court to learn, that for the expediting of this trial, and to avoid useless and irksome repetition, the counsel for the respondent have divided the articles of impeachment among themselves. I shall beg leave to address you on the first article, which relates to the transactions at Philadelphia, on the trial of John Fries for high treason.

The gentleman (Mr. Early) who has offered you his observations on these articles of impeachment, appears to have grounded his argument, not on the evidence, but on the articles. Supposing, perhaps, that they would be proved, he has taken it for granted that they have been proved, and has shaped his remarks accordingly. Had we filed a general demurrer to these charges, thereby admitting them as stated, the argument of the gentleman might have had the force and application he intended. But, if I mistake not, the respondent has pleaded not guilty, and the case must therefore be decided by the amount of the evidence, and not by the averments of the articles. I admit, indeed, that the honorable Managers are put to some difficulty in this respect. They are under the necessity of making their election between the articles and the evidence as the foundation of their argument; for they are so totally dissimilar, that they could not take them both; they meet in so few and such immaterial points, that no man can argue from them both for five sentences. This being the situation of the gentlemen, he has thought proper to select the articles and the facts therein set forth as the foundation of his argument in defiance of the testimony. In the observations I shall have the honor to submit, I propose to take the evidence as my text and guide, and leave the articles to shift for themselves, under the care and patronage of our honorable opponents.

Upon reading this first article of impeachment against the respondent, after a due degree of horror and indignation at the monstrous tyranny and oppression portrayed in it, the first question that would strike the mind of the inquirer would naturally be, when did this horrid transaction take place—when and where was it that Judge Chase thus persecuted an unfortunate wretch to the very brink of the grave, from which he was snatched by the interference of Executive mercy, shocked at the injustice of his condemnation? When were the rights of juries and the privileges of counsel and their clients thus thrown down and prostrated at the feet of a cruel and inexorable judge? What would this inquirer think and believe on being informed that these atrocious outrages upon justice, law, and humanity, were perpetrated five years since? Why and where has the justice of the country slumbered so long? What now awakens it from this lethargic sleep? Why has this monstrous offender so long escaped the punishment of his crimes? To what region of refuge did he fly? But will not surprise be greatly increased when it is told that at the time of the trial of John Fries, this injured and oppressed man, at the very time when these crimes of the judge were committed, the Congress of the United States, the guardian of our lives and liberties, were actually in session in the very city where the deeds were done, and probably witnessed the whole transaction? I do not expect to be answered here, for I cannot suspect our honorable opponents of so much illiberality, that at that period the Administration of our affairs was in the hands of the political friends of the judge, and therefore he was permitted to escape, however atrocious his crimes. Whatever, sir, may have been the character of that Administration, even if a weak and wicked one, as it has been represented, it could have no object in protecting any individual at so great a risk to themselves and their reputation. If Judge Chase had really violated the law and Constitution to come at the blood of Fries, and had done this in the face of the public, the Administration would have put too much at hazard by endeavoring to shelter him. I hope, however, no such reason will be given for the neglect of these charges; and as we most cheerfully and truly confide in the justice of the present Administration, we trust no such distrust will be avowed of the integrity of the former; we feel as safe under trial now as we should have done then, and look without distrust for the same impartial justice from this honorable Court, as we should have expected and received at any time.

We feel however, sir, a serious inconvenience from the delay of this prosecution. In five years facts fall into oblivion, and witnesses engaged in their ordinary occupations of life cannot tax their memories with the circumstances of such distant events. It is difficult to discover, indeed, who were present at the transaction. To guard against injustice of this kind, even in civil cases, and protect us from fraudulent and slumbering demands, a limitation is put by law upon the claims of every man. The criminal code of the United States has justly adopted the same principle. By a statute, no person shall be prosecuted or punished for treason or other capital offence, with some exceptions, unless the indictment be found within three years after the offence is committed; and for smaller offences the prosecution must be instituted within two years. We cannot it is true claim the benefit of the letter of this law, but we may claim something from its principle; in expecting from this honorable Court every indulgence and allowance for any deficiency in our proof, which should be attributed, not to the real weakness of our case, but to the unreasonable staleness of the charges. Judge Chase was a stranger in Philadelphia, and necessarily found extreme difficulty in discovering what persons were in court at the time to which the charges relate, and in selecting those who had the best recollection of the transaction.

This first article, sir, charges, "that unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligations by which he stood bound to discharge them faithfully and impartially and without regard to persons, the said Samuel Chase on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May 1800, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust." This general accusation is followed by three distinct specifications of offence, to wit:

"1. In delivering an opinion, in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case, of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defence :

"2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions, upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client :

"3. In debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt, or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give."

In the whole of these specifications I am able to discover but one truth ; the rest is wholly contradicted and disproved by the evidence. It is true, that Judge Chase did form and reduce to writing, and, in a limited manner, deliver an opinion on a question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended—but when the article goes on to charge that this opinion tended to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of John Fries the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defence, it is utterly unfounded and untrue. To whom was this opinion delivered ? To the counsel for Fries and to the Attorney for the United States ; and to no other person. The third copy, and but three were made, never was delivered to the jury or to any other person, and never could produce any prejudice or injury to John Fries—nor indeed was it ever intended to come to the knowledge of the jury, until they had completely heard the discussion of the case by counsel, when they were to have taken out with them this opinion of the judge upon the law of the case submitted to them. At that period of the trial when it was not only the right but the duty of the court to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts, then, and not until then, was it the intention of the judge to communicate to them this deliberate opinion. Could this be done with any intention to injure or oppress the prisoner ? If such was the intention of the act, then and not otherwise, it was criminal. In inquiring into the nature of this act, I confine myself now to the forming and delivery of this opinion, and to decide its innocence or criminality we should consider it in relation to its motives, its time and manner, and its consequences. If nothing partial, oppressive, or corrupt, is to be found in any of these, I know not in what or whence the criminality is to be established. In deciding, sir, upon the motive which prompted the judge to this act, we must look for materials in the testimony : by this we must be governed, and not by the imputations, surmises, and constructions of our opponents, however eloquent and ingenious. The judge and his motives are not only strongly denounced in the article, but have also had the same fate from the mouths of the Managers. I take the evidence for my guide, and I know it will be the guide of this honorable Court.

What then, sir, did Judge Chase declare himself to be the reasons which induced him to form this opinion, to reduce it to writing, and to hand it to the counsel ? And permit me here, sir, to state, that in all criminal prosecutions for an act equivocal in itself, and whose character of guilt or innocence depends upon the intention with which it was done, the declarations of the party, made at the time, are always received in evidence to ascertain and fix the true character of the act ; and the fair and legal explanation of the act is taken and derived from such declarations of the party, if not disproved by other evidence. What, then, did Judge Chase himself say of his intention and motives in relation to this opinion ? Mr. Lewis states that, on this occasion, Judge Chase said that he had understood that, at the former trial, there had been a great waste of time on topics which had nothing to do with the business or case, and in reading common law decisions on the doctrine of treason, as well as under the statute of Edward III., before the Revolution ; and also relating to certain acts of Congress for crimes less than treason. That, to prevent this in future, he or they had considered the law, made up their minds, and reduced it to writing. And, in order that the counsel might govern themselves accordingly, had ordered three copies to be made out, &c. Here, then, the judge, at the time of the act now charged to proceed from a corrupt and partial intention, declares in unequivocal language what were his true motives. His object was to prevent an unnecessary waste of time in a court, where a vast deal of criminal and civil business was then pending and waiting for trial. This was the motive, and the only motive declared and avowed by the judge, at the time he delivered this offensive paper, and unless it be disproved by the evidence or the circumstances of the case, it must be taken to be the true one. It is not a subject of inquiry now, whether the reason he assigned for this proceeding be a good or a bad one : it is enough to our purpose that it most certainly is neither partial nor corrupt. As the motive was not partial, so neither was or could be the act oppressive to the prisoner, unless the judge, in executing his design of preventing the waste of time, pursued it to an unreasonable extent. If he obstructed only the introduction of irrelevant matter, and did not exclude anything that could and ought to have benefitted the prisoner, he was guilty of no injustice or impropriety. If the proper and legal rights of the counsel of the prisoner were curtailed, to his injury, there was certainly injustice done ; but if nothing more than wholesome and reasonable restrictions were imposed, to the manifest advantage of the general business of the court and of other suitors there, without any unjust detriment to John Fries, then not only the motive was correct, but the act was highly laudable. And such was undoubtedly the case. If we go no further than Mr. Lewis's testimony on this subject, every idea of an intention on the part of the judge to injure or oppress John Fries is done away. As far as the judge declared himself, his intention was pure and correct, and we cannot say that, in the execution of this correct intention, he would have carried it to such excess as to produce oppression and injustice. The design was crushed in embryo: as far as we are acquainted with it, it is fair and clear of oppression, and we are not authorized to presume that if it had proceeded farther, it would have changed its character and become partial and corrupt. It is well known in Pennsylvania, that the loudest clamors are made against our courts for the delays of justice and the unreasonable time spent in the trial of every cause. These complaints had doubtless reached the ears of the judge; there was an enormous list of civil causes then before him, and he presumed that any expedient fairly to save time, would have been acceptable to everybody, to counsel as well as to suitors. I have as yet considered this part of the case only in its most unfavorable aspect to the respondent. Upon turning to the testimony of the other witnesses, its complexion becomes much more mild and unexceptionable. The suggestion, that this opinion made up by the court and handed to the counsel was declared to be final and conclusive upon them, and that no argument in opposition to it was to be permitted or heard, rests wholly and solely on the recollection of Mr. Lewis. Mr. Dallas was not in court at the time it is supposed to have happened; no other witness of all that were present has any remembrance of any such declaration, and two witnesses expressly disprove it. Mr. Edward Tilghman states that Judge Chase declared that the court had maturely considered the law arising upon the overt acts charged in the indictment against John Fries. That they had reduced their opinion to writing; that he understood a great deal of time had been consumed upon the former trial; and that, in order to save time, a copy of the opinion of the court would be given to the attorney of the district; another to the counsel of the prisoner; and that the jury should have a third to take out with them. Mr. Tilghman further states, that previously to the throwing of the papers on the table, and at the moment it was done, the judge expressed himself in these words: "Nevertheless, or notwithstanding, counsel will be heard." Mr. Rawle, a witness examined, as well as Mr. Tilghman on the part of the Managers, gives the same account of the declared motive of the judge in preparing this opinion, to save time, as much had been lost at the former trial; and states that the judges said the court had determined to express their opinion in writing, on the law, that they might not be misunderstood. Here we find the reason, not only for forming the opinion, but for reducing it to writing also. The court, continues Mr. Rawle, observed, they had therefore committed their opinion to writing; that the clerk had made three copies, one of which should be given to the District Attorney, one to the counsel for the prisoner, and one the jury should take out with them. To put this part of the transaction beyond doubt, and strengthen, if possible, the character it now bears, I beg this honorable Court to advert for a moment to Mr. Meredith's testimony. He, too, states that the judge declared the court, on great deliberation, had formed an opinion on the law on the overt acts set forth in the indictment; and that to save time and prevent mistakes, this opinion was reduced to writing—the copies to be distributed as mentioned by the other witnesses. He further expressly avers that the judge, when he threw down the papers, declared that the giving of this opinion was not intended to preclude the counsel from being heard, or from expressing any objections to its correctness. After this mass of concurring testimony, can the motive of the judge in forming and delivering this opinion be misrepresented or misunderstood; and can it now be believed or pretended that it was done, as the article charges, to prejudice the mind of the jury against John Fries before counsel had been heard in his defence? In order to bear up this charge against this weight of evidence, and support Mr. Lewis's testimony in discredit of that delivered by the other witnesses, the Managers who have spoken to this part of the case pretend that Mr. Lewis should be most relied upon, because most interested in the transaction. This interest, sir, may have given a false coloring and appearance to the conduct of the judge, and his anxious zeal for his client may have represented the conduct of the court to his mind in harsher views than it deserved. I have always understood that those witnesses were most to be relied upon who were most cool and least interested in the transaction to which they testify; but the ingenious gentlemen invert this rule. But, sir, I have no intention of making a comparison between the credibility of these witnesses, they are all respectable, above suspicion. It is a question of memory and not of character between them, and we must judge from various combinations of circumstances in ascertaining the respective correctness of memory. Mr. Lewis himself most candidly declared his memory to be very uncertain and imperfect of distant events. Besides, Mr. Tilghman and Mr. Meredith positively aver that the judge said, counsel would be heard on the correctness of that opinion. Now, Mr. Lewis does not and cannot say that the judge did not say so, but his evidence is no more than this, either that he did not hear it at the time, or that he does not remember it now. I refer the honorable Managers to their own rule about affirmative and negative testimony. In the Baltimore case, a single, solitary, unsupported witness (Mr. Montgomery) swears to a declaration of the judge, which some fourteen or fifteen respectable witnesses, both for and against this prosecution, with equal and better opportunities of hearing all the judge said at that time, declare was not, to the best of their knowledge, uttered by the judge, nor anything like it. Now, say the Managers, this single affirmative of Mr. Montgomery is more to be depended upon than all the other witnesses put together—and if anybody can think so, let it be so. But in Fries's case, we produce two affirmative witnesses against one negative witness, who testifies himself to the imperfection of his memory.

I presume, sir, I have most firmly established the point that the judge, in making up this opinion had, really and truly, no other object or motive than to prevent a burdensome and useless waste of time; and sure I am, that whoever attended the first trial of Fries, would see the necessity of some regulation for this purpose. How then did the judge carry this intention into execution? The opinion of the court on the points likely to arise in the case, was put into writing and delivered to the counsel. Was this any disadvantage to them? Was it not rather a friendly guide to them by which they might shape their argument so as best to meet the points of difficulty and serve their client? The court furnished each side, as well the United States as the prisoner, with copies of this opinion. This would have the effect to regulate and confine the argument on both sides to the proper channel, to the real points of difficulty, and prevent a wild, devious, and useless extension of the argument into matters wholly irrelevant. It was surely an advantage to Fries's counsel thus to know the opinion of the court on the points of law in their case, and thus to have an opportunity of meeting and repelling it. If they would convince the court or jury this opinion was erroneous, they would succeed for their client. But if the court had permitted the counsel to take the usual course, and had kept their own opinion in close reserve, without any intimation of its direction until the argument was closed, and had then delivered it to the jury, as unquestionably they might have done, and this opinion had contained some points which had been overlooked by the counsel, surely it would have been more prejudicial to the prisoner than the course that was pursued. The jury would naturally take the law from the court, and if, therefore, the judge had intended to have oppressed John Fries, he would have succeeded better by reserving his opinion, concealing it from the counsel, permitting them to flounder on in the dark, and then, in his charge to the jury, dictate the law to suit his partial and oppressive purpose. Would any gentleman of the law, about to argue a case before a court, think himself aggrieved if the judge were previously to inform him of the ideas he entertained of the case, with full liberty to controvert them? It would be esteemed a favor.

You will be pleased to bear in mind, sir, that this paper containing the opinion of the court, was not read, nor was there any declaration whatever of its contents or substance. It was known to none, it was intended to be made known to none but the counsel for whose use it was designed. How then could it produce any prejudice to John Fries? No attempt was made, no intention was manifested to read it. It was privately handed to Mr. Lewis. How then did it become public? In what manner were copies distributed to various hands? Not sir, by the court, but by the counsel of John Fries. Mr. Lewis, in a moment of real or affected indignation, threw the paper from him, declared his hands should not be polluted by it, and cast it upon the table of the court, and it does not appear that to this hour he knows the contents of the paper he so hastily condemned. Several gentlemen of the bar by this means got hold of it, and some copies were taken. But for this conduct on the part of Mr. Lewis, nobody ever could have known the contents of the paper, or the opinion of the court. It was this that gave publicity to the opinion, and extended a knowledge of its contents, not only without the design and concurrence of the court, but decidedly against them. The act of the court was thus thrown into a different course and direction from what was intended or contemplated by them.

What then, sir, is the whole amount of the crime of the judge on this occasion? That he, a law judge, had been bold enough to form an opinion—not on John Fries's case, or the facts or circumstances of it, for he knew them not; but on certain abstract points of law, without first consulting and hearing Messrs. Lewis and Dallas. And further, he had not only formed such opinions, but he had the audacity to put them into the hands of these gentlemen, which, in the article of impeachment, is called "delivering the opinion." The judge, then, on mature deliberation, from a full consideration both of English and American precedents and decisions, had really made up his mind upon what overt acts would constitute the treason of levying war; and to prevent mistake, he had reduced this opinion to writing, and for the information of the counsel on both sides (no partial selection) he gave a copy of this opinion to each of them, and intended to give another to the jury to take out with them. The jury should have this opinion where they could not mistake it, instead of their memories where it might be misunderstood. Is not this, sir, a fair and just epitome of the facts given in evidence? Is it not the full measure and amount of the judge's crime and corruption? If the judge had a right to have any opinion of his own on the case, and if the opinion he formed was a correct one, and it is admitted or at least not denied to be so, where or whence could any injury arise from it to John Fries or his counsel? The opinion is supported by English authority, and by the highly respectable names of Judges Paterson and Iredell. And this opinion Judge Chase had an undoubted right to give to the jury. He never intended to give it until the argument was closed, and then he designed to vary from the usual mode of charging juries only in this, that to prevent mistake, and for more certainty, he would deliver in writing instead of verbally. Yet the article charges that in consequence of the forming and delivering this opinion, in this illegal manner, John Fries was convicted and sentenced to death. The undisputed correctness of this opinion wipes away every idea of an intention to injure or oppress John Fries. No injustice could result to him from a legal and correct opinion, which must finally have ruled the case, delivered at any time and in any manner. There might be some inattention to usual forms, but there could be no substantial injury. An opinion thus anticipated, if manifestly unsound and erroneous, and against the prisoner, might carry some suspicion of unjust prejudice, but how corrupt intentions are to be proved, manifested, or executed by correct opinions, is to me inexplicable. The judge had taken much labor and particular pains to inform himself on the law of the case. He would not trust himself on hasty opinions, made up at the moment the life of a fellow-citizen was at stake, and might be the forfeit of an error; and he therefore carefully examined the law and deliberately took an opinion. For this unusual attention, he deserves thanks and not impeachment. If knowledge of the law be a crime in a judge, ignorance is his best recommendation; and that judge is most worthy and best qualified for his office, who possesses no opinions of his own on any legal subject, but presents himself as a scholar to be taught by the counsel, and has no impressions but such as they are pleased to give him. I mean not to pass a sentence of condemnation on the views or conduct of the counsel of Fries. Their sole object and anxiety were to save the life of their client; and if they believed they could better effect this end by taking fire at the conduct of the court, by exciting a strong feeling and prejudice against the mode of proceeding, and by involving the court in embarrassment and difficulty, it was for them to judge how far they might pursue this object by such means, and to their own judgment I submit it. It is not easy to say how far counsel may fairly go in such a case, and when the life of the client is in issue much more will be allowed than in common cases.

We have heard much about the agitation of the bar on this occasion. The particular cause of it has not been clearly explained. It might have been produced by the demeanor of Mr. Lewis, which, from his own account, was violent and indignant, or it might have been the mere bustle produced by the different efforts that were made to get hold of the obnoxious paper which Mr. Lewis cast from him with so much feeling as too foul for his hand; or from a combination of these with other causes. Another circumstance equally immaterial has been dignified with much importance by the attention the Managers have bestowed upon it—I mean the novelty of the proceeding. Every witness was asked in solemn form, "Did you ever see the like before?" "How long have you been a practising lawyer?" "How many criminals have you defended?" "Was not this mode of forming and giving opinions by the court a novelty to you?" Granted—it was a novelty—I say granted for argument's sake—it was a novelty; and what follows? Is it therefore impeachable? Every innovation, however just and beneficial, is subject to the same consequence. But, sir, if this novelty proceeded not from impure intentions, and was not followed by oppressive or injurious consequences, where is its injustice or criminality? There were many other novelties in that trial. It was a novelty that a man named John Fries should commit treason, and be tried and convicted for it. I never heard of precisely the same thing before. It was a novelty that counsel should desert their cause in the abrupt manner in which it was then done. But I presume it will not be pretended that these things were wrong merely because they were novel; much less that a judge is to be convicted of high crimes and to be removed from office for a harmless novelty. The articles charge not the judge with innovations and novelties in legal forms; but with depriving John Fries and his counsel of their Constitutional rights; and if he has not done this, the rest is of no importance now. But what is this strange novelty that excites so much interest and alarm? Is it that a law judge had a law opinion, and was capable of making it up for himself without the assistance of learned counsel? I hope not. I should be sorry to suppose this is a novelty in the United States. Was it then the reducing this opinion to writing, putting it on paper with pen and ink, that makes the dangerous novelty? To have the opinion is nothing; but to write it constitutes the crime. And yet, sir, where is the difference to the prisoner? Except that in the latter case there is more certainty; less chance of misapprehension and mistake on the part of the jury than when it is delivered to them verbally. It should be recollected, sir, and I am sure it is too important to be forgotten by this honorable Court, this written opinion contained all the limitations and discriminations on the law of treason which could serve the prisoner, as well as those which might operate against him. But, sir, I deny that there was so much novelty either in forming this opinion, or in reducing it to writing, as is pretended. Is it uncommon for judges to state their opinions on particular points of law to counsel, even before argument, for the direction of their observations? And was it ever before considered a prejudication of the case, or an encroachment upon the rights of the bar? In criminal courts the practice is constant and universal. Previous to the trial of the cases of treason, after the restoration of Charles II., the judges of England met together, and did form and reduce to writing opinions, not only upon the mode of proceeding upon the trials, but also on all those questions or points of law which they supposed would arise and require their decision in the course of the trials. (See Kelynge's Reports, pp. 1, 2, &c.—11.) Here the judges met in consultation expressly for the purposes now deemed so criminal in Judge Chase, and took to their aid the King's counsel. Our judge did not take to his assistance the Attorney of the United States in forming his opinion; nor did the judges in England deliver to the counsel of the accused the result of their deliberations, but doubtless it would have been received as a favor if they had. In the only two points of difference, therefore, between the two cases, we have most decidedly the advantage.

But, sir, how can the proceedings of Judge Chase, in principle and effect, be distinguished from the common and universal practice of charging grand juries on the legal nature and description of the crimes to come under their notice? When a judge is about to hold a criminal court, he is particular to introduce into his charge those very offences, and his opinions upon them, which, by information or otherwise, he supposes will be brought before the court. The opinion of the judge in such cases is formed, is reduced to writing, and is publicly delivered in the presence of all the jurors, both grand and petit, but never was before conceived to be objectionable. Nor was it ever before supposed to be a prejudication of any man's case, who might afterwards be tried for an offence thus defined. Judge Chase stated what acts in his opinion would, in construction of law, amount to treason in levying war; but whether those acts, and the necessary intention which must accompany them, would be proved upon John Fries, or anybody else, was left quite at large to be decided by the jury on the evidence. In Hardy's Trial, p. 13, Chief Justice Eyre states to the grand jury:

"Jurors and judges ought to feel an extraordinary anxiety that prosecutions of this nature should proceed upon solid grounds. I can easily conceive, therefore, that it must be a great relief to jurors placed in the responsible situation in which you now stand, bound to do justice to their country and to the parties accused, and anxious to discharge this trust faithfully; sure I am that it is consolation and comfort to us, who have upon us the responsibility of declaring what the law is in cases in which the public and the individual are so deeply interested, to have such men as the great Sir Matthew Hale, and an eminent judge of our own times, who, with the experience of a century, concurs with him in opinion, (Sir Michael Foster,) for our guides.

"To proceed by steps. From these writers upon the law of treason, who speak, as I have before observed, upon the authority of adjudged cases, we learn that not only acts of immediate and direct attempt against the King's life are overt acts of compassing his death, but that all the remoter steps taken with a view to assist to bring about the actual attempt, are equally overt acts of this species of treason—even the meeting and consulting what steps should be taken in order to bring about the end proposed, has been always deemed to be an act done in prosecution of the design, and as such an overt act of this treason. This is our first step in the present inquiry. I proceed to observe, that the overt acts I have been now speaking of have reference nearer or more remote to a direct and immediate attempt upon the life of the King; but that the same authority informs us that they who aim directly at the life of the King (such for instance as the persons who were concerned in the assassination plot in the reign of King William) are not the only persons who can be said to compass or imagine the death of the King. 'The entering into measures which, in the nature of things, or in the common experience of mankind, do obviously tend to bring the life of the King into danger, is also compassing and imagining the death of the King;' and the measures which are taken will be at once evidence of the compassing and overt acts of it."

Where is the criminality of such instruction and direction; but in what does it differ in principle, and in all its possible consequences to the prisoner, from the conduct of Judge Chase? The learned English judge thought he was obliging the jury, not encroaching upon them, by stating fully and precisely the legal construction of those acts which would probably be given to them in evidence to support the charges of treason. It is true the treason charged upon Hardy was not that of levying war—it was that of compassing the King's death. Now what overt acts amount to a compassing of the King's death, is a question of law resting upon long and established decisions and precedent. And Judge Eyre thought it no crime to declare to the jury his opinion of the law in this respect. So in our case, treason by levying war is a general Constitutional definition of the offence; but the application of this general definition, and the fixing and describing such overt acts as amount to a levying of war, is matter of legal construction, depending upon a knowledge of former adjudications, which the judge was bound to know, or he was not worthy of his office, and which he was also bound to communicate to the jury. The difference in the cases is only here. Chief Justice Eyre formed his opinion on deliberation, and reduced it to writing; but he also publicly delivered it with all the weight of his name and authority in the face of all the jurors and of the country. Whereas Judge Chase gave his opinion privately to the counsel, to be at their disposal and discretion—to use it for the benefit of their client if they could, or to disregard and suppress it if they thought proper. It might forever have been concealed from the jurors and from the world if the counsel of Fries had not themselves made it public. This practice of delivering opinions on points of law in charges to grand juries is not confined to the English courts. It is the same in the United States. The Managers have pronounced a very deserved eulogium upon the official conduct and character of Judge Iredell. The respondent has been referred to him as a bright example of justice and impartiality, and it has been lamented that with such an example before him, Judge Chase should have so wandered from the path of rectitude. We take their standard of excellence. We agree to be judged by Judge Iredell; and if I show that this humane and learned judge really did the same thing for which the respondent now stands on his trial, I hope there will be an end of the complaint. On the first trial of this same John Fries for the same offence, Judge Iredell actually committed, with some circumstances of aggravation, the same enormous crime for which Judge Chase is now impeached. He did form an opinion on the law of treason, he did reduce that opinion to writing, and he did deliver that opinion, the same in substance, and nearly the same in words with that delivered by Judge Chase. This bright example was before our eyes; he is now so, and let us be judged by him. In the charge delivered to the grand jury in 1799, who found the first bill against Fries for treason, speaking of those cases which he thought would come before the court, the judge says:

"The only species of treason likely to come before you is that of levying war against the United States. There have been various opinions and different determinations on the import of those words. But I think I am warranted in saying, that if, in the case of the insurgents who may come under your consideration, the intention was to prevent by force of arms the execution of any act of the Congress of the United States altogether, (as for instance the land-tax act, the object of their opposition,) any forcible opposition calculated to carry that intention into effect, was a levying war against the United States, and of course an act of treason. But if the intention was merely to defeat its operation in a particular instance, or through the agency of a particular officer, from some private or personal motive, though a higher offence may have been committed, it did not amount to the crime of treason. The particular motive must, however, be the sole ingredient in the case, for if combined with a general view to obstruct the execution of the act, the offence must be deemed treason."

Judge Iredell, therefore, so far from conceiving it to be a crime to have an opinion upon the law of treason in levying war and the overt acts which would constitute it, to reduce that opinion to writing, and to deliver both to counsel and jury, seems to have considered it, as Chief Justice Eyre had done before him, to be his duty to do so. The opinion delivered by this respectable judge coincides entirely with that of Judge Chase, and the manner of delivering was, on our opponent's principles, vastly more exceptionable. The novelty of this proceeding seems to have vanished on investigation. There is indeed one striking difference in the two opinions: That Judge Chase goes more fully and clearly into the definition of the offence, and is more particularly careful to state those distinctions and discriminations which might serve the accused, and reduce his transgression to some smaller offence, provided they could appear in his case. He sets out not only the description and character of those overt acts which constitute treason, but enumerates also with equal care such as will not amount to that offence. If these favorable discriminations might in any way have been useful to the accused, they were put fully into the power both of the counsel and the jury.

The gentleman who opened the prosecution, (Mr. Randolph,) took occasion to speak in very handsome, and I doubt not very deserved terms of applause, of a distinguished judge in Virginia. This same judge has published an edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, into which he has introduced a variety of his own opinions on the Constitution and laws of the United States. If hereafter a person should be accused under the operation of some of those statutes on the construction of which Judge Tucker has published his comments and opinions, would it be any impeachment of the justice and impartiality of this judge to say, he had made up his opinion, he had reduced it to writing, he had delivered it to the world, and therefore he had prejudged the case. No, this would be a sort of reasoning even more absurd than the Richmond non sequitur. The honorable Manager, (Mr. Randolph,) to enforce and exemplify his doctrines on this subject, put an analogous case. He stated that a judge holding a criminal court might properly give the legal description of murder, and the circumstances and ingredients that in point of law would constitute this offence. But, says he, he may not go on to apply this definition to the overt acts laid in the indictment. This, I confess, is a novelty to me. I never before heard of overt acts in an indictment for murder. The general charge of the offence is laid in legal and general terms, but there is no specification of the particular facts and circumstances by which the charge is to be supported. But suppose a judge, knowing that a man was coming before him for trial, accused of going into the street with a declared resolution to kill the first person he should meet; and this judge were to say to any person or in any place, verbally or in writing, that a killing under such circumstances was murder, and a full manifestation of malice in legal construction, would this be called a prejudication of the case? Is it not a mere declaration of the law existing and established long before the case, which it was the duty of the judge to know, to obey, and to declare? If the facts proved before the jury brought the accused within the law, the consequence of conviction followed, not by the will of the judge, but by the sentence of the law; and while this question was left open, the case was in no wise prejudged. To explain this point still further, I will put the case of libelling. This offence, like that of treason, consists of two parts—the act and the intent. Would it be criminal in a judge, knowing that such a case was to come before him, to inform himself, if necessary, of the law of libels, to make up his mind upon the constituent parts of the offence, and to declare them to the grand jury, the counsel, or anybody else? Might he not be of opinion, and write and say, that a libel is a malicious defamation of any person in writing, in order or intending to excite their wrath, or to expose them to public hatred or contempt? Here the fact of publication must be proved, and the malicious intent; and might not a judge state what in contemplation of law is a malicious and defamatory writing, and that if such an one is published with intent to injure and defame, it is in law a libel? Apply this doctrine to the case of Fries. May not a judge have an opinion and declare that an insurrection of a body with intent or in order to resist the execution of any law of the United States, and the carrying that intent into execution by actual force and violence, is treason against the United States by levying war? There is no prejudication in either case; the facts and the intent which constitute the crime, and on which the guilt or innocence of the accused depends, are left wholly untouched, and come without prejudice or bias to the jury. I have heard the phrase "prejudging the law" repeated over and over again. Judge Chase prejudged the law against Fries, we are told. I confess the phrase is a very singular one to me. I know not precisely how to understand it. I can comprehend what is meant when I hear of prejudging a man's case—in prejudging the facts of any case. But as to the law, I presume it is always prejudged—always settled, certain, and ascertained. It is never a question in a case of murder, whether a killing with malice prepense is or is not murder. The law has prejudged that, and so in all other cases the question is, whether the facts proved bring the case within the law. And so it was in Fries's case, and upon that point Judge Chase neither gave nor intimated nor had an opinion; for as the evidence had not been heard, he could not anticipate what facts would be proved.

I hope and trust, sir, that the first specification of this article is now disposed of to the satisfaction of this honorable Court, and the justification of the respondent. Part of it, when tested by the evidence, turns out to be wholly unfounded; and the rest which is true, has been fully justified both on principle and by precedent. If there was some haste and error in the conduct of the judge, which however I neither believe nor admit, there was certainly no criminality in the act. There was nothing impure in the motive—nothing injurious in the consequence.

Suffer me now, sir, to offer you some observations on the second specification of the first article of impeachment. I hope it will not be necessary to trespass greatly on your patience in refusing it. It charges Judge Chase with "restricting the counsel for the said John Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client." This charge consists of two parts; it complains of a restriction as to English authorities, and as to American statutes. I will consider them distinctly. First, sir, permit me to remark that these allegations are made to support the general charge of partiality, oppression, and injustice. But what becomes of these pretences when we bear in mind the testimony of Mr. Rawle, the District Attorney, and always, and in every situation, a gentleman whose character, in all its relations both public and private, bears the first stamp of respectability, and fears no competition for credit? He has informed this honorable Court that this restriction so grievously complained of, and now the subject of a criminal prosecution, was imposed upon him as well as upon the counsel of Fries. Is this the character or the conduct of partiality or oppression? Does it evince that strong appetite the judge is said to have, to drink the heart's blood of this unfortunate German, and stain the pure ermine of justice with his gore? I have always understood by partiality in a judge, a favoring bias to one party to the prejudice of the other; but where a restriction is put equally on both sides, I cannot conjecture how it can be resolved into partiality or oppression. It will be seen presently that as far as this restriction could have any operation, it was friendly in that operation to John Fries. But, sir, what was this restriction so much complained of, and now magnified into a high crime? That certain English decisions in the law of treason, made before the Revolution of 1688, should not or ought not to be read to the jury; and pray, sir, what were these decisions? I will take their character from Mr. Lewis himself, and no man is better acquainted with them. He says they were decisions of dependent and corrupt judges, who carried the doctrine of constructive treason to the most dangerous and extravagant lengths. True, they were so—sanguinary, cruel, and tyrannical in the extreme; and could the exclusion of such cases injure John Fries? If cases which extenuated and softened the crime of treason had been rejected, he might indeed have suffered; but how he was or could be injured by keeping from the jury those cases which aggravated his offence, I am really at a loss to learn. The restriction there was on the United States. Had they been adduced by the Attorney General, no doubt they would have been ably answered by the defendant's counsel; but the ability of the counsel was not inferior to Fries's counsel; and if Judge Chase had indeed a design to oppress and injure John Fries, and to convict him on strained constructions of treason, his best policy would surely have been to have suffered these cases to have come forward, and if supported by his authority and the talents of the counsel of the United States, they might have had their influence with the jury, notwithstanding the able refutations they might have received. But why and for what good purpose did the counsel desire to read these cases, operating, if they operated at all, directly against the life of their client? Why would they fatigue the court and impose upon the jury with those wicked and ridiculous decisions against a man who wished his stag's horns in the king's belly; and another, who declared he would make his son heir to the Crown?

Sir, there could have been but one object in this attempt. It was this: to excite such horror in the minds of the jurors by reciting these tales of tyranny and blood, as would create a general prejudice in them against all the laws of treason. The abhorrence which would be honestly given to such extraordinary cases of cruelty practised under the law of treason, they hoped would extend itself to all cases of treason, even the most just and upright. I know another and ingenious coloring and pretence has been given for this design, this strange anxiety to read cases, which so strongly support prosecutions for treason. It has been said by Mr. Lewis, not here as a witness, but in Philadelphia as counsel for John Fries, that his object in desiring to read these extravagant cases was of this sort. That many of the decisions on the law of treason made since the Revolution of 1688, and which are received as authorities in modern courts, were actually grounded on the iniquitous cases decided before the Revolution; and therefore, says Mr. Lewis, we wished to lay these cases before the jury that they might place no reliance on those since the Revolution, which were derived from them. Could the gentleman be sincere in this pretence? How far would he carry it? To all decisions since the Revolution; and are we to have no adjudications on this subject which may be relied upon as sound, legal, and virtuous? I apprehend he does not mean so much. He desired I presume only to discredit such of the English decisions since the Revolution, as were derived from those corrupt sources alluded to. Then, most assuredly, he was premature in his attempt to read these precious cases. If the district attorney should read and rely upon any case, decided since the Revolution, to convict John Fries, and Mr. Lewis could trace that decision back to the horrible times spoken of, and show that it was derived from and grounded upon the opinions of those corrupt and dependent judges, it would surely have been competent for him to do so, and no court would have attempted to prevent him. But that he is to deluge the court and jury with a mass of trash and corruption, and so declared to be by himself, by way of anticipation and when no necessity had occurred or probably would occur to justify it, could not be endured by any court knowing its duties and respecting its dignity. These cases are law, or they are not law. If the former, their opinion and influence were against the prisoner; if the latter, the court should not suffer them to be read to mislead and impose upon the jury. So far, sir, and I shall trouble you no further, on the exclusion of these English statutes. Now, as to the statutes of the United States. That any such restriction was laid on the counsel of John Fries, rests wholly and entirely on the testimony and recollection of Mr. Lewis. I will, sir, first consider the nature and extent of this charge against the respondent, supposing the fact to be so. I presume it will be granted to me that a judge has some sort of authority in a court; that he does not sit there as a mere cypher, without power or command. Among the acknowledged powers of a judge, is that of regulating and directing in some degree the argument before him, and preventing the introduction of matter either grossly improper or palpably irrelevant to the issue. If then it be demonstrated that these statutes of the United States had really and truly nothing under heaven to do with the trial of John Fries, I hope the judge will not be condemned for excluding them. John Fries, sir, was indicted for the treason of levying war against the United States, and for no other offence.

The crime is created and defined by the Constitution of the United States. It became the duty of the attorney of the United States to show to that court and jury, that the prisoner had been guilty of the treason charged in the indictment according to its definition and description in the Constitution, or the prosecution must fail. If, on the other hand, he did show this to the satisfaction of the court and jury, John Fries must necessarily be convicted. Now, sir, what possible influence or control could any act of Congress have over the character of a crime defined in and derived from the higher authority of the Constitution? The act of Congress could not enlarge, restrict, or in any way alter or affect the Constitutional description. To what proper purpose then could any act of Congress be read? Why, sir, we have heard something about a Legislative construction of the Constitution; and that these acts of Congress defining sedition and other offences, might be used and were important to show what was intended by the Constitution in the description of treason. In the first place, sir, Congress in passing these statutes never had the most remote idea or intention of giving any sort of construction or opinion upon the law of treason; and if they had such an intention, it was beyond their powers and rights, and should be wholly disregarded, not only by that court, but by this. The construction of the Constitution, in common with every other law, belongs exclusively to the Judiciary, as best qualified both from its permanency and independence as well as from legal learning to exercise so important a right. The necessity of a power existing some where to judge of the Constitution, and of the conformity or non-conformity of laws to the provisions of it, results from the very nature of a written constitution. It is in vain we have an instrument paramount to ordinary legislation, if there is no authority to check encroachments upon it, and there is no department of Government with whom this power can be so safely lodged, or by whom it can be so ably and impartially exercised as the Judiciary. If the Legislature, the very branch of Government most controlled by the Constitution, and intended to be so, shall be permitted to assume the wide and unlimited right of construction, the Constitution will sink at once into a dead and worthless letter; moulded into various fantastic shapes at the will of the Legislature, and purporting one thing to-day and another to-morrow, and nothing at last. But Congress, I repeat, sir, in passing the sedition law, had no intention whatever of giving their construction to the Constitutional description of treason, or of affecting or touching it in any way. The counsel of Fries were, therefore, about to use or abuse the act of the Legislature to purposes never contemplated or intended. Should the court suffer a delusion of this sort to be practised upon a jury, equally disrespectful to the court and to the Congress? It was not Judge Chase only who thought these statutes of the United States totally irrelevant to the case of Fries. They had been solemnly adjudged to be so, after every exertion of the talents of the counsel to show their application and force. I refer you, sir, to the opinion of Judge Iredell on the first trial of Fries:

"An act of Congress which I have already read to you (that commonly called the sedition act) has specially provided in the manner you have heard, against combinations to defeat the execution of the laws. The combinations punishable under this act must be distinguished from such as in themselves amount to treason, which is unalterably fixed by the Constitution itself. Any combinations, therefore, which before the passing of this act would have amounted to treason, still constitute the same crime. To give the act in question a different construction, would do away altogether the crime of treason as committed by levying war, because no war can be levied without a combination for some of the purposes stated in the act, which must necessarily constitute a part though not the whole of the offence.

"This, gentlemen of the jury, is an indictment against the prisoner at the bar for levying war against the United States; the first inquiry therefore is, what is meant by these words in our Constitution? 'Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them,' &c. These words are repeated verbatim, I believe, in an act of Congress called the Judiciary act, defining the punishment of the crime of treason, pursuant to Constitutional authority. This crime being defined in the Constitution of our country, becomes the supreme law, and can only be altered by the means therein pointed out, and not by any act of the Legislature; and, therefore, the repetition of the words of the Constitution in the Judiciary act is quite unnecessary, as the only power left to Congress over this crime was, to describe the punishment; the same act, in another part, makes provision for the method of trial. Agreeably to their power, Congress have described the punishment, and thereby declared the crime to be capital. It is clear, therefore, that, as the Constitution has defined the crime, the Congress, drawing its sole authority from that Constitution, cannot change it in any manner, particularly as it is so declared; yet the counsel for the prisoner say, that the Legislature have given it a legislative interpretation, and that their interpretation is binding on this court. They say that Congress did not mean to include the offence charged upon the prisoner at the bar, under the definition of levying war; because the sedition act describes a similar offence, and because a rescue is provided for in another act, the punishment extending no further than fine and imprisonment. Several answers may be given to remove these objections:

"First, if Congress had intended to interpret these words of the Constitution, by any subsequent act, they had no kind of authority so to do. The whole judicial power of the Government is vested in the judges of the United States, in the manner the Constitution describes; to them alone it belongs to explain the law and the Constitution; and Congress have no more right nor authority over the judicial expositions of those acts, than this court has to make a law to bind them. If this was not an article of the Constitution, but a mere act of Congress, they could not interpret the meaning of that act while it was in force, but they may alter, amend, or introduce explanatory sections to it. In this we differ from the practice of England, from whence we received our jurisprudential system in general; for they having no Constitution to bind them, the Parliament have an unlimited power to pass any act of whatever nature they please; and they, consequently, cannot infringe upon the Constitution. The very treason statute of Edward III. itself, contains a provision giving Parliament an authority to enact laws thereupon, in these words: 'Because other like cases of treason may happen in time to come, which cannot be thought or declared at present:

it is thought that, if any such does happen, the judges should not try them without first going to the King and Parliament, where it ought to be judged treason, or otherwise felony.' On this point Sir Matthew Hale was very careful lest constructive treason should be introduced.

"This, gentlemen, you will observe, only relates to any case not specified in that act. But, on the occasion now before you, it is not attempted, by any construction or interpretation, that anything should be denominated treason that is not precisely and plainly within the Constitution. No treason can be committed except war has actually been levied against the United States.

"But further, nothing is more clear to me than that Congress did not intend, in any manner whatever, to innovate on the Constitutional definition of treason, because they have repeated the words, I think, verbatim, in their own act, with regard to the rescue and obstruction of process which is mentioned in the act alluded to. It will not be pretended, by any man, that every rescue or every obstruction of an officer in serving process, or even both together, amounts to high treason, or else to no crime at all. No; the crimes are differently specified, and rescue or obstruction of process may be committed without that high charge. This, I think, was sufficiently explained by the counsel for the United States."

Will it be pretended, sir, that counsel have a right to read anything before the court which they may find in a law book? Is there anything of such peculiar dignity and privilege in the statutes of the United States, that any of them may, at all times and on all occasions, whether pertinent or not, be read in a court of justice; and is it a high crime in a judge to prevent it? Suppose the counsel had chosen, on the trial of John Fries, to amuse themselves with reading the revenue laws of the United States, would the mere circumstance of their being bound in our statute book have given them such a sacred character that the court would be bound to listen, with the most respectful attention, to such an absurd waste of time? I do not hesitate to aver that the revenue laws have full as clear and proper an application to the case of John Fries as either of the statutes the counsel were so anxious to produce.

But, sir, although Judge Chase undoubtedly believed that these statutes of the United States had no sort of application to the case before him, and we contend that he would have been wholly justifiable in excluding them from the discussion, yet we deny most explicitly that he did so. The respondent never declared that these laws should not be read or referred to on that occasion. The proof of the fact rests entirely on the recollection of Mr. Lewis. Among the numerous spectators of this transaction, not a man but Mr. Lewis has been produced to sustain this charge now deemed so important. Mr. Lewis has doubtless declared this fact as he believes it; but, sir, when we recollect the agitation of this gentleman, as described by himself, the strong state of feeling or passion into which he was excited, the length of time and the acknowledged frailty of his memory, and when to this we add that something was probably said about the irrelevancy of these statutes, we shall find sufficient reason to believe that Mr. Lewis has, in this respect, fallen into a mistake. Opposed to this imperfect recollection, we have Messrs. Rawle, Tilghman, Meredith, Bidle, and Ewing, all possessing an equal opportunity with Mr. Lewis to hear and to understand what passed from the court; and from their cool and disinterested situations less likely to receive unfounded or discolored impressions. I cannot avoid reminding you, sir, that Mr. Tilghman and Mr. Rawle are witnesses summoned and examined on the part of the United States, and although the honorable Managers have thought proper to claim only Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, and to treat the other gentlemen as witnesses for the respondent, they are nevertheless entitled to the full regard and respect, whatever it may be, attached to the witnesses for the majesty of the people. The five gentlemen I have named, were all of them in court during the trial of John Fries, and at the time Mr. Lewis supposes this restriction to have been laid upon him; and yet not one has any recollection of any such prohibition; I believe they, or some of them, state in decided terms that none such were made. If this comparison of the recollection of five witnesses against one, who himself testifies to the imperfection of his memory, leaves any doubt about the truth of the fact, I can refer this honorable Court to a written document, drawn up by Mr. Lewis in conjunction with Mr. Dallas, which must put the question to rest. When there is such a contradiction in the testimony of such respectable witnesses, it is a great relief to my mind to have some permanent voucher to refer to, to decide the difference. I allude, sir, to the letter addressed by Messrs. Lewis and Dallas to Mr. Lee, then Attorney General of the United States. This letter was written in May, 1800, soon after the trial of Fries, and when every circumstance was fresh in the memory of Mr. Lewis. This letter was written in consequence of a communication from Mr. Lee, stating "that the case of Fries was before the President; that all the information was wished which could assist in making a proper decision upon a claim for mercy and pardon; for which purpose Mr. Lee desired to know the grounds on which the counsel intended to have enforced the defence." In consequence of this solemn and important call from such high authority, and for such an interesting purpose, Mr. Lewis writes to Mr. Dallas—states that, in justice to "poor Fries" as well as to themselves, they ought to make the desired communication; that they should state their intended arguments, &c., and that they should state "in decent and manly terms our reasons for declining any interference in the trial;" he then requested from Mr. Dallas "every communication likely to render service to poor Fries." Turn then, sir, to the letter addressed to Mr. Lee, with all these friendly dispositions on the part of Mr. Lewis, with all the anxious desire he had to serve poor Fries, and with all the aid of Mr. Dallas, in making the statement, which was to contain all their information on the subject, and all their reasons for declining to interfere in the trial. We find, sir, in this important letter, that they informed the President that the "cause was prejudged" by an opinion they were wholly unacquainted with; by a paper they had never read, and knew not the contents of; and the jury were also prejudged by this opinion, although they knew not what it was. But, sir, we do not find any complaint whatever; nay, not the slightest suggestion that the court prevented or forbade the reading of these statutes of the United States, or restricted the counsel from making any use of them they thought proper. With the manifest disposition of these gentlemen, in writing this letter, with the object before them for which it was required, and the uses they intended should be made of it—uses which they anticipated at the moment they abandoned the cause—is it probable so important a circumstance would have been omitted if it had really occurred? I refer you and this honorable Court, sir, to the following pages of the evidence printed at the last session of Congress for the use of the House of Representatives, pages 21, 24, 25, 26, to 32.

May I not now flatter myself, sir, that all the criminality charged upon the respondent, in the second specification of the first article of impeachment is washed away from the minds of this honorable Court? Under this hope and impression, I will proceed to consider, as briefly as possible, the third and last specification. In this the judge is charged with "debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury" (through his counsel) on the law as well as on the fact which was to determine his guilt or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give." This charge is absolutely unfounded and untrue, and is, in all its parts, most completely disproved by the evidence. As to debarring counsel from being heard, I need only refer you, sir, to the testimony of Messrs. Tilghman and Meredith, who expressly swear, that Judge Chase, when he threw down the paper containing the opinion the court had formed on the law, explicitly declared that, nevertheless, counsel would be heard against that opinion. It is, indeed, true that Mr. Lewis seems, throughout the business, to have been under an impression that nothing would be heard in contradiction to that opinion; and that his professional rights were invaded. But this appears to be a hasty and incorrect inference or conclusion of his own, from the conduct of the court. He wholly misapprehended the court, and has charged his misapprehension to their account. This is the usual effect of such precipitate proceedings. The Managers have greatly relied on this circumstance; they urge that Mr. Lewis, through the whole affair, and in all he said concerning it, took for granted and stated that he was debarred from his Constitutional privileges. He did so; but he did so under a mistake of his own, not proceeding from the court. It is not only that no other witness speaks of any such restriction, but expressly negative it and say, some of them at least, that none such was imposed; but Mr. Rawle has further informed you, that it appeared to him throughout the business that Mr. Lewis had wholly misunderstood the court and mistook their intention. But, surely, sir, we are not to be condemned because we have been misunderstood; especially as the mistake seems to have been peculiar to Mr. Lewis, and no other witness fell into the same error. I rely most implicitly on Mr. Rawle's testimony, not only from the strength and correctness of his character, but from the unusual pains he took to be accurate in his knowledge of this transaction. His notes are copious, connected, and satisfactory, and although he has no notes of the first day's proceeding, yet he seems to have given an uncommon and cautious attention to every circumstance to which he has testified. This gentleman negatives every idea of any restriction upon the arguments of counsel, and is supported by every witness but Mr. Lewis. If any doubt can remain upon this subject, I am happy to have it in my power to refer to a written and unchanging document, which destroys the third specification, and demonstrates not only that the counsel were not prohibited from addressing the jury, both on the law and the fact, but also that the right of the jury to decide both the law and the fact was most largely and explicitly avowed and declared to them. I beg to refer this honorable Court to the second exhibit, filed with the respondent's answer. It contains this very opinion, so scorned by the counsel of Fries, and from the pollution of which they shrunk with horror. If they had read it before it was thus indignantly condemned; if it had been understood before it was consigned to contempt, and denounced as a violation of every valuable and sacred right, how much confusion, how much unnecessary discontent, might have been saved and prevented! In this opinion, then, will be found the sentiment in these words: "It is the duty of the court in this and all criminal cases, to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury are to decide on the present, and on all criminal cases, both the law and the facts, on their consideration of the whole case." Was there ever a more ample and explicit avowal of the rights of juries? Is there any friend to juries so extravagant as to contend or ask for more? The acknowledgment is as full as any man can require or the law would warrant. The judge, in thus admitting and confirming the right of the jury to decide both the law and fact, admits, by inevitable consequence, that the jury have a right to hear counsel both upon the law and facts. That which they are to decide upon, they must have information upon; and the court which declares the jury to be the tribunal to determine the whole case, never could have said, in the same breath, that they should hear no argument on the case they were thus to determine. This monstrous absurdity, of which the judge can hardly be suspected, brings it to a certain conclusion, that Mr. Lewis must have mistaken the court; and that no such restriction was laid upon him or the jury as he has apprehended.

The charges, sir, laid in this first article of impeachment, are grounded altogether on the proceedings of what has been called the first day of Fries's trial; and most firmly believing that the whole of this proceeding on that day will bear the most scrutinizing inquiry, and stand on the strong ground of justification, I have been willing to meet the Managers on that day's proceeding disjointed from that of the following day. But, sir, it is most evident, that this is by no means a full or a fair examination of the judge's conduct on that occasion. When he is charged with a corrupt or partial intention to injure and oppress John Fries, when he is charged with a wilful violation of the rights of the counsel and jury, the whole of the proceeding should be brought into view, before we decide upon the character of any part of it. An attention, sir, to what passed on the second day, as it is called, of Fries's trial, will most abundantly prove that Judge Chase never had intended any partiality or oppression against him; and certainly that if he had any such intention, he never carried it into execution or effect. And, I trust, I am safe in saying that the mere intention to commit a crime, however gross or outrageous, unless carried into some sort of action or effect, constitutes no crime. A man may intend to commit a larceny, assault and battery, or any other offence; but while he abstains from the act, the mere intention cannot subject him to trial or punishment. The respondent, then, discovering from the conduct of Fries's counsel, and the indignant hostility they assumed, that he was greatly misunderstood; that an arrangement he had adopted for the convenience of public justice, the reasonable expedition of the approaching trial, and the real accommodation of the court, the counsel, and the jury, was construed and received as an oppression upon the prisoner, an encroachment upon the privileges of counsel, and a violation of the rights of the jury; in short, as a corrupt and polluted prejudication of the cause to be tried, and that the fair and upright intentions of the court were misinterpreted by a real or pretended mistake into the vilest purposes of partiality, resolved to destroy the formidable engine they saw erecting against the court, and to remove at once all pretence for clamor or irritation. Granting the judge had been in error on the first day, what more could he, or any man do, than to rectify the error as soon as it was discovered, and hasten to the right path before any injury could have resulted from his momentary deviation. But the honorable Manager has told you he had sinned beyond the grace of repentance, and that no contrition, however sincere, could wipe away the offence. When I suffer such words as repentance and contrition to pass my lips, it is in quoting precisely the words of the Manager. For my part, I disclaim them. The respondent has done nothing that required the humiliation of repentance, or for which he now asks to be forgiven. Let him stand on his justification or stand not at all. But, sir, a part of that justification is that the corrupt intent charged upon him is disproved by his entire willingness to permit the counsel to manage their cause in their own way, if they disapproved of his, and, by his full and candid retraction of the error, if any error had been committed. By adverting to the testimony of Mr. Rawle, this honorable Court will see how greatly Judge Chase was surprised to find, from conversing with this witness and Judge Peters, that his conduct was viewed in so strange a light by Messrs. Lewis and Dallas. On making this discovery, although still convinced of the propriety of the proceeding, he does not obstinately adhere to it, but resolves to remove all possible cause of complaint by withdrawing all the papers which had given rise to this astonishing irritation and violation. The papers were accordingly resumed, every copy collected, and the counsel, the prisoner, and the jury, were placed in the same precise situation as if these papers had never been distributed; with the most ample acknowledgment of all their rights, and the most urgent solicitations to them to proceed in the enjoyment and exercise of them. But no, the counsel had taken their ground, and nothing could move them. John Fries had received their instructions, and with equal perseverance declined the aid of other counsel offered to him by the court repeatedly. Now, sir, let me ask you and this honorable Court, on your consciences, not to be blinded by the management and finesse of ingenious counsel; what was the meaning of all this? What was the object of it? Did the counsel now believe they would not be fully heard in defence of their client, both on law and fact? Did they now suppose themselves or the jury restricted in their rights, or that a just and impartial trial would not be had? Most certainly not. But, in the language of Mr. Lewis, they thought they had got the court into an error or a scrape, and they were determined to keep them there. What! says Judge Peters, if we have done wrong, will you not suffer us to repair the wrong by doing what is right, by doing all that you have required? No, no, was the answer. Mr. Lewis has declared to you in the most ample and explicit terms, that they abandoned John Fries because they thought they had a better chance of saving him by this means, than they could have by any trial; and, to use his own words in another part of this testimony, "we withdrew," says he, "from the defence of John Fries, because we thought it would best serve him, and we were not influenced by any other motive whatever." They had already, before Judge Iredell, tried the efficacy of the full and unconfeined exertion of their talents in his defence, and found how vain the attempt was. They were well satisfied no hope of success could be entertained on a fair trial of the merits of their case, both in law and fact, and they eagerly grasped any occurrence, that, by operating on the passions, the humanity, or the prejudices of mankind, might give to their client a chance for escape, which he could not look for in the merit of his own conduct. With this view, they most solemnly impressed upon the mind of John Fries the necessity of his maintaining the ground they had taken for him, and refusing the assistance of any other counsel. So well did these gentlemen know the court had no intention of oppressing John Fries, that in their communications to him, they anticipated the offer of other counsel to supply their desertion.

Trial of Judge Chase.

But, sir, there is one circumstance in this second day's proceeding, which has been introduced to show, that the respondent continued the same tyrannical spirit with which he is charged on the first day, and which it may be incumbent on him to remove. I mean the "unkind menace," as it has been termed by one of the witnesses, used to the counsel of Fries; when the judge told them they would proceed in the defence at the hazard or on the responsibility of their character. To ascertain the true nature of the expression, whatever it was, which fell from the court in this respect, I will refer to the same guide I have endeavored to follow throughout my argument, I mean the evidence. The aspect of this pretended menace will then be changed into a complimentary confidence in the discretion of the counsel, or at least into no more than such a menace as every gentleman of the bar acts under in every case; that is, to manage every cause before a jury with a due regard to their own reputation; to urge nothing as law to the jury, which they are conscious is not law, and to introduce no matter which they know to be either improper or irrelevant. This, in its worst character, will be found to be the whole amount of this terrible menace. What account does Mr. Lewis give of this occurrence? After stating that the court manifested a strong desire that he and his colleague should proceed in the defence of their client; that every restriction, if any had been imposed, was now removed, and that they were at full liberty to address the jury on the law and the fact as they thought proper; the judge said that this would be done "under the direction of the court, and at the peril of our own character, if we conduct ourselves with impropriety." And was it not so? And where is the criminality of saying so? Mr. Lewis did not consider this as a menace intended to restrict him in the exercise of the rights just before conceded him by the court, but rather as an unwarranted suspicion of his sense of propriety; for, says he, "I did not know of any conduct of mine to make this caution necessary."

The court perhaps thought his conduct on the day before did make it necessary. Let us now take Mr. Dallas's impression of this part of the conduct of the judge. This witness after testifying to the ample range, both as to law and fact, given to the counsel by the court, states that the judge observed "they would do this at the hazard of their characters." This Mr. Dallas afterwards terms an "unkind menace." I think upon recurring to Mr. Lewis and the other witnesses, and to some considerations naturally arising from the manifest disposition of the court at that time, it will be concluded that Mr. Dallas has mistaken the nature and character of this act of the judge, when he describes it as a menace. Mr. Tilghman states that the court seemed very anxious that the counsel should proceed, gave them full liberty to combat Judge Chase's opinion before the jury, and that they were not to be bound by that opinion. Judge Chase mentioned that cases at common law before the statutes of Edward III., ought not to be read. So of certain other cases; he particularly mentioned the case of a man who wished the stag's horns in the King's belly; and also of the man who kept a tavern with the sign of the Crown, who said he would make his son heir to the Crown. The judge declared such cases must not be cited; and said in illustration of his idea—What! cases from Rome, from Turkey, and from France? That the counsel should go into the law, but must not cite cases that were not law. After these observations, and in direct connexion and reference to them, the judge said something about "their proceeding agreeably to their own conscience." What now begins to be the complexion and character of this part of the judge's behaviour? Why, that after giving these gentlemen the utmost latitude of discussion they could possibly require, he states a certain class of decisions and cases, which appeared to him and must appear to everybody to be unworthy of notice—to be of no sort of authority or application in the case of Fries, which were not law; which Mr. Lewis himself has described as the offspring of corrupt and dependent and bloody judges, and which, if they had any operation, were hostile to the prisoner: I say, sir, after alluding to such cases, which he knew too had been used on the former trial, was it criminal or strange, he should make an appeal to their consciences, or characters, take it either way, before they proceeded to their defence?

A further examination of testimony, puts this part of the case beyond doubt. Mr. Rawle, after stating the same course of observations from the judge, as has been mentioned by Mr. Tilghman, and that he said, "I have always conducted myself with candor, and I meant to save you trouble;" after relating to you how fully the respondent removed every obstacle which had arisen from the proceeding of the first day, and how honorably he explained and justified the motives of his conduct, declared himself thus to the counsel: "having thus explained the meaning of the court, you will stand acquitted or condemned to your own consciences;" the same terms used by Mr. Tilghman; "as you think proper to act. Do as you please." This honorable Court will be pleased to recollect that Mr. Rawle speaks not from the imperfect impressions of memory after the lapse of five years; but from full notes taken at the very moment of the transaction. It is needful to go further in justification of this mistaken menace. What says Mr. Ewing? "That the respondent told the counsel that if they read cases which were not law, after knowing the opinion of the court that they were not so, they would do it with a view to their own reputations." Mr. Meredith, after relating what the judge observed upon the cases at common law, testifies that the respondent informed the counsel of Fries, "they might manage the defence in such way as they thought proper, having regard to their own character." I hope, sir, we have now obtained a just notion of the nature and intent of whatever was said by the judge at this period of the transaction; and as no witness considered it as a menace but Mr. Dallas, we may justly conclude he has mistaken it. Is not this the true interpretation of it, that the judge had determined to give these gentlemen the utmost latitude of discussion, both of the law and fact, to any extent they thought proper, referring them only to their own sense of propriety, to their own consciences, to their regard for their own characters, as to the manner in which they would use this unbounded liberty? The respondent confided in the character and conscience of these gentlemen for the fair exercise of their professional duty, and for such a limitation of their privilege of speech, as would prevent any abuse of it to improper purposes, or to an unreasonable extent.

Suffer me, sir, to make one further remark in confirmation of my position. It grows out of the acknowledged circumstances of the case, and, if fairly deduced, is evidence of the highest description. It is agreed by all the witnesses that on the second day the respondent manifested and expressed the utmost solicitude and anxiety for the counsel to proceed in the defence, and that he took "great pains" to induce them to do so. It is not doubted that he was sincere in this. Is it probable or possible, then, with these dispositions, and while he was endeavoring to persuade and to induce these gentlemen to return to the defence of their client, he would indulge himself in threats, in insults, and menaces, which would necessarily confirm them in the abandonment of the cause, and defeat the acknowledged wish the judge had that they should return to it? But still we are told, and this first article of impeachment concludes with averring, that in consequence of the conduct of the respondent, Fries was deprived of his right of being heard and defended by his counsel. To refute this unfounded assertion, we need go no further than to the testimony of Messrs. Lewis and Dallas. They surely are the best judges of the motives of their own conduct. What reason do they give for denying Fries their aid and advising him to refuse all other counsel? Because they had no hopes of success on a trial; because they believed the court had got into a difficulty where they were determined to keep them; because they thought they had a better chance to save their client's life by the uses they might make of the novelty of the first day's proceeding than they could have on a full trial after this novelty was removed; the counsel, in short, withdrew from the defence of Fries, because they thought it would best serve him, and were not influenced by any other motive whatever. How does this testimony support the averment in the conclusion of the article, which boldly affirms, not that John Fries was saved, but that he was condemned to death in consequence of not being heard by his counsel?

A very strange and unexpected effort has been made, sir, to raise a prejudice against the respondent on this occasion, by exciting or rather forcing a sympathy for John Fries. We have heard him most pathetically described as the ignorant, the friendless, the innocent John Fries. The ignorant John Fries! Is this the man who undertook to decide that a law which had passed the wisdom of the Congress of the United States, was impolitic and unconstitutional, and who stood so confident of this opinion as to maintain it at the point of the bayonet? He will not thank the gentleman for this compliment, or accept the plea of ignorance as an apology for his crimes. The friendless John Fries! Is this the man who was able to draw round himself a band of bold and determined adherents, resolved to defend him and his vile doctrines at the risk of their own lives, and of the lives of all who should dare to oppose? Is this the John Fries who had power and friends enough actually to suspend, for a considerable time, the authority of the United States over a large district of country, to prevent the execution of the laws, and to command and compel the officers appointed to execute the law to abandon the duties of their appointment, and lay the authority of the Government at the feet of this friendless usurper? The innocent John Fries! Is this the man against whom a most respectable grand jury of Pennsylvania, in 1799, found a bill of indictment for high treason; and who was afterwards convicted by another jury, equally impartial and respectable, with the approbation and under the direction of a judge, whose humanity and conduct, on that very occasion, have received the most unqualified praise of the honorable Manager who thus sympathizes with Fries? Is this the John Fries, against whom a second grand jury, in 1800, found another bill for the same offence, founded on the same facts, and who was again convicted by a just and conscientious petit jury? Is this innocent German the man who, in pursuance of a wicked opposition to the power and laws of the United States, and a mad confidence in his ability to maintain that opposition, rescued the prisoners duly arrested by the officers of the Government, and placed those very officers under duress; who, with arms in his hands and menace on his tongue, arrayed himself in military order and strength, put to hazard the safety and peace of the country, and threatened us with all the desolation, bloodshed, and horror of a civil war; who, at the moment of his desperate attack, cried out to his infatuated followers, "Come on! I shall probably fall on the first fire, then strike, stab, and kill all you can?" In the fervid imagination of the honorable Manager, the widow and orphans of this man, even before he is dead, are made in hypothesis to cry at the judgment seat of God against the respondent; and his blood, though not a drop of it has been spilt, is seen to stain the pure ermine of justice. I confess, sir, as a Pennsylvanian, whose native State has been disgraced with two rebellions in the short period of four years, my ear was strangely struck to hear the leader of one of them, addressed with such friendly tenderness, and honored with such flattering sympathy by the honorable Manager.

It is not unusual, sir, in public prosecutions for the accused to appeal to his general life and conduct in refutation of the charges. How proudly may the respondent make this appeal! He is charged with a violent attempt to violate the laws and Constitution of his country, and to destroy the best liberty of his fellow-citizens. Look, sir, to his past life, to the constant course of his opinions and conduct, and the improbability of the charge is manifest. Look to the days of doubt and danger; look to that glorious struggle so long and so doubtfully maintained for that independence we now enjoy; for those rights of self-government you now exercise, and do you not see the respondent among the boldest of the bold, never sinking in hope or in exertion, aiding by his talents and encouraging by his spirit; in short, putting his property and his life in issue on the contest, and making the loss of both certain by the active part he assumed, should his country fail of success! And does this man, who thus gave all his possessions, all his energies, all his hopes to his country and to the liberties of this American people, now employ the small and feeble remnant of his days, without interest or object, to pull down and destroy that very fabric of freedom, that very Government, and those very rights, he so labored to establish? It is not credible; it cannot be credited, but on proof infinitely stronger than anything that has been offered to this honorable Court on this occasion. Indiscretions may have been hunted out by the perseverance of persecution; but I trust most confidently that the just, impartial, and dignified sentence of this Court, will completely establish to our country and to the world, that the respondent has fully and honorably justified himself against the charges now exhibited against him; and has discharged his official duties, not only with the talents that are conceded to him, but with an integrity infinitely more dear to him.

FRIDAY, February 22.

Mr. KEY.—Mr. President, I rise to make some observations on the second, third, and fourth articles of the impeachment. I shall not apologize for the manner in which I shall discharge a duty which I have voluntarily undertaken, but merely regret that indisposition has prevented my giving the subject that attention which it merits. It will be at once perceived that these articles relate to the trial of Callender. Before, however, I go into an examination of the second article, it may be proper to notice the situation in which the judge found himself and the state of the public mind at the time. The sedition law was passed in the year 1799. It immediately arrested the public attention, and strongly agitated the public feelings. In the State of Virginia it was peculiarly obnoxious; many of the most respectable characters considered it as unconstitutional, and as a violation of the liberty of the press; most deemed it impolitic; while some viewed it as a salutary restraint on the licentiousness of the press, more calculated to preserve than to destroy it. In this state of the public mind it became the duty of the respondent, in the ordinary assignment of judicial districts, to go into the district of Virginia, where he was entirely a stranger, to carry the laws into execution. It is scarcely necessary to observe that when laws are considered obnoxious, much of the odium attending them inevitably falls on those who carry them into effect. In May, 1800, Judge Chase went to Richmond to hold a court, and soon after it was in session, the grand jury found a presentment and afterwards a bill against James T. Callender for an infraction of this law, in publishing the book entitled "The Prospect Before Us" which brought into issue its constitutionality. Professional men of talents, carried along by the tide of public opinion, volunteered their services in defence of the accused; and every effort was exhausted to wrest the decision from the respondent. Exceptions were accordingly taken at every stage of the case, and when the jurors were brought to the book, a question arose which forms the foundation of the charge contained in the second article. I will in the first place read the article, then state the law and the fact in the case referred to, and show that if both are against us, still the respondent is not guilty of the charge contained in it.

The second article states "That prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred, for the district of Virginia, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the said trial, because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words, charged to be libellous, in the indictment, were extracted; and the said Basset was accordingly sworn and did serve on the said jury, by whose verdict the prisoner was subsequently convicted."

If we extract from this article the epithets it contains nothing will remain, and epithets fortunately do not constitute crimes. The offence and fact charged is, the permitting Mr. Basset to be sworn on the jury with an intention to oppress the traverser, which is not in the least supported by the testimony. The article alleges that Mr. Basset wished to be excused. I appeal to the testimony, whether he did wish or desire to be excused. The observations he made arose entirely from a scruple on his own mind, and not from any objection to serving. Instead of his wishing to be excused, the real fact is that which he said flowed from the peculiar situation in which he stood; and he says that he declared himself willing to serve, provided in law he was competent. The fact, therefore, on which this article rests, is not supported by the testimony, and not being supported, I might here dismiss this branch of the subject without further animadversion. But I cannot consistently with my duty stop here, or omit proceeding to show that the arguments of the honorable Managers are as unfounded in law as their facts are destitute of proof. Let us then examine the law on this case. To sustain the article, the honorable Managers must prove three points.

1. That Mr. Basset objected to serving.
2. That in point of law he ought not to have been admitted on the jury; and
3. That his objections to serving were overruled from a corrupt intention on the part of the respondent to oppress and procure the conviction of the traverser.

It is necessary here to examine the ancient doctrine of challenges. The law of challenges presents itself to our view in a twofold character, the one a challenge to the array which goes to vitiate the whole jury; the other, an objection to a particular juror. In this case there was no serious challenge made to the array. My observations will therefore be directed to the latter species of challenge, that of individual jurors, which is made by excepting to an individual when he is presented to be sworn. In this case no such exception was made to Mr. Basset.

When a juror is challenged there are two modes of trying whether he stands indifferent. One mode is by two triers consisting of the two jurors first sworn. Callender's counsel did not avail themselves of this mode.

The other mode is to swear the individual offered as a juror, and interrogate him as to his indifference.

Here I cannot avoid expressing my surprise at the law laid down by the honorable Managers. No point of law is more certain than that a juror, to be indifferent, need not have refrained from having expressed an opinion either upon the law or the fact involved in the case he is to try; and that he is only rendered incapable by favor or malice.

The great principle which the counsel laid down was that jurors should be impartial; but is that the subject of investigation in this article; what are the facts? That Judge Chase put this question to the juror: "Have you formed and delivered an opinion on the charges contained in the indictment?" The juror answered in the negative and was sworn. Gentlemen say the question should not have been formed and delivered, but formed or delivered; and that this was the question on the trial of Fries. I mean to show that there is no difference between the two expressions. I mean to show that, if the juror had both formed and delivered an opinion, this would not incapacitate him. The oath of triers will bring this case to a precise point. Trials per Pais 179, Salkeld 144, states the oath of a trier to be, "you shall well and truly try, whether A (the juror challenged) stands indifferent between the parties to this issue."

But the counsel were not willing to determine the competency of a juror by this oath, and therefore gave the decision to the court. They contend, however, that the indictment ought to have been read. But though on the facts the juror may have made up his mind, the offence consisted in the intention, and, therefore, the forming an opinion on the former did not imply a judgment on the latter. Is there a man that does not believe that when one person kills another with malice prepense, he perpetrates murder? Is not the intention the gist of the offence? And yet I can produce authorities to show, that although a juror in a criminal case give a verdict on the fact and the law, this is considered as no objection to his serving as juror in similar cases.

In Rolles' Abridgement, title Trial, folio 657, it is laid down, that, "if a juror has said that he will find for one of the parties, it is a good cause of challenge for favor, if he so spoke from favor; but if he did not speak it out of favor, but from his knowledge of the matter in issue, it is not a good cause of challenge."

In the same folio, it is also laid down as law, "that it is no cause of challenge to a juror that he hath said that he will find his verdict for one of the parties, if it is not found by the triers or the court, that he spoke from favor and not from the truth of the fact."

In folio 655, and in Trials per Pais, it is laid down, "that if a juror hath twenty times declared that he will find for one of the parties, it is not a principal challenge, because he might have spoken it from his knowledge of the matter in issue, and not out of favor or malice."

In Keelynge, folio 9, we find a case where a juror had formed a verdict of guilty against a person, and another person was tried on the same indictment for the same offence; in which an objection on that account to the juror was overruled.

The objection in this case was overruled—why? Because the juror stood indifferent. Could, then, any answer of Basset to the question propounded to him evince any degree of partiality, or that his mind was not in a state of indifference as to the issue of the trial? Having formed an opinion that a particular writing constituted a libel, did not preclude him from forming an upright opinion on the law and the fact. How had Basset formed an opinion? Simply from seeing certain passages in a newspaper, which purported to be taken from "The Prospect Before Us." Did he not, then, stand impartial so far as respected the ascertaining whether those passages were authentic, whether Callender was the author?—if edited with intent to defame? Further, was there not another decision to be made, whether the matter was false and malicious? The essence of the offence consisted in the intention. On all these points the mind of Basset was perfectly free from partiality.

To the authorities I have cited I will add one derived from our country, in which all the doctrines I have contended for are expressly recognised, in the decision of Chief Justice Ellsworth in the State of Connecticut, to be found in Kirby's Reports, page 427—"As to the other point, an opinion formed and declared upon a general principle of law does not disqualify a juror to sit on a case, where that principle applies. Jurors are judges of the law as well as of the fact; as relative to the issues put to them, and are supposed to have opinions of what the law is, though a willingness to change them, if reason appears, in the course of the trial. They may all be challenged on one side or the other, if having an opinion of the law in the case is ground of challenge. It is enough in point of indifference, that jurors have no interest of their own affected, and no personal bias or prepossession, in favor or against either party, and not requisite that they should be ignorant of the cause, or unopinionated as to the rules and principles on which it is to be decided. It has been adjudged (23 Can. K. B.) not to be a sufficient cause of challenge, that a juror had declared his opinion concerning the title of the land in question; so also that the jury have found others guilty on the same indictment; or that a juror has declared his opinion that the party is guilty, and will be hanged, if it appears he made such declaration from his knowledge of the cause, and not out of ill-will to the party.—2 Hawk. P. C. 418."

I trust the authorities I have adduced fully show, that in point of law there was no valid objection to Mr. Basset as a juror, and that the illegality charged against Judge Chase on this account, falls to the ground.

I will now turn to an authority cited by one of the honorable Managers—3d Bacon, 756. [Mr. Key here read the case.]

We find that all the causes of challenge here recited go to evince partiality, or, in the language of the ancient books, "favor or malice." If the having formed and delivered an opinion on the law were a good cause for challenge, no capital case could come before an unprejudiced jury. The only question in such cases is, whether the facts proved come up to the charge; for such is the interest men take in the commission of great crimes, that every man forms an opinion on them.

Something has been said of the trial of Logwood, for forging the currency of the Bank of the United States. There is probably no man of information that has not heard something of the subject, or made up his opinion on the illegality of counterfeiting. But does it follow that the having formed such an opinion could disqualify a man from serving as a juror in the case? If this were so, it would follow that he who had formed the most correct opinion on the laws of his country, would be the most incompetent, while he who was the most ignorant of them, would be the most competent juror. It appears that if Mr. Basset had even answered in the affirmative to the question put to him, supposing the indictment to have been previously published, it would not have destroyed the competency of the juror, because he, notwithstanding, stood perfectly impartial as to the facts to be proved and the law arising on them.

Believing that no subtlety or ingenuity can shake the principle I have laid down, or establish a contrary principle, I feel full confidence in having shown the legality of the opinion laid down by the court; and I do believe that a more correct opinion was never delivered.

Suppose we are mistaken in the fact, which we say is proved, that Mr. Basset did not desire to be excused; admit that he did pray to be excused; still, so far as he has himself, on oath, explained the situation of his mind, there was no cause for challenge.

Admit, also, that we are mistaken in the law we have laid down, does it follow as a necessary consequence that the directing Basset to be sworn on the jury, was done with an intent to oppress the traverser? We call for the facts that impeach the motives of Judge Chase. In the opening of this case we were told that the respondent was highly gifted with rich attainments of mind. It was correctly said; and it might have been added that his integrity was equal to his talents. But the observation was made to raise his head at the expense of his heart. I will examine this argument.

The truth is that no judge is liable for an error of judgment. I apprehend this is conceded by the article itself, which states a criminal intent. Now for the evidence. What criminal intention do the honorable managers draw from it? It is said that the respondent is highly gifted with intellectual powers, and must have known in this instance the law. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. I dislike the compliment; the best gifted mortals are frail, and a single erroneous decision may be made by any man.

Let us, on this point, refer to decisions in modern times. They will show that an error in judgment has never of itself been considered an evidence of corruption in a judge.

[Mr. Key here cited a case from Dunford and East, folio 653—King vs. Johnson, containing the opinion of Justice Buller, who declares "that you can never infer corruption from the judgment itself but from the opinion given."]

Here then is the decided opinion of a most able judge that although the act and judgment of the court be illegal, there is no ground to infer corruption. So in this case, admit, for argument's sake, that we are mistaken in point of fact, and that the law we have laid down is incorrect; still, however gross the error of the judge, it cannot in itself contain any foundation for presuming fraud. From what fact is fraud inferred? From the general mass of the transactions attending the trial of Callender? The evidence cannot be taken accumulatively. Each article must be taken by itself, and one can derive no force from the rest. Were this not the case, a hasty word, uttered in an unguarded moment, might be construed into a crime, and a number of small offences, individually of the most trifling nature, be made to constitute a great one.

I shall, in a subsequent view, take into consideration the whole conduct of Judge Chase, and show that, so far from operating to his injury, it redounds to his credit. Upon this second article, I trust I may be permitted to say that the evidence does not bear out the facts in the manner stated; that even if the alleged facts are proven, the law is clear that Mr. Basset was still a competent juror. I have also endeavored to show that no inference of corruption can be drawn from an error in law; but that, on the contrary, particularly if it be committed by a man of acknowledged talents and unimpeached integrity, it is to be considered at best but as a mistake.

It would be well to analyze this argument of the honorable managers, by putting it in the form of a syllogism. The major proposition represents Judge Chase as possessed of great legal attainments and as highly gifted by nature; this I admit—the minor is, that with these high gifts and attainments he has erred in a clear point of law; this I deny. But what is the conclusion deducible from the premises? That his decision was corrupt? So say the managers. I deny it. In the language of the judge it is a palpable non sequitur.

I will now proceed to the third article, which, when correctly understood, will be found as destitute of impeachable matter as either of the other articles. It is as follows: "That, with intent 'to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was 'not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be 'given in, on pretence that the said witness could 'not prove the truth of the whole of one of the 'charges contained in the indictment although 'the said charge embraced more than one fact.'"

In opening the case one of the honorable managers inquired what human subtlety or ingenuity could devise to extenuate this act of the respondent. Our reply is that it requires no subtlety or ingenuity; that it was correct in point of law, and that the case is so clear, that he who runs may read. The court must permit me to observe that the article presents an abstract case, not growing out of, or connected with the evidence. This court, I apprehend, is not sitting here to decide this abstract point, whether in any case it is admissible to prove one fact contained in a particular charge by one witness, and one by another; but to determine whether in this case, where one witness was offered to prove part of one charge, and no other witness offered to the same charge, it was proper to receive testimony offered. I contend that the decision was correct on the case before the court. The indictment against Callender contained two counts, each of which embraced twenty distinct set of words. Colonel Taylor was called to prove particular facts contained in one of the charges. It is not necessary here to discuss the propriety of ordering the questions to be reduced to writing, as that is the subject of the next article. Colonel Taylor, without meaning any improper use of words, was a witness on speculation; for no man has a higher respect for his character; but I bottom the remark on this circumstance, that several days previous to Colonel Taylor's appearance, an affidavit had been drawn, on the part of Callender, for a continuance, in which the names of a number of material witnesses were stated; among which was an honorable member of this court (Mr. Giles) and General Mason, but in which the name of Colonel Taylor does not appear. It appears that subpoenas had issued for three witnesses; two of which did not attend, for whom no attachment was prayed. Colonel Taylor alone appeared; and the counsel were certainly ignorant at the time he was sworn, what he could prove. Mr. Hay has declared that neither Callender or his counsel knew what Colonel Taylor could prove. Was it not correct in the court, under these circumstances, to ask what he could prove? Colonel Taylor was produced, under an expectation, it is said, that he could prove the twelfth set of words contained in the second count of the indictment. Let us, to elucidate the conduct of the court, refer to the testimony of Mr. Robertson, a man distinguished for his stenographical talent, which remains on paper, which was drawn up at the time, and does not therefore depend on the frailty of his memory.

Mr. Robertson says, "The attorney for the United States having concluded, the counsel for the traverser introduced Colonel Taylor as a witness, and he was sworn; but at the moment the oath was administered, the judge called on them, and desired to know what they intended to prove by the witness. They answered, that they intended, to examine Colonel Taylor, to prove that Mr. Adams had avowed principles in his presence which justified Mr. Callender in saying that the President was an aristocrat—that he had voted against the sequestration law, and the resolutions concerning the suspension of commercial intercourse with Great Britain." This was then the object and view with which Colonel Taylor was called on. What is the charge in the articles of impeachment? That the testimony of Colonel Taylor was rejected "on pretence that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges, contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact." The charge in the indictment is that the President "was a professed aristocrat; that he proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest;" and Colonel Taylor was called to prove that Mr. Adams had voted against the sequestration law, and the resolutions concerning the suspension of commercial intercourse with Great Britain. Was it competent to Colonel Taylor to give evidence on this point? The best evidence the nature of the case will admit must be adduced. Colonel Taylor then was clearly an incompetent witness on this point; as there was better evidence, the journals of this honorable body, within the reach of the traverser. It only then remained for Colonel Taylor to prove that the President had avowed principles which showed him to be an aristocrat; which, if proved, would have been altogether immaterial. To prove no other facts was he called upon. Are then counsel to be indulged in consuming the time of courts in the examination of witnesses, who have nothing relevant to offer? Let us familiarize this to a common case. Suppose a man is indicted for stealing a horse. One witness deposes that he saw him go into the stable where the horse was; another saw a man coming from the stable leading a horse; and another saw, an hour after, the man, with the horse, five miles off, selling him as his own property. This testimony will be admitted. But state the case the other way; that a witness was brought forward solely to prove the first fact; is there a court on earth that would say such testimony should be admitted? And this was the case here. Colonel Taylor was called upon to prove what is altogether unimportant, a part only of one charge, or that which, if true, could be proved by better evidence. Are not, also, the court the exclusive judges of the competency of the testimony that shall go to the jury; and does not every day's experience show us that evidence that is offered, but which does not go to the whole of the case, is refused? This is done by all courts at all times. But say gentlemen, was it possible for the court to know whether the questions offered to be put might not have led to other inquiries, and produced information of consequence? True, but on this ground no testimony ever could be rejected, because, by possibility, it may lead to what is important.

But, admitting the judge to have been wrong, I again ask, does an error of judgment in itself imply corruption? Most surely not. In the nature of things can it be so? To give credit to my honorable client but for a moiety of the talent allowed him, he must have seen that, even had he admitted the testimony of Colonel Taylor, and admitting that it had justified the whole of the twelfth charge, there remained nineteen other charges, on which Callender must have been convicted. And whence this conduct towards Colonel Taylor? Did not the judge know that Colonel Taylor stood high in the esteem of a large portion of the community; and that umbrage offered to him would naturally excite the indignation of his friends? The decision given could not then flow from a corrupt motive. No. It was given in the sternness of his integrity. Had his motives been impure, had he viewed his conduct as wrong, instead of acting in this manly way, he would have put a gloss on his actions, he would have courted the reputation of forbearance by admitting the testimony of Colonel Taylor, and would still have satiated his vengeful feelings, if he had them, with a conviction on the remaining charges.

Let us examine another fact in this case. Judge Chase, as appears by the statement of Mr. Robertson, requested the attorney of the United States to permit the questions to be put to the witness; but Mr. Nelson "declared that he did not feel himself at liberty to consent to such a departure from legal principles." If then, in this act, there was error, that did not depend on him. The prosecutor for the United States objected to the indulgence which he proposed. I do for myself believe, that where no evidence is offered to prove the whole of one entire fact, it is within the sound discretion of the court to refuse the testimony of part. But, notwithstanding this, the judge was willing to relax the severity of the law.

Is there nothing else that goes to show that there was no intention on the part of the judge to oppress the traverser? As I have already observed, if he had possessed but half the talent ascribed to him, he would, with such intention, have gilded the bill. But he did not do so. Further, the subsequent act of the judge in imposing so light a fine, and so short a period of imprisonment, for so atrocious an offence, when he had power to impose a fine of two thousand dollars, and an imprisonment for two years, is indisputable evidence of his freedom from all such intention. No; the conviction flowed of necessity from the evidence, which was too powerful to be resisted. But did not the judge, in the integrity of his heart, declare, on rejecting the testimony of Col. Taylor, "Gentlemen, I may be mistaken, but if I am not right, it is an error in judgment, and you can state the proceedings on record, so as to show my error, and I shall be the first man to grant you the benefit of a new trial, by granting you a writ of error, in the Supreme Court."

It is said, however, that this was a mere pretext; that a bill of exceptions would not lie in a criminal case; and what could then be done? The simplest thing on earth—a point of law can be saved without an exception. The counsel were not so ignorant as not to have respected this declaration, and to have known that they might, under it, have saved the point, and taken the opinion of the superior court. The least informed counsel can show a multitude of cases of this kind. In the progress of my argument I shall show why this offer was not accepted.

It does then appear to me, that, considering the third article as connected with the facts substantiated, the judge was perfectly correct in point of law in the decision he made. All must agree in the opinion that if the testimony of Col. Taylor had proved Mr. Adams an aristocrat, it could not have justified the libellous matter with which the traverser was charged. If this is the fact, and no other evidence was offered that could be legally received, the rejection must have been perfectly correct. Supposing, however, that we are wrong on this point, there is still abundant evidence to show that Judge Chase was not influenced by any intention to oppress the accused, or to procure his conviction, because that unavoidably flowed from the nature of the charges and the state of the defence, whether testimony of Colonel Taylor were admitted or not.

In the course of my whole observation through life, I never heard it doubted, till yesterday, that in a case of doubtful aspect, a man is to be considered innocent until he is proved to be guilty. But we are now told that whenever an infraction of a law is committed by a judge, he is to be presumed guilty, unless he establishes his innocence. But this is not the case; the benignity of our law is very different. If it were so, who, that possesses the ordinary frailties of humanity, would undertake in the judicial station to interpose between man and man? The law clearly is that a judge shall be presumed innocent until he is proved guilty, even when he decide against law; and that his errors shall be ascribed to the head, and not to the heart. This notice is due to the observation of an honorable Manager, which struck me with great surprise, that Mr. Basset's request to be excused from serving as juror arose from his sentiments being known by the judge. This, however, does not appear from the evidence. It appears, on the contrary, that he was a stranger to Judge Chase, and that he did not wish to be excused. But in this prosecution we are not only to hear much new and extraordinary doctrine; but we are likewise to hear statements of facts for which there is no foundation.

I will now proceed to the fourth article, which contains five distinct specifications of facts as follows:

"That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance; viz:

"1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission, or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above named John Taylor, the witness:"

"2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest, that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term:"

"3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law, to which the conduct of the judge did, at the same time, manifestly tend:"

"4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which, at length, induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment:"

"5. In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice."

The word injustice in the preliminary part of the article must refer to Callender; the partiality charged, must have been to the United States, I presume, and against Callender; the term intemperance is of such doubtful import, that I scarcely knew what to understand by it. It cannot be used as opposed to sobriety, as no one will charge the judge with a violation of this virtue. It may refer to his conduct to counsel, and perhaps to Callender. This conduct is said to have been evinced, in the first place, "In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission, or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound, to the above named John Taylor, the witness."

If this was incorrect, I cannot perceive its injustice to Callender, nor its partiality or intemperance. But did the conduct of the court in this instance correspond with the law and the practice? I apprehend that it did. I understand it to be a clear and admitted principle of law, that the court is the only competent tribunal to determine the competency, the admissibility, and the relevancy of evidence; when admitted, its credibility is the exclusive province of the jury. I have before stated the reasons which rendered it necessary in this case to know what Colonel Taylor could prove. To understand the object for which he was produced with greater certainty and precision, the judge ordered the questions proposed to be put to be previously reduced to writing. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the practice in the courts of Virginia to say this was not novel, but I may surely venture to affirm that there was nothing criminal in it. I know well that in different States there are different forms of practice. I can only say, that Judge Chase, going from Maryland, where the practice does prevail, would naturally carry to Virginia the knowledge of the practice of the State from which he went. It is said that it is not the practice in Virginia, and one gentleman says he never heard of an instance of the kind. But I believe there are exceptions. I recollect, in the mandamus case, the counsel were called upon to reduce their questions to writing, and that the Attorney General had a whole day allowed to him to make up his mind on the propriety of answering the questions put to him. And yet in that case there was no disposition manifested to oppress; the course was pursued to determine the competency and relevancy of evidence. Need I go further than the practice of this honorable Court in this very case, in which there have been numerous instances of questions directed by the court to be reduced to writing? Have not you, Mr. President, from a knowledge derived from your extensive practice of the bar, or from an instantaneous exercise of right reason, in several instances, directed questions to be reduced to writing? And has it not been seen that though counsel withdrew their objection, every member of the court possessed and exercised the right of requiring it to be done? No testimony which is not legal should be admitted to go to the jury; and what is legal testimony and the manner of determining it must be determined by the court.

We have thus made it to appear that it is the practice to direct questions to be committed to writing in the courts of Maryland, in the Supreme Court of the United States, and in this court. Does this not abundantly justify the conduct of the respondent? But even admitting that conduct to have been improper, was it corrupt or criminal? What moral obligation did it violate? What statutory provision did it infringe? And is a man impeachable for that which violates no moral principle or legal provision? If so, this is the most dangerous doctrine ever advanced.

The second specification is in the following words:

"In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term."

This charge is grounded on the fact of a refusal to postpone the trial on an affidavit. That the court acted correctly in this instance will appear from this consideration. Nothing is more clear than that, under the common law, all applications for a continuance, on affidavit, are founded on the discretion of the court. Is it not wonderfully singular that there should have been an application founded on an affidavit, if the law of Virginia, as stated in the 6th article, applied to the case? One thing is clear: either that the Attorney General and Mr. Hay lost all recollection of the existence of this law of Virginia respecting continuances, or that they considered it inapplicable; for they would not otherwise have founded the application on an affidavit. They would have produced the law and have demanded a continuance. Did they do so? No. If, then, the law officer of the State and Mr. Hay both forgot that it existed, is it surprising that it should be unknown to Mr. Chase? If those gentlemen did recollect the existence of the law, they must surely have been of opinion that it did not apply to the case of Callender, or they would have saved themselves the trouble of filing an affidavit. It will however be shown that it did not apply, and hence their application founded on affidavit.

I have stated that all applications for a continuance on affidavit are addressed to the discretion of the court. It is a great object of criminal justice that the punishment of the guilty should be certain, lenient, and speedy. In the State of Maryland, where Judge Chase had so long presided or practised, it is the uniform practice to try offences the first term they are presented. It is also the practice in England, unless particular reasons are assigned for delay. I was about to prove this; but as it is conceded, I will not trouble the court with authorities. Judge Chase, then, having no knowledge of the particular law of Virginia had to recur to the affidavit. Was that a cause for the continuance of the trial? When a man is charged with a criminal offence, matter which shall justify a continuance must go to the whole of the charges, and not merely to a part of them. If he cannot defend some of the charges, he is to plead guilty to them, and pray a continuance of such of the charges as he can justify by evidence. This is an universal rule of justice and of practice. To familiarize it by a common incident: A man is indicted for stealing a horse, a saddle, and a bridle. He is arraigned, and pleads not guilty, and then desires a continuance, on an affidavit that an absent witness can prove that the bridle is his own. Would it not revolt common sense to continue the case, when his defence rested on such grounds? No court of criminal jurisprudence would prostitute justice by conniving at such an indulgence.

How was it in the case of Callender? Were there not, in each count of the indictment, twenty distinct sets of libellous words? In order, then, to warrant a continuance, it was necessary to show the absence of material witnesses in relation to the whole, or to plead guilty to all the charges on which such testimony did not exist.

But it is said the judge had no right to be informed what it was expected could be proved on behalf of the traverser. This idea is novel to my practice. I will not say it does not prevail elsewhere; but certain I am that it does not prevail in the courts which I have attended. It is again alleged that a party is not obliged to disclose his testimony. But the law provides that he shall, when he applies for a favor. So different is the practice in the State of Maryland from that contended for on this occasion, that a party is obliged to state what he expects to prove, and if the opposite party admits it, they must go to trial on the remaining part of the charge. According to the practice of Maryland, this affidavit is materially defective, inasmuch as not guilty is pleaded to the whole of the charges contained in the indictment, and it is not declared that testimony is wanting, which there is a reasonable expectation of getting, to disprove or justify the whole of them. It is also materially defective in another point. It is not stated that there was a probability of obtaining the testimony within a reasonable time. I have never known an affidavit considered good, which did not state this circumstance.

We allow that every man is entitled to compulsory process to obtain the attendance of his witnesses: but this right does not in the least lessen the discretion of the court with regard to the time on which the trial shall take place; this they will fix according to circumstances; and when the trial does come on, should the witnesses summoned by a party not attend, he is entitled to attachments against them. This affidavit, then, was defective in two respects: it did not state the absence of witnesses who could justify the whole of the charges; neither did it state an expectation that they could be had within a reasonable time. If a man undertakes to libel the Government under which he lives, to hold it up to the resentment and scorn of the people, it is but reasonable that he should be prepared at the time of his publication with a justification of his charges. In this instance, it appears that a large part of the contemplated justification rested on records, and that even these had not been procured.

The honorable Managers have observed that, even in England, the courts will grant time to enable the party accused to issue process for his witnesses. Let me, however, surmise that, although subpoenas had been served on Mr. Giles and Mr. Mason, no process of attachment issued on their non-appearance. The judge intimated that it might issue, but the counsel waived accepting it. From what cause? Because they well knew that the testimony of these witnesses would be of no avail.

An authority has been cited from the English books (Foster's Reports) to show that at a special court, time was granted for obtaining witnesses alleged to be material, although, as it has been remarked, the court was confined to one term; but I cannot perceive the force of this observation, as it had the power of adjourning from time to time, until the business before it was finished. The court met, saw the extent of the business to be attended to, and allowed time for the obtaining of witnesses.

[Mr. Key here cited the case from Foster's Crown Law.]

In this case, the prisoner was tried at a great distance from his witnesses, and the place where the crime had been committed. Some of his witnesses resided in England and others in Scotland. He was allowed eleven days for obtaining his witnesses in England and twenty-one days for obtaining those in Scotland.

Compare this case with that of Callender. In the latter case, a motion was made for a continuance. The judge declared he could not postpone the trial to the next term, but offered a postponement for a month or six weeks; nay, he offered to go to Delaware, hold a court there, and return to Richmond. With such a disposition manifested by the court, is there any reason to doubt that, if asked, three months, or any reasonable time, would have been allowed. And why did they not ask for a longer time, if they deemed it important? The answer is obvious—Judge Chase was still to preside.

Doubts have been started of the power of the courts of the United States to adjourn except from day to day—a power which I never before have heard questioned, and which is essentially necessary to the impartial administration of justice. We have proved that this is the practice of the courts in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and that it has been done in Richmond; and I believe we may safely add that it is, and must be, the practice throughout the United States, when circumstances demand it.

I have stated it as an acknowledged principle of law, that he who edits libellous matter ought to be prepared with his vouchers to support it. What is there valuable among men, what is there estimable in private or public life, that has not in this country been basely calumniated by the licentiousness of the press? All characters in all administrations have been most wantonly assailed by its scurrility. He then who takes this bold and daring ground, ought to have his vouchers at hand, or to have them within accessible reach. In the situation in which a libeller wantonly stands, he is entitled to nothing but law, sheer law.

On the third specification, which charges the respondent with "the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law, to which the conduct of the judge did, at the same time, manifestly tend;" I have but a few observations to make. I should indeed have spared many of the remarks I have made, were it not for an ignorance of the peculiar ground on which the honorable Managers mean to rely in their reply, and were it not for the fear that an omission to notice any of the charges preferred, might be considered as an abandonment of our defence as far as related to them.

I have nowhere discovered in the evidence anything that supports in point of fact the charge against Judge Chase, of falsely insinuating that the prisoner's counsel wished to excite the public fears and indignation to produce insubordination to law. The judge did say that the counsel used a popular argument, calculated to mislead and deceive the populace; and this is the extent and head of his offending; but there is a wide difference between this and the charge laid to his door. He told the counsel, and told them truly, that they were availing themselves of a popular argument, calculated to mislead and deceive the people. Attend, I pray you, to the testimony of Mr. Hay. Did not the counsel for the prisoner say they had no hope of exculpating him on the facts? Did they not say they did not argue for Callender? That it was the cause, and not the man, they defended? That they did not expect to convince Judge Chase, or any other federal judge of the unconstitutionality of the sedition act? Were they not then laboring with their whole talents to catch the popular ear? Did they not expressly declare that they had little hopes of the jury, and that their object was to make an impression on the public mind? And when the judge declared that the constitutionality of the act could not be discussed before the jury, did they not, failing in their object, abandon the defence? The ground which they meant to have taken was withdrawn, and they withdrew with it.

As to the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel, no particular facts appear to be relied on. The term captious may be unusual; the phrase young gentlemen, which in the opening the honorable Manager metamorphosed into boys, but which last word does not by the testimony appear to have been used, may have been obnoxious to the ears of those to whom it was applied. There may not have been manifested in this language the most refined decorum; but let us recollect that our honorable client is not now on his trial for a violation of the decorums of society. Possessed of great adroitness of mind and quickness of feeling, he conceives with rapidity, and expresses with energy his ideas. This may be a weakness; but it is a weakness of nature. Had he a colder heart, and weaker head, he might not be exposed to these little indiscretions. But where is the vade mecum from which a judge is to derive precedents for his behaviour? Courts are instituted, not to polish and refine, but to administer justice between man and man. One judge may possess a more pleasing urbanity of manners than another; but are we to infer that because a man is warm in the expression of his sentiments, he is, therefore, angry? It will not be contended that when the counsel for the traverser spoke of the necessity of the indictment being verbatim et literatim, in the witty reply of the judge that they might as well insist that it should be punctuatim, there was any violation of decorum manifested. The reply grew out of the occasion, and never was a remark better applied.

I know of no other unusual language, except the expression of non sequitur; and surely there was nothing improper in that. We have been told that it is the usual habit of Judge Chase to interrupt counsel when they attempt to lay down as law that which is not law. In this case, he certainly did so; but it does not appear that he departed from his ordinary course; and if he had, where is the rule which, on such occasions, is to govern a judge? Such conduct, as I have before observed on another point, violates no moral obligation, infringes no statutory provision. The judge may not have displayed the urbanity, the suavity, and the patience, which so happily characterize some high characters; but where or when has the absence of these minor qualities been considered as criminal? Some of the witnesses, and among them Colonel Taylor, have described the conduct of the judge as imperious, sarcastic and witty; but no witness has pronounced it tyrannical or oppressive.

With regard to the 4th specification, which relates to the interruption of counsel, I shall say but little. A judge has a right at all times to interrupt counsel whenever they act improperly. It is the inherent right of courts. When that is laid down as law which is not law, it is not only their right, but it is their duty, to stop them. Such interruptions may be considered vexatious by the counsel that are interrupted; but of such matters the court only can be the judge. One witness, examined on the frequency of the interruptions of counsel on the trial of Callender, has said that more interruptions occurred in a case before Judge Iredell, whose eulogium has been pronounced by an honorable Manager; and another witness has informed us that it is the habit of Judge Chase frequently to interrupt counsel in civil as well as criminal cases; that the habit arises from the vigor of his mind, and the ardor of his feelings; that this is somewhat embarrassing to counsel, but that a little suavity on their part soon restores the judge to good humor. On this point I have no further observations to make. I will leave it to the good sense of this honorable body to determine how far the conduct of the respondent was, on this occasion, indecorous, and how far, on account of this conduct, he is liable to impeachment.

I have omitted to notice one of the interruptions, relied on by the Managers. When the counsel for the traverser insisted that the jury had a right to assess the fine, according to one of the witnesses, the judge replied that it was a wild notion; according to Mr. Robertson, he said it was a mistaken idea. And that it was, every professional man will acknowledge. The point had been previously decided at Richmond by Judge Paterson and Judge Iredell; it had been decided that the law of Virginia did not apply, and that the assessment of the fine was the province of the court. By the law of Virginia, a fine is assessed ad libitum; by the act of the United States it is provided that it shall not exceed a certain sum. How then was it possible to act under both laws?

As to the fifth specification, which is in these words: "In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase for the conviction of the

'accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.' I have no precise idea of the meaning of the term indecent solicitude—solicitude means mental anxiety. If we are to understand by solicitude that the judge felt anxiety for the furtherance of justice, that is simply an operation of the mind, and to determine whether it is praiseworthy or reprehensible, some overt act must be shown. For is it possible that, in any interesting case, a judge can sit on the bench without feeling some interest in the issue? This is more than falls to the lot of mortal. No, he must have feelings; and all that can be required is, that he restrain them from breaking out into acts subversive of justice. I will endeavor, on this point, to condense the testimony. It is said that the solicitude of the respondent is evinced by his indecent behaviour to the counsel, and by his conduct previous to the trial. A jocular conversation is resorted to, and expressions made in the most unguarded moments are drawn forth in judgment against him. After he had delivered a charge at Annapolis, Mr. Mason came up to him, and asked him what kind of charge he had delivered, whether it was to be considered as legal, religious, moral or political. To which the judge replied, that it was a little of all. Some conversation ensued on the licentiousness of the press, and he observed that when he went to Richmond, if a respectable jury could be found, he would have Callender punished. All this is worked up, as it were by magic, to prove a deliberate purpose on his part to institute a prosecution. That a man of the intelligence of Judge Chase, had he conceived such a project, should have thus jocosely, as is proved, and in public have divulged it, is beyond all belief. Let not a casual conversation of this light and sportive kind be tortured into evidence of a deliberate design. No man, the least acquainted with the general character of Judge Chase, will entertain the idea for a minute.

Another circumstance complained of, is, that Judge Chase was provided with a scored copy of "The Prospect Before Us," and this is adduced to prove his purpose to oppress Callender. But we have given it in testimony that this copy was scored by Mr. Martin, who handed it to the judge, when he was about going to Richmond, to amuse him on the road, and to make such other use of it as he pleased. What was there improper or indecent in this? Further: the respondent is next hunted through a line of stages on his passage from Dumfries to Richmond; and Mr. Triplet is brought forward to prove that he expressed a wish that the damned rascal had been hanged. Had there been a settled purpose to convict or oppress Callender, would it not have been manifested by concealment and prudence, instead of being divulged by such an intemperate impulse of feeling?

We next find the respondent at Richmond. And here a gentleman states that, having moved the court for an injunction, he went to the chambers of Judge Chase on the subject, on the morning subsequent to the motion being made, and before the judge had gone to court; that while he was there,

Mr. David M. Randolph, the marshal, came in, and showed the judge the panel of jurors for the trial of Callender; that the judge asked him whether there were on it any of the creatures called democrats; and added, if there are, strike them off. Here must be some mistake. The witness must have heard some other person say so. Sure I am that the testimony will show that the statement of Mr. Heath cannot be received as correct. I impute no criminal intention to the witness; this is not my habit; but, for ascertaining the weight which it ought to have, I will collect and compare the several parts of the testimony on this point.

It appears that Mr. Heath was at the judge's chambers but once. Mr. Marshall, the clerk of the court, called on Judge Chase the same morning that Mr. Heath was there—he cannot recollect whether Mr. Randolph went with him, according to his usual practice, but he is certain, from a conversation he states, that they walked together to court; he met Mr. Heath either in the act of coming out of the judge's room, or exterior to the door; and he heard no such conversation as he relates. What says Mr. Randolph? That no such conversation ever did take place. Here, then, the testimony is directly opposed. But it is said that our testimony is negative, and is therefore outweighed by the positive testimony of Mr. Heath; this, however, is not the fact. Much of our testimony is positive. Mr. Randolph declares that he has never shown the panel of a jury to a judge, except in the case of a grand jury offered to the court to select a foreman; and he is positive that the panel in the case of Callender was not made out until the morning of the third of July, in court, when his deputies came forward with the names of the jurors they had summoned on small slips of paper; and in corroboration of this evidence, it appears, on the testimony of Mr. Basset, who was sworn on the jury, that he was not summoned until the third of July; and that the marshal sent out his deputies that very morning to summon jurors. We oppose, then, to the simple declaration of Mr. Heath, unaccompanied by other witnesses, the clear and strong evidence of Mr. Randolph, corroborated by that of Mr. Marshall and Mr. Basset.

It does, then, appear to me that none of the alleged facts are so supported as to show an indecent solicitude on the part of the respondent.

It may perhaps be proper to take a general view of the conduct of Judge Chase, after his arrival at Richmond.

The court met on the 22d of May; on the 24th in the morning a presentment was found against Callender; and an indictment late in the day. When Callender was brought into court an application was made for a continuance, on a general affidavit, drawn by Callender. When this was about to be presented, if the judge had been anxious for the conviction of the prisoner would he not have suffered it to be filed, and then said no supplementary affidavit, such is the strict principle of law, can afterwards be received. Instead of taking this course, the judge told the counsel that, if the affidavit were filed it would not be regular to withdraw it; that they had better draw up a special affidavit, and take till to-morrow to consider of it. This was done. A new affidavit was offered. It did not contain grounds for a continuance of the cause to the next term; but the court offered a delay of two, four, and even six weeks; all of which were rejected.

The cause came on for trial on the second of June. Two witnesses summoned had not arrived, and a delay of two hours was prayed for. The court postponed the trial until the next day. The testimony of Colonel Taylor was rejected on account of its illegality, and its not applying to the whole of any one charge; still the judge asked the prosecutor to admit it; and afterwards tells the counsel for the traverser, such is my opinion; but I am a fallible man, I may be mistaken; and if you desire it, you may state your exceptions, and a superior tribunal shall decide—but the offer was not accepted. Callender, in truth, was out of the question; it was not the man, but the cause in defence of which the counsel came forward; their great object was, through an address to the jury, to impress the public mind with the unconstitutionality of the sedition law. So often as they attempted to do this, they were interrupted by the court, and all their sensibility and indignation grew out of this refusal to allow them to argue the constitutionality of the law before the jury to the by-standers.

Carry, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, in your minds these facts, and you will find that the conduct of the respondent was during the whole course of this trial, not only free from criminality, but, in all respects, justified by law and propriety.

Mr. LEE.—May it please this honorable Court: We are now arrived, Mr. President, in the course of the defence, to the fifth article of impeachment. I have, sir, been led to believe, that the present prosecution is brought before this honorable Court as a court of criminal jurisdiction, and that this high Court is bound by the same rules of evidence, the same legal ideas of crime, and the same principles of decision which are observed in the ordinary tribunals of criminal jurisdiction. The articles themselves seem to have been drawn in conformity to this opinion, for they all, except the fifth, charge, in express terms, some criminal intention upon the respondent. This doctrine relative to impeachment is laid down in 4 Black. 259, and in 2 Woodeson, 611. "As to the trial itself, it must of course vary in external ceremony, but it differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments prevail. For impeachments are not framed to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution, where it might be obstructed by the influence of too powerful delinquents, or not easily discerned in the ordinary course of jurisdiction, by reason of the peculiar quality of the alleged crimes. The judgment, therefore, is to be such as is warranted by legal principles and precedents." The Constitution of the United States appears to consider the subject in the same light. By the third section of the third article, "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury;" and by the fourth section of the second article, the nature and extent of the punishment in cases of impeachment is defined. Hence it may be inferred that a person is only impeachable for some criminal offence. With this view, I have examined and re-examined the fifth article of impeachment, to know against what the defence should be made. Looking at it with a legal eye, I find no offence charged to have been committed, and although it may seem strange, it is not the less true, this circumstance has produced the greatest difficulty and embarrassment in what manner the defence should be made.

That this honorable Court may perceive that I have not misapprehended the article, I will pray leave to read it: "And whereas, it is provided by the act of Congress, passed on the twenty-fourth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,' that, 'for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found; and whereas it is proved by the laws of Virginia, that, upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court; yet the said Samuel Chase did, at the court aforesaid, award a capias against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offence not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law, in that case made and provided."

This article charges no evil intention, no offence, no crime, yet the respondent is required to make a defence, and is to address defence to this court as one of criminal jurisdiction.

I do not mean to produce authorities to this high and learned tribunal, to show that a judge cannot be impeached for a mere error of judgment in any instance of his judicial conduct. I wish for none better than those produced by one of the honorable managers of the prosecution (Mr. Clark) to prove this position, 2 Bacon, 97, and Jacobs' Law Dictionary, title Judges. The elegant advocate that has just sat down (Mr. Key) has fully established the same doctrine. If then this be admitted, where or what is the crime charged in the fifth article. The whole charge is, that by authority of the judge a process called a capias was awarded against Callender, when that process ought to have been a summons. It is not alleged that the capias was awarded with any corrupt or evil intention of any kind. If then the article contains no charge of a crime, there must be an acquittal. Upon this point I hope I may be permitted to remind the court of an observation of another of the honorable Managers, who opened the comments upon the evidence for the prosecution (Mr. Early.) He stated, and he stated truly as a general rule of jurisprudence, that if there be no evil intention set forth in the charge and proved, the party accused must be acquitted. With these remarks, if this was an ordinary case before an ordinary tribunal, I might dismiss this part of the accusation, and it may seem scarcely proper to occupy the precious time of this honorable Court, so near the close of its session, in defending the respondent any further against such a charge, but I feel too much respect for the House of Representatives who have preferred this article, and the honorable Managers who support it, not to give it a fuller investigation.

The article may perhaps be understood to produce an important inquiry: the inquiry how far the power of impeachment possessed by the House of Representatives shall extend. Although the Constitution declares that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," yet I trust there is some limit to this power, and that a judge cannot be impeached for a mere legal error in his judicial conduct, when no crime is imputed to him. An impeachment is an accusation of a most serious nature, and the people of the United States have not vested the power of impeachment exclusively in the House of Representatives in Congress, but in their State governments they have established tribunals who are to possess the power of impeachment. I hold in my hand a little book which contains the most valuable matter; it contains the constitutions of the several States. By referring to them we find, in almost every instance, that a power of impeachment may be exercised under the State authority. When, therefore, the doctrine of impeachment is about to be fixed in regard to the limits of the power of impeachment by a judgment of this high and honorable Court, a judgment is about to be given that will be a precedent for the tribunals of the different States. An example is about to be set to the tribunals of the several States, that will influence and direct their decision in the construction of their constitutions relative to the power of impeachment. The words used in some of these instruments are the same, and in others nearly the same with the words in the Constitution of the United States upon this subject.

Is there not some limit to the power of impeachment, a power which we find can be exercised by so many authorities in this country? If there is a limit, what better limit can be set, than that of high crime and misdemeanor in office, as appears by the language of the Constitution to have been intended.

Let us now examine whether Judge Chase, in issuing a capias against Callender after he had been presented for an offence not capital, has been guilty of a high crime or high misdemeanor in office. Surely the Managers should have pointed to the proofs, if any there were, of a corrupt and evil intent with which this act was done. I have already referred to those parts of the Constitution which show that no impeachment can be maintained but for a crime. If the court will turn their attention to the article now under consideration, they will perceive that no crime is charged in express terms, and therefore the accused ought not to be held to answer it; but an idea has been suggested by the honorable Managers, that as the article charges an unlawful act to have been done, a criminal intention must be presumed, unless the respondent shows it to have been innocent. This principle, however true it may be in some cases, is not applicable to the present case. If the act charged be malum in se, the rule of law may be as has been stated, but if the act be malum prohibitum, the rule is otherwise.

In order that the honorable Court may not have the least difficulty on this subject, I will undertake to show that the learned judge acted, in this instance, strictly according to law, and if this be shown there will remain no foundation for the present charge.

It is well established as a general rule of jurisprudence, that a court which has jurisdiction over an offence, may award process concerning it, and compel the party to appear. This may be seen in 2 Hawk. Pleas, ch. 13, sec. 15, 16. The cognizance of offences against the statutes of Congress is vested in the circuit courts of the United States, 1 vol. Laws of U. S., p. 55. From the principle just stated, the circuit court acquired the power of awarding process to compel such offenders to appear in that court when they became vested with a power to try the offence. A presentment or indictment of a grand jury is sufficient evidence to authorize the court to award process against the offender. This is not only the evidence upon which a court usually proceeds, but it is recognised in the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution. We find there a restriction upon the power of the courts; "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, unless by a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, &c;" which restriction carries the implication, that by a presentment or indictment, the party shall be held to answer. If an offender may be held to answer to an accusation in this form, it follows, as a matter of course, that the court is bound to award process to compel him to answer.

I know no process by which a person can be apprehended except by a capias. In the present trial we have heard of a bench warrant, but that too is a capias awarded by a judge sitting in court. In all cases of misdemeanors, where the punishment is by imprisonment or fine, a capias is proper process, according to the practice of the King's Bench in England. For this I refer the court to a passage read at another day from Gilbert's treatise upon the origin of the King's Bench, page 308. So also the doctrine is laid down by Judge Blackstone, in regard to those cases where it is not intended to proceed to outlawry—4 Black. Com. 319.

A capias, therefore, in the case of Callender, was the proper process, according to common law principles, and the English authorities of modern date. In reason and common sense, a capias is the proper process where the offence is punishable by imprisonment, and we all know that Callender was charged with an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment. In such a case, a summons would be a notification to the offender to abscond or remove himself out of the reach of the court.

If any doubt can yet remain as to the propriety of issuing the capias, it will be entirely removed by attending to the laws of the United States. The 14th section of the "act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," gives power to the circuit courts to issue all writs necessary for the exercise of their jurisdiction, and agreeable to the principles and usage of law, and the 11th section of the same act gives exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States to the circuit courts, except otherwise directed by that or some other statute. The court which awards the writ, is to decide what process is necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and agreeable to the principles and usage of law in each particular case.

The 33d section of the same statute contains a great deal of important matter in regard to the present inquiry. "That for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace, or other magistrate of any of the United States where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested, and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States, as by this act has cognizance of the offence: And copies of the process shall be returned as speedily as may be, into the clerk's office of such court, together with the recognisances of the witnesses for their appearance to testify in the case; which recognisances the magistrate, before whom the examination shall be, may require on pain of imprisonment. And if such commitment of the offender, or the witnesses, shall be in a district other than that in which the offence is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of that district where the delinquent is imprisoned, seasonably to issue, and of the marshal of the same district to execute a warrant for the removal of the offender, and the witnesses or either of them, as the case may be, to the district in which the trial is to be had. And upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death, in which cases it shall not be admitted but by the supreme or a circuit court, or by a justice of the supreme court, or a judge of the district court, who shall exercise their discretion therein, regarding the nature and circumstances of the offence, and of the evidence and the usages of law. And if a person committed by a justice of the supreme, or a judge of a district court, for an offence not punishable with death, shall afterwards procure bail, and there be no judge of the United States in the district, to take the same, it may be taken by any judge of the supreme or superior court of law of such State."

Here it is expressly authorized that a judge of the circuit court may order a process for the arrest of the accused for any crime or offence against the United States, agreeably to the usual mode of process of arrest against offenders in the State where the court is holden and the offence committed. A summons is not authorized by the section, because a summons is not a process of arrest. I call upon the learned Managers to point out any other process by which a person can be arrested, even in Virginia, except by a capias. In England, in Virginia, in Maryland, in every State, the process of arrest is by a capias.

There is another statute of Congress on the subject of process, which passed on the second of March, 1793. It contains eight sections, and relates as well to criminal as civil matters. The seventh section is in the words following: "That it shall be lawful for the several courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts, directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of declarations and other pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering up judgment by default, and other matters in the vacation, and otherwise in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States, to regulate the practice of the said courts respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice; and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings."

I know not what language can convey a more complete power to the court over its process, than is given by the passages from the statutes which have been cited. An uniform rule in the courts of the United States is very desirable, that criminals may be brought to trial by the like forms in every State, for violations of the statutes of Congress. To allow one kind of process in Virginia, and a different one in Maryland for the same offence, would be a heterogeneous and unequal mode of administering justice. A construction ought not to be given to the statutes of Congress, which admits of such a system, if it may possibly be avoided. Shall it be said that in one State a man who publishes a libel shall be arrested immediately and brought to trial and punished, while in another State, another person who has committed the same offence, shall be served with a process that shall be notice to him to make his escape: and shall it be said that such a rule shall be applied to cases where imprisonment is part of the punishment? It has been in proof, that in Maryland it is usual to arrest by capias in cases of misdemeanor, and to try the traverser at the same term at which he appears. Are the courts of the United States if sitting on one side of the Potomac, to be governed by one rule, and if sitting on another side of the same river, to be governed by another rule in cases of crime or offence against the laws and Constitution of the United States? It can never have been the intention of Congress that any such variety of proceeding should be allowed in practice, or that the process should be anywhere a summons, in cases of offences which were to be punished by imprisonment.

This can be further illustrated by attention to the laws of Congress, inflicting punishment upon certain crimes, passed in the year 1790. For perjury, for bribery, for obstructing by force the service of legal process, for importing slaves from foreign parts, for violence to an Ambassador and for other offences relative to Ambassadors, the punishment is fine and imprisonment. See 1st vol. Laws of the United States, page 111. The process in all these cases is to be the same; if a capias is proper in one it is proper in all, or if a summons is necessary in one it is necessary in all. Suppose in regard to an Ambassador who has applied to our Secretary of State for the punishment of an individual who may have done violence to his person or one of his family, that a summons shall have been issued to the offender, who should abscond, or remove himself; it would be deemed very strange, perhaps incredible to the Ambassador, if he should be told by our Secretary of State that, the offence being committed in Virginia, it was necessary to summon the party to appear before the court, and instead of obeying the summons he had removed himself entirely, but if the same matter had been prosecuted in Maryland, the offender might have been instantly arrested and punished; the President of the United States regretted that the offender had escaped with impunity, but the escape was according to law. Would not such an explanation be apt to be conceived an affront to the understanding of the Ambassador?

On a former occasion I read a rule of the Supreme Court made in August, 1792, by which the judges declared, "that they considered the practice of the Courts of the King's Bench in England, as affording outlines for the practice of this court, and that they will, from time to time, make such alterations therein as circumstances may render necessary;" and on the same occasion reference was had to the practice of the King's Bench to show that a capias was a proper and usual process. But it is neither necessary nor correct to admit that the rule of the King's Bench in England is absolutely a rule for the circuit courts of the United States. It furnishes a good outline of practice. The true position is, that neither the King's Bench nor the State laws furnish rules to the federal courts in regard to process which are positively binding on them, but these courts are to establish their own rules, under the direction and control of the statutes of the United States.

It is a known and undisputed maxim, that the criminal code of each sovereign State furnishes the rule in prosecutions in the State courts, and is confined to offences against such State. An offence against the commonwealth of Virginia, is not an offence against the United States, and therefore the laws of Virginia which regard offences against itself, will have no effect touching offences against the United States, unless Congress by their express statute has given to them some effect. The laws of Virginia, and of every State, have declared how an offence against such State respectively shall be prosecuted, but they are not to be applied to the circuit court of the United States sitting in such State, and holding cognizance of crimes against the United States. In confirmation of this doctrine, suffer me to avail myself of the opinions of some very distinguished characters in the Virginia Convention which adopted the Constitution. An eminent judge who presided in the highest court of that State for a long space of time, I mean Judge Pendleton, laid it down as too clear to be disputed, that the powers of the federal Judiciary should be co-extensive with the powers of the federal Legislature. In this opinion, Mr. George Mason coincided with that gentleman, although he was opposed to him on almost every other. Of the same opinion was another distinguished member of the convention who now holds the high office of Secretary of State. (3d vol. Virginia Debates, pages 108, 121, 190.)

Unless then Congress has made the laws of each State the rule of process to bring offenders before the circuit courts, those laws do not bind the circuit courts, in this respect, and there will be no foundation for the doctrine, that a circuit court of the United States ought to be governed by the laws of a State in respect to process to bring the party to answer. Where is such a statute of Congress? Not in their statute books, as I humbly conceive, none such has been produced.

The honorable Managers have referred to the thirty-fourth section of the statutes already mentioned, and upon that alone they rely. The words of the section are as follows: "And be it further enacted, that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." We are to take the whole expressions of the section together, and this section is to be considered conjointly with all the other provisions of the statute. It makes the laws of a State the rules of decision in trials at common law where they apply. The laws of the State are to be rules of decision in trials. The process which is awarded to bring in a party to stand his trial, is obviously different from the trial itself: rules of decision in trials, are not rules of process antecedent to the appearance of the party. What is a trial at common law? A trial may be said to begin with empanelling a jury, and to end with the judgment of the court—4 Black. 352. A capias that is issued for the purpose of bringing the party to a trial by arresting his person, cannot therefore be deemed a part of the trial itself. Whether the traverser appears with or without process, is seldom deemed material; it is only after he is brought to answer that his trial can commence.

If the construction contended for by the Managers be admitted, it will make this section militate against the 14th and 33d sections of the same statute, which expressly provides upon the subject of process. Besides, it is unnecessary to give this construction, inasmuch as the statute provides amply respecting the steps preparatory to the trial. The 29th section regulates the mode of summoning a jury. There is no defect in the provisions of the statute which establishes one system that is to prevail everywhere, in regard to matters prior to the trial. Why would Congress provide, in respect to process, as they have done in the 14th and 33d sections, if they meant to adopt the various laws of each State in regard to process, as has been contended by the Managers? Congress has declared what kind of process may be used in the circuit courts, and that process of arrest may be used. Our construction is warranted by the rule of the Supreme Court that has been quoted, which rule was made long after the statute of 1789, and which statute is as obligatory on the Supreme Court, as upon a circuit court. It is also warranted by the judgment of the circuit court in Pennsylvania district, in the case of the United States against the insurgents, determined in the year 1795, before the respondent was elevated to the bench of the Supreme Court. (2 Dal. 340, 341.)

In giving his opinion on the 34th section of the statute, Judge Peters observes, "although in ordinary cases it would be well to accommodate our practice with that of the State, yet the judiciary of the United States should not be fettered and controlled in its operations, by a strict adherence to State regulations and practice. As to the clause in the law of the United States, directing that the laws of the States (with great exceptions) shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, I do not think that it applies to the case before us."

In conformity to the rule of the Supreme Court and the authority of the case just cited, Judge Chase determined that the laws of the State of Virginia, which require a summons to be issued in cases of the Commonwealth, did not apply to the courts of the United States. Why, let me again ask, should this section receive the construction contended for by the honorable Managers? It has been shown that the laws of the United States provide fully in regard to the process to be issued by their courts: that, for the furtherance of justice, such a construction is neither necessary nor convenient, and is inconsistent with other parts of the same statute. It is therefore perfectly correct in the court to bestow no attention upon the laws of Virginia concerning the process to be awarded against Callender. When a presentment was found by the grand jury, it was the duty of the court to act; it was their duty to award a proper process for arresting the offender. This is not only warranted by the principles and reasons already adduced, but is inferrible from various passages of the laws of Congress, particularly from the 19th and 20th sections of the statute passed 30th April, 1790, 1st vol. page 108.

The learned counsel who defended Callender, appear from the testimony to have taken up some improper opinions relative to the criminal code of the United States. The subject was, as they say, new to them, and for this reason let me remark, they might readily have fallen into error. It appears that they had not only thought it was competent for a jury to decide upon the Constitutionality of a law, but also that it belonged to the jury to assess the fine upon the traverser, because a jury has that power by the laws of the State in respect to offences against the State. In the like manner it is erroneously said, in the present prosecution, that the laws of the several States in respect to process, are the rules which should guide the circuit courts of the United States.

I have, sir, endeavored to show in the first place, that there is no charge of criminality stated in the fifth article of impeachment, and therefore the respondent ought to be acquitted. And, in the second place, I have endeavored to satisfy this honorable Court, that the act stated in the article to have been done by Judge Chase, was correct and legal in itself, and if legal, there remains no ground to presume or infer the smallest degree of evil intention. In this point of view he will also stand acquitted.

I will now proceed to make some observations upon the sixth article of impeachment: "And whereas it is provided by the 24th section of the aforesaid act, entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,' that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply; and whereas by the laws of Virginia it is provided, that in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall be made; yet the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial, during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to law in that case made and provided."

The charge in this article against the respondent is in substance that he, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of Callender, ruled him to trial during the term at which he was presented and indicted, contrary to the laws of Virginia, which it is alleged have provided that in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the next succeeding court.

This article it is admitted does contain an accusation of crime; but I hope I shall be able to satisfy this honorable Court, that in this instance no crime or offence was committed. I shall undertake to show that no error in law was committed, and that if the judge had done otherwise he would have been more liable to censure than he now is. If this be made to appear, as a supposed illegality of his conduct is the foundation of the charge, there will remain nothing to support the charge.

The accused judge had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and to administer justice without respect to persons, and to perform all the duties of his office according to the laws of the United States. If in ruling Callender to trial at the same term at which he was indicted, he acted according to law, the judge performed his duty and ought not to be charged with oppression.

The article may be understood as affirming, that there exists some law of Virginia which positively prohibits the trial of a misdemeanor at the same term at which the indictment is found. No such law has been produced, and I must be allowed to deny that any such law of Virginia exists. The act of Assembly of 1788, which provides that "upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons or other proper process against the person or persons offending, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court," appears to have given birth to the idea that an offender may not be tried for a misdemeanor at the same term he is indicted. It however does not warrant the position. When the party appears and answers the presentment, the trial may immediately take place. When the party appears and answers an indictment, the trial may immediately take place, if so ruled by the court, who are vested with a discretion unfettered by any positive statute. The defence of this article may therefore be placed on two grounds, either of which will be sufficient. 1st. There is no law of Virginia which prohibits the trial of a misdemeanor at the same term the indictment is found. And, 2dly. If there be such a law, the same is not binding on the courts of the United States, in respect to offences against the United States.

With respect to the first ground, in addition to what was said, it may be observed, that some instances have been proven before this honorable Court, of trials in the State courts of indictments for misdemeanors, at the same term they were found. Mr. Robertson stated two specific cases where the punishment might be imprisonment. These instances show there can have been no such positive prohibition by the laws of Virginia as the article of impeachment has alleged; however that may be, such a law, and that in the general practice of that State there are some exceptions, or such a general practice would not be obligatory on the courts of the United States, which is the second ground of defence against this charge.

A great deal which has been said in relation to the 5th article, applies with equal force to the article now under discussion.

When the Supreme Court, by their rule of court deliberately formed, declared that the practice of the King's Bench should form outlines for the practice in their court, subject to the alterations they might make, it was reasonable and natural for the circuit court, composed of justices of the Supreme Court, to conduct its business upon the like principle. In the King's Bench, process may be returnable immediately.—Gilbert's origin of King's Bench, page 313; 2 Hawk, ch. 8, sec. 14; 4 Black, 319. And such is the practice if the offence is committed in the county where the court sits; but if the offence is committed in another county, the process may be returned to any day the court will appoint. The object of the court in using its discretion will be to insure the service of the process, and its due return, by allowing sufficient time according to circumstances for that purpose. It is not denied that venire facias is a proper process in cases not capital, but it is not the only process that may be issued. Judge Blackstone, who wrote since Hawkins in the passage cited, declares that a capias is a usual process from the King's Bench, and may be returnable at the pleasure of the court, but that in strictness there ought to be a venire facias where it is intended to proceed to outlawry. In the United States, under the statutes of Congress, there can be no proceeding to outlawry, and therefore the reason for awarding a venire in England does not hold in the United States in regard to prosecutions in their courts. But let the practice of the King's Bench be as it may, it is merely to be used as an outline by our judges who will guide and direct themselves by the statutes of the United States, and will act in conformity to them. When process has been served, and the offender brought into court to answer an indictment already found, it is the duty of the court to proceed to the trial. Such will be shown to be the manifest direction of the laws of the United States. As to the laws of Virginia, it is repeated, there is no Legislative act of that State which fixes positively the time of trying an indictment for a misdemeanor, and if there were, it would not bind the federal court. The time of a trial is not the trial, but a circumstance which, as well as the place of trial, is subject to the laws of the United States.

But it has been said in support of this article, that in England it is not usual, or according to the general course of proceedings, to try petty misdemeanors at the same court that the traverser pleads. For this is cited 4 Black, 351; and it is also said that the practice of Virginia conforms to the practice in England in this instance. Let this be admitted, and what does it avail? The practice that has been mentioned applies only to petty misdemeanors, and the law has always distinguished between petty misdemeanors and those of a greater malignity. The practice does not apply to what are termed crimina majora. Can it be said that such a rule of practice applies to the case of Callender? Was he indicted for a petty misdemeanor? No, sir, he was not. I have long learned to abhor the detestable crime of calumny. A calumniator is the greatest of criminals, and Callender has been the greatest of calumniators. All have agreed in reprobating the wickedness of his calumnies; and ought the honorable judge, who is now answering before you, to have applied the rule of English and Virginia practice concerning petty misdemeanors to such a case as that of Callender? Certainly not.

To place this matter still more clear of doubt, I wish the honorable Court to turn their attention to the Constitution, and to a few clauses of the laws of the United States. The sixth amendment to the Constitution provides, "that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." In the same spirit of speedy justice, a clause in the 33d section of the statute directs, that "copies of the process shall be returned as speedily as may be into the clerk's office of such court, together with the recognisances of the witnesses, for their appearance to testify in the case, which recognisances the magistrate before whom the examination shall be, may require on pain of imprisonment; and if such commitment of the offender or the witnesses shall be in a district other than that in which the offence is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of that district where the delinquent is imprisoned, seasonably to issue, and of the marshal of the same district to execute, a warrant for the removal of the offender and the witnesses, or either of them, as the case may be, to the district in which the trial is to be had. And upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death." &c.

With the same view to a speedy trial, the 7th section of the statute of 2d March, 1793, enacts, "that it shall be lawful for the several courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts, directing the returning of writs and processes, &c., and otherwise in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States to regulate the practice of the said courts respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings." Hence it is evident, that in bringing Callender to trial at the same term at which he was indicted and at which he pleaded, the court obeyed the injunction of the Constitution, and it obeyed the injunction of the laws of the United States.

In cases where bail is requirable to delay, the trial may be used to the oppression of the accused. It is therefore enjoined by the Constitution and by the laws that there shall be no delay. If the honorable judge, who stands accused of trying Callender too soon, had deferred the trial to another term, that is to say six months, and the traverser could not have given bail, he would have been imprisoned six months without a trial. After he was convicted, the sentence of imprisonment pronounced by the same judge was only an imprisonment of about nine months. He had acted, therefore, not only according to law, but with humanity in bringing the traverser to trial at the same term at which he was indicted. If the trial had been postponed to another term, and Callender in the meantime had been imprisoned, such a conduct in the court would have given cause of complaint against the judge, who would then have been accused of postponing the trial of an innocent man, for the purpose of oppression. What in such a case ought the judge to have done? Exactly what he did. Obeying the Constitution and the laws of the United States, he brought the traverser to a speedy and public trial.

It is, may it please the honorable Court, upon these grounds that the respondent stands justified in his conduct, in relation to the charge contained in the sixth article of impeachment.

In the distribution of the articles of impeachment among the counsel of the respondent, he assigned to me the 5th and 6th, and I humbly indulge the hope that the defence which has been made will be deemed satisfactory. But before I conclude, I hope I may be allowed shortly to advert to some of the remarks which have fallen from the honorable Managers in respect to this part of the accusation.

The honorable Managers have attempted to show a difference between a presentment and an indictment, and that until the indictment was found, a capias ought not to have been issued, even if it were lawful to issue it upon an indictment. That there is no such distinction, I appeal to those passages of the acts of Congress to which reference has been already made. I appeal to the reason of the thing and to the nature of a presentment. It is a species of indictment, an informal indictment; it is an accusation of a grand jury. There are cases where it would be improper in a court to wait until a presentment shall be put in the form of an indictment. Circumstances may be such that the offender would escape if process was not issued upon the presentment.

One of the honorable managers charged the respondent with precipitancy in awarding the capias. If this gentleman had recollected the testimony, he would not have made that remark. It was undeniably proved that the respondent inquired of the clerk of the court and of the district attorney, what was the proper process. These officers answered, that a capias was the proper process. Upon such subjects it is usual to inquire of such officers, and their answer is generally deemed sufficient by the courts.

It was in proof, that Judge Chase informed the counsel of Callender they might except to any opinion given by the court, he would sign their bill of exceptions and be the first man to grant a writ of error; this was intended to show, that the respondent had no disposition to injure or oppress the traverser. To obviate any influence of this circumstance favorable to the respondent it was intimated, perhaps asserted by some of the Managers, that no writ of error could be maintained in such a case of criminal prosecution, and that Judge Chase well knew it, and the offer was made merely for a cloak to his injustice and oppression. This idea seemed to be derived from certain opinions of Virginia jurisprudence, and it was attempted to be proved that in Virginia, a writ of error did not lie in a criminal case and had never been granted and sustained in that State in its courts. This however can be and will be readily disproved. Although one of the witnesses, Mr. Hay, did not recollect with precision whether there was any bill of exceptions in the cases concerning the Berkeley clerk, which were carried from the district court into the court of appeals; yet another of the witnesses, Mr. Nicholas, the Attorney General of Virginia, well remembers there was. Until these cases were decided, which happened several years after the trial of Callender, it was the received law of that State for the court of appeals to hold jurisdiction as a court of errors over criminal prosecutions. In support of this doctrine I refer to the case of Newall against the Commonwealth, adjudged in the year 1795.—2 Washington's reports, 88. It was against a magistrate for bribery in his office, and the judgment was reversed with costs. Also I refer to the case of Jones against the Commonwealth, adjudged in the year 1799. 1st Call's Reports, 555. This was an indictment for an assault, and the judgment was reversed. It is true that since the trial of Callender these cases have been overruled, yet as the established law was different at the time of his trial, the offer of the judge to grant a writ of error in the manner which has been proved, ought not to be attributed to any unjust or improper motives.

The learned counsel who spoke last stated the practice in Maryland to be, to award a capias and to try the traverser at the first term at which he pleads. This has been fully proved: As the respondent long presided in the criminal court of Maryland, with honor to himself and great usefulness to his country, it was quite natural for him to follow the like practice in Virginia.

It has been objected that the judge misconducted himself towards the counsel during the trial of Callender in various instances, which it has been argued proceeded from a desire to convict and punish the traverser, howsoever innocent. I will observe with great deference, that if in the opinion of some gentlemen the judge did not act with becoming politeness to the counsel, it is not a high crime or misdemeanor that may be examined or tried in this honorable Court. But I trust upon a view of the circumstances as they have been given in evidence, that this Court will be of opinion that the respondent behaved to the counsel with sufficient propriety. One of the counsel, Mr. Wirt, offered to the court a syllogism, to which the honorable judge promptly replied in a technical phrase of logic, and this excited in the audience some diversion. When another of the counsel, Mr. Nicholas, was speaking on the favorite topic of the right of the jury to consider the constitutionality of the sedition law, he was not interrupted by the judge. But Mr. Nicholas has been proved to have been always civil, always respectful to a court of justice, consequently the court would be civil to him. A third counsel, Mr. Hay, who was extremely desirous, as he has himself testified, to make an oration, not only for the purpose of satisfying the jury but the audience that a jury had a right to judge of the constitutionality of the sedition law, was interrupted by the judge, who denied his position. Mr. Hay had stated other matters during the trial which appeared to the judge to be erroneous. He had stated that a jury in this case of Callender, was the proper tribunal to assess the fine, in which he had been corrected by the court; that one of the jurors, Mr. Bassett, was not qualified to serve, &c. His zeal in the cause of liberty and the Constitution, made him pertinacious in some things which the judge pronounced to be errors. It was no wonder then that such an advocate was stopped and often interrupted by the court. If anything was done amiss by the judge during the trial, it was his desiring Mr. Hay to proceed in his own way, and promising to interrupt him no more let him say what he would; but this circumstance plainly evinces that the interruptions did not arise from corrupt motives. It may truly be said that Judge Chase, in his behaviour to counsel, was "all things to all men." To the logical Mr. Wirt, he was logical; to the polite Mr. Nicholas, he was polite; to the zealous and pertinacious Mr. Hay, he was warm and determined. If the counsel had conducted themselves with propriety towards the court there would have been no interruptions; but when the judge found that the opinions of the bench were slighted, and that the conduct of the bar had a tendency to mislead and influence the public mind against a statute of Congress, he endeavored to turn their sentiments and reasoning into ridicule, and he produced by his wit a considerable degree of meriment at their expense, of which no doubt Colonel John Taylor, who has proved it for the prosecutors, was, from his natural temper, a full partaker.

Mr. President, it is now a very late hour, and I will bring my observations to a close. The articles relative to Fries and Callender have been fully investigated; there is neither uncertainty or doubt as to the facts. I flatter myself that it has been shown that those charges have not been supported by the evidence, and that the impeachment has proceeded from misinformation. If the honorable House of Representatives had known as much as has been disclosed to this honorable Court, they would not have deemed it necessary to have brought forward an impeachment. All must now be satisfied that the information on which the articles are grounded has been derived from mistaken sources, both in regard to fact and law. An aggregate body cannot be better guarded against misinformation than an individual; and I am induced to believe from the known integrity and virtue of the House of Representatives, they will hear with satisfaction, that the evidence which they received was not the same which has been delivered before this honorable Court, and that they will take pleasure in the acquittal of the respondent.

You are now about to set an example in a case of impeachment which will have a most important influence in our country. It will be an example to the tribunals in the several States who like you possess the power of trying impeachments, and who may learn from you by what rules the doctrine of impeachment is to be regulated. It will be a polar star to guide in prosecutions of this kind. You are about to set an example to the ordinary tribunals of justice in every corner of the United States. They will know how this high Court has done justice between the House of Representatives of the American nation and a single individual, and hence they may learn how to do justice to the most weak and friendless individual, when accused in their courts by the most powerful. An upright and independent judiciary is all-important in society.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Let your example be as bright in its justice as it will be extensive in its influence. If the people shall find that their confidential servants, the House of Representatives, have brought forward an accusation against another of their servants for high crimes and misdemeanors in his exalted office, which after a fair and patient hearing has not been supported by evidence, it will afford them pleasure to hear of his honorable acquittal, and such may it please this honorable Court will be, I trust, the result of your deliberations.

SATURDAY, February 23.

Mr. MARTIN.—Mr. President: Did I only appear in defence of a friend, with whom I have been in habits of intimacy for nearly thirty years, I should feel less anxiety on the present occasion, though that circumstance would be a sufficient inducement; but I am, at this time, actuated by superior motives. I consider this cause not only of importance to the respondent and his accusers, but to my fellow-citizens in general, (whose eyes are now fixed upon us,) and to their posterity, for the decision at this time will establish a most important precedent as to future cases of impeachment.

In the discussion of this cause, I fear I shall occupy a greater portion of your time than I could wish, but, as the charges are brought forward by such high authority as the House of Representatives of the United States, it becomes necessary to bestow upon them more attention than they would deserve, were they from a less respectable source.

We have been told by an honorable Manager, (Mr. Campbell,) that the power of trying impeachments was lodged in the Senate with the most perfect propriety; for two reasons—the one, that the person impeached would be tried before those who had given their approbation to his appointment to office. This certainly was not the reason by which the framers of the Constitution were influenced, when they gave this power to the Senate. Who are the officers liable to impeachment? The President, the Vice President, and all civil officers of Government. In the election of the two first, the Senate have no control, either as to nomination or approbation. As to other civil officers, who hold their appointments during good behaviour, it is extremely probable that, though they were approved by one Senate, yet from lapse of time, and the fluctuations of that body, an officer may be impeached before a Senate, not one of whom had sanctioned his appointment, not one of whom, perhaps, had he been nominated after their election, would have given him their sanction.

This, then, could not have been one of the reasons for thus placing the power over these officers. But as a second reason, he assigned, that, if any other inferior tribunal had been entrusted with the trial of impeachments, the members might have an interest in the conviction of an officer, thereby to have him removed in order to obtain his place; but, that no Senator could have such inducement. I, sir, disclaim, I hold in contempt the idea, that the members of any tribunal, would be influenced in their decision by so unworthy—so base a motive; but what is there to prevent this Senate, more than any other court, from being influenced? Is there anything to prevent any member of this Senate, or any of their friends, from being appointed to the office of any person removed by their conviction?

I speak not from any apprehension I have of this honorable Court. In their integrity I have the greatest confidence. I have the greatest confidence they will discharge their duty to my honorable client with uprightness and impartiality. I have only made these observations to show that the reasons assigned by the honorable Manager for vesting the trials of impeachment in the Senate are fallacious.

I see two honorable members of this Court, [Messrs. Dayton and Baldwin,] who were with me in Convention, in 1787, who as well as myself, perfectly know why this power was invested in the Senate. It was because, among all our speculative systems, it was thought this power could no where be more properly placed, or where it would be less likely to be abused. A sentiment, sir, in which I perfectly concurred, and I have no doubt but the event of this trial will show that we could not have better disposed of that power.

Let us now, sir, examine the Constitution on the subject of impeachments, and from thence learn in what cases, and in what only, impeachments will lie. To have correct sentiments on this subject is of infinite importance. An error here would be like what is called an error in the first concoction, and would pervade the whole system.

By the Constitution, it is declared that “the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.” That section, however, does not declare in what cases the power shall be exercised. This is designated in a subsequent part of the Constitution, and I shall contend that the power of impeachment is confined to the persons mentioned in the Constitution, namely, “the President, Vice President, and all other civil officers.”

Will it be pretended, for I have heard such a suggestion, that the House of Representatives have a right to impeach every citizen indiscriminately? For what shall they impeach them? For any criminal act? Is the House of Representatives, then, to constitute a grand jury to receive information of a criminal nature against all our citizens, and thereby to deprive them of a trial by jury? This was never intended by the Constitution?

The President, Vice President, and other civil officers, can only be impeached. They only in that case are deprived of a trial by jury; they, when they accept their offices, accept them on those terms, and, as far as relates to the tenure of their offices, relinquish that privilege; they, therefore, cannot complain. Here, it appears to me, the framers of the Constitution have so expressed themselves as to leave not a single doubt on this subject.

In the first article, section the third, of the Constitution, it is declared that, judgment in all cases of impeachment, shall not extend further than removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States. This clearly evinces, that no persons but those who hold offices are liable to impeachment. They are to lose their offices; and, having misbehaved themselves in such manner as to lose their offices, are, with propriety, to be rendered ineligible thereafter.

The next question of importance, is, in what cases the House of Representatives have a right to impeach the President, the Vice President, and the other civil officers.

It has been said that a judge cannot be indicted for the same crime for which he may be impeached: "for," says the honorable Manager, (Mr. Campbell,) "it would introduce the absurdity that a person might be punished twice for the same crime."

This honorable Court will observe that the two punishments which may here be inflicted on impeachment and subsequent indictment, amount to no more than in England takes place on a single prosecution; for there, on a single conviction, a judge may be removed from office, and also fined, imprisoned, or otherwise punished, according to the nature of his offence. But the whole of this power the United States have not vested in the same body. To the Senate they have confined the punishment of removal from office, and disqualification of the person from holding offices in future; but can there be a single doubt that a person, by impeachment, removed from office, cannot afterward, according to the nature of his crime, be punished by indictment? Can gentlemen suppose a removal from office was intended to wash away all crimes the officer should have committed? What are the crimes for which an officer can be impeached? "Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Suppose a judge removed from office, by impeachment, for treason, would that wash away his guilt? would he not afterwards be liable to be indicted, tried, and punished as a traitor? Undoubtedly he would; so in the case of bribery. Yet, if the gentleman's idea is correct, a removal from office, on impeachment, for either of those crimes, would free the officer from any other punishment. Consider the monstrous consequences which would result from the principle suggested by the Managers, that a judge is only removable from office on account of crimes committed by him as a judge, and not for those for which he would be punishable as a private individual! A judge, then, might break open his neighbor's house and steal his goods; he might be a common receiver of stolen goods; for these crimes he might be indicted, convicted, and punished, in a court of law; but yet he could not be removed from office, because the offence was not committed by him in his judicial capacity, and because he could not be punished twice for the same offence.

The truth is, the framers of the Constitution, for many reasons, which influenced them, did not think proper to place the officers of Government in the power of the two branches of the Legislature, further than the tenure of their office. Nor did they choose to permit the tenure of their offices to depend upon the passions or prejudices of jurors. The very clause in the Constitution, of itself, shows that it was intended the persons impeached and removed from office might still be indicted and punished for the same offence, else the provision would have been not only nugatory, but a reflection on the enlightened body who framed the Constitution; since no person ever could have dreamed that a conviction on impeachment and a removal from office, in consequence, for one offence, could prevent the same person from being indicted and punished for another and different offence.

I shall now proceed in the inquiry, for what can the President, Vice President, or other civil officers, and, consequently, for what can a judge be impeached? And I shall contend that it must be for an indictable offence. The words of the Constitution are, "that they shall be liable to impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

There can be no doubt but that treason and bribery are indictable offences. We have only to inquire, then, what is meant by high crimes and misdemeanors? What is the true meaning of the word "crime?" It is the breach of some law, which renders the person who violates it liable to punishment. There can be no crime committed where no such law is violated. The honorable gentleman to whom I before alluded, has cited the new edition of Jacob's Law Dictionary; let us, then, look into that authority for the true meaning of the word "misdemeanor." He tells us

"Misdemesnor, or misdemeanor, a crime less than felony. The term 'misdemeanor' is generally used in contradistinction to felony, and comprehends all indictable offences, which do not amount to felony, as perjury, libels, conspiracies, assaults," &c. See 4 Comm. c. 1, p. 5,

"A crime or misdemeanor, says Blackstone, is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it. This general definition comprehends both crimes and misdemeanors, which, properly speaking, are mere synonymous terms, though, in common usage, the word 'crimes' is made use of to denote such offences as are of a deeper and more atrocious dye; while smaller faults, and omissions of less consequence, are comprised under the gentle name of misdemeanors only.

"In making the distinction between public wrongs and private, between crimes and misdemeanors, and civil injuries, the same author observes, that public wrongs, or crimes and misdemeanors, are a breach and violation of the public rights and duties due to the whole community, considered as a community in its social, aggregate capacity." 4 Comm. 5.

Thus, it appears, crimes and misdemeanors are the violation of a law, exposing the person to punishment, and are used in contradistinction to those breaches of law, which are mere private injuries, and only entitle the injured to a civil remedy.

Blackstone's Commentaries, 4th vol. page 5th. is cited by Jacob, and is as there stated. I shall not turn to it. Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, volume first, in his Premium, which is not pagged, speaking of the division of crimes, says:

"Temporal crimes, which are offences against the laws of this realm, whether the common law or acts of Parliament, are divided into two general ranks or distributions in respect to the punishments that are by law appointed for them, or in respect to their nature or degree; and thus they may be divided into capital offences, or offences only criminal, or rather, and more properly, into felonies and misdemeanors. And the same distribution is to be made touching misdemeanors, namely, they are, such as are so by the common law, or such as are specially made punishable, as misdemeanors, by acts of Parliament."

Thus, then, it appears that crimes and misdemeanors are generally used as synonymous expressions, except that "crimes" is a word frequently used for higher offences. But, while I contend that a judge cannot be impeached except for a crime or misdemeanor, I also contend that there are many crimes and misdemeanors for which a judge ought not to be impeached, unless immediately relating to his judicial conduct. Let us suppose a judge, provoked by insolence, should strike a person; this certainly would be an indictable, but not an impeachable offence. The offence for which a judge is liable to impeachment must not only be a crime or misdemeanor, but a high crime or misdemeanor. The word "crime," as distinguished from misdemeanor, is applied to offences of a more aggravated nature, the word "high," therefore, must certainly equally apply to misdemeanors as to crimes. Nay, sir, I am ready to go further, and say, there may be instances of very high crimes and misdemeanors, for which an officer ought not to be impeached, and removed from office; the crimes ought to be such as relate to his office, or which tend to cover the person who committed them with turpitude and infamy; such as show there can be no dependance on that integrity and honor which will secure the performance of his official duties.

But we have been told, and the authority of the State of Pennsylvania has been cited, by one honorable Manager (Mr. Rodney) in support of the position that a judge may be impeached, convicted, and removed from office, for that which is not indictable, for that which is not a violation of any law.

What, sir! can a judge be impeached and deprived of office, when he has done nothing which the laws of his country prohibited? Is not deprivation of office a punishment? Can there be punishment inflicted where there is no crime? Suppose the House of Representatives to impeach, for conduct not criminal; the Senate to convict, does that change the law? No, the law can only be changed by a bill brought forward by one House in a certain manner, assented to by the other, and approved by the President. Impeachment and conviction cannot change the law, and make that punishable which was not before criminal.

It is true, it often happens that the good of the community requires that the laws should be passed, making criminal and exposing to punishment conduct, which, antecedently, was not punishable; but, even in those cases, Government has no power to punish acts antecedently done; it can only punish those acts done after the enactment of the law. The Constitution has declared, "no ex post facto law shall be passed."

Should such a principle be once admitted or adopted, could the officers of Government ever know how to proceed? Admit that the House of Representatives have a right to impeach for acts which are not contrary to law, and that thereon the Senate may convict, and the officer be removed, you leave your judges, and all your other officers, at the mercy of the prevailing party. You will place them much in the unhappy situation as were the people of England during the contest between the white and red roses, while the doctrine of constructive treasons prevailed. They must be the tools or the victims of the victorious party.

I speak not, sir, with a view to censure the principles or the conduct of any party which has prevailed in the United States since our Revolution, but I wish to bring home to your feelings what may happen at a future time. In republican Governments there ever have been, there ever will be, a conflict of parties. Must an officer, for instance a judge, ever be in favor of the ruling party, whether wrong or right? Or, looking forward to the triumph of the minority, must he, however improper their views, act with them? Neither the one conduct nor the other is to be supposed but from a total dereliction of principle. Shall, then, a judge, by honestly performing his duty, and very possibly thereby offending both parties, be made the victim of the one or the other, or perhaps of each, as they have power? No, sir, I conceive that a judge should always consider himself safe while he violates no law, while he conscientiously discharges his duty, whomever he may displease thereby.

But an honorable Manager (Mr. Campbell) has read to us an authority to prove that a judge cannot, in England, be proceeded against by indictment for violation of his official duties but only in Parliament, or by impeachment; his authority was the new edition of Jacob's Law Dictionary. Let me be indulged with reading to this honorable Court the case from 12 Coke, the case of Floyd and Barker, to which Jacob refers, and it will be found that the reasons there assigned, however correct they might be as to judges in England, can have no possible application to the judges of the United States.

"It was resolved that the said Barker who was judge of assize, and gave judgment on the verdict upon the said W. P., and the sheriff who did execute him according to the said judgment, nor the justices of peace who did examine the offender, and the witnesses for proof of the murder before the judgment, were not to be drawn in question, in the Star Chamber, for any conspiracy; nor any witness, nor any other person ought to be charged with conspiracy in the Star Chamber, or elsewhere, when the party indicted is convicted or attaint of murder or felony, and although the offender upon the indictment was acquitted, yet the judge, be he judge of assize, or a justice of peace, or any other judge, by commission, and of record, and sworn to do justice, cannot be charged for conspiracy for that which he did openly in court as judge or justice of peace; and the law will not admit any proof against this vehement and violent presumption of law, that a justice, sworn to do justice, will do injustice, but if he hath conspired before, out of court, this is extra-judicial, but due examination of causes out of the court, and inquiring by testimony, and similar, is not any conspiracy, for this he ought to do; but subornation of witnesses, and false and malicious prosecutors, out of court, to such whom he knows will be indictors, to find any guilty, &c., amounts to an unlawful conspiracy.

Trial of Judge Chase.

"And as a judge shall not be drawn in question in the cases aforesaid, at the suit of the parties, no more shall he be charged in the said cases before any other judge at the suit of the King.

"And the reason and cause why a judge, for anything done by him as a judge, by the authority which the King (concerning his justice) shall not be drawn in question before any other judge, for any surmise of corruption, except before the King himself, is for this; the King himself is de jure to deliver justice to all his subjects; and for this, that he himself cannot do it to all persons, he delegates his power to his judges, who have the custody and guard of the King's oath.

"And forasmuch as this concerns the honor and conscience of the King, there is great reason that the King himself shall take account of it, and no other."

But, even in England, it has been solemnly determined, that judges may be proceeded against by indictment for the violation of the laws in their official conduct, for which I refer this honorable Court to Viner's abridgment, 14th vol. page 579. (F) pl. 3, and in notes, where he says:

"A justice cannot raise a record, nor imbecile it, nor file an indictment which is not found, nor give judgment of death where the law does not give it, but if he doth this it is misprision, and he shall lose his office, and shall make fine for misprision." In the note "Brooke, Corone pl. 173 cites 2 R. 3, 9, 10, S. C. and P. and that he shall be indicted and arraigned."

And that to Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, chap. 69, sec. 6, where that author tells us:

"It is said that, at common law, bribery in a judge, in relation to a cause depending before him, was looked upon as an offence of so heinous a nature, that it was sometimes punished as high treason, before the 25th Edward III., and at this day it certainly is a very high offence, and punishable, not only with the forfeiture of the offender's office of justice, but also with fine and imprisonment," &c.

Mr. President, the principle I have endeavored to establish is, that no judge or other officer can, under the Constitution of the United States, be removed from office but by impeachment, and for the violation of some law, which violation must be, not simply a crime or misdemeanor, but a high crime or misdemeanor.

But an honorable Manager, (Mr. Rodney,) who has this morning referred to some authorities, as to other parts of the case, has also contested the correctness of the foregoing principle, and has introduced the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, by which he has told us, a judge may, by the Governor, be removed from office, without the commission of any offence, upon the vote of two-thirds of the two Houses for his removal; notwithstanding that constitution has a similar provision for removal by impeachment as has the Constitution of the United States. To this I answer, as we have no such provision in the Constitution of the United States, the reverse is to be inferred, to wit, that the people of the United States, from whom the Constitution emanated, did not intend their judges should be removed, however obnoxious they might be to any part or to the whole of the Legislature, unless they were guilty of some high crime or misdemeanor, and then only by impeachment. It is also well known, that the Governor of Pennsylvania has not considered those words in the constitution of that State, "that he may remove the judges on such address," as being imperative. For, in a recent instance, where he did receive such address, instead of admitting the construction to be, as was contended, "you must," he determined it to be "I will not," and I have had the pleasure of seeing that judge, some time since that transaction, on the bench with his brethren dispensing justice. I again repeat, that as the framers of the Constitution of the United States did not insert in their Constitution such a clause as is inserted in the constitution of Pennsylvania, it is the strongest proof that they did not mean a judge or other officer should be displaced by an address of any portion of the Legislature, but only according to the Constitutional provisions.

The same gentleman (Mr. Rodney) has told us that the tenure by which a judge holds his office is good behaviour, therefore that he is removable for misbehaviour; and, further, that misbehaviour and misdemeanor are synonymous and co-extensive. Here I perfectly agree with the honorable gentleman, and join issue with him. Misbehaviour and misdemeanor are words equally extensive and correlative; to misbehave or to misdeemean is precisely the same; and, as I have shown that to misdeemean, or, in other words, to be guilty of a misdemeanor, is a violation of some law punishable, so, of course, misbehaviour must be the violation of a similar law.

The same honorable gentleman has mentioned the impeachment and conviction of Judge Addison, and has told us that he was not impeached for the breach of any law, but only for rude or unpolite conduct to his brother judge; that this objection was made with much energy on his defence, but that the Senate were convinced, by the great talents and eloquence of Mr. Dallas, and some other gentlemen, that the objection was groundless; they, therefore, convicted and removed him. I have not here the proceedings against Judge Addison, and, therefore, it is possible that the Senate of Pennsylvania erected themselves into a court of honor to punish what they might consider breaches of politeness; but does this honorable Court sit here to take its precedents from the State of Pennsylvania or any other State, however respectable? I should rather hope that this honorable Court should furnish precedents which might be respected and adopted by the different States. I would also ask, when was that precedent established? Was it not at a time when there is too much reason to believe that the warmth and violence of party had more influence in it than justice; and that the Senate of Pennsylvania overleaped their constitutional limits? But if we are to go to Pennsylvania for a precedent, why should we not be guided by that which the same State has so recently given us in a trial in which that gentleman bore so conspicuous a part? a precedent of acquittal; a precedent which we are perfectly willing should be adopted, and which we trust will be adopted, on the present occasion.

My observations thus far have been principally with a view to establish the true construction of our Constitution, as relates to the doctrine of impeachment. I now, Mr. President, will proceed to the particular case before this honorable Court; and, in the first place, I agree with the honorable Managers, that there is a manifest difference even between the credibility of witnesses, and the credibility of testimony, for, I admit, if witnesses are equally credible, and some swear that words were uttered, or acts were done, and others, that they did not hear the words, or that they did not see the acts done, the presumption is certainly in favor of the positive, and against the negative testimony. But this must be admitted with considerable restrictions.

If, immediately after a transaction, there is a full and clear memory of the words spoken, or the acts done, there is great reason to credit the testimony; but, even in that case, if there are a number of persons equally respectable, having equal opportunity to hear and see, and who were attentive to what took place, and none of them heard or saw what is testified by a single witness, there would be great reason to suspect the affirmative witness to be mistaken; more so if the transactions had happened for some years antecedent to the examination.

But, as to Heath, we do not contradict him merely by negative testimony; we contradict him by a series of positive facts which my honorable colleague (Mr. Key) has detailed, proved by characters, whose veracity cannot be doubted, which positive facts incontestably show that what he swore never could have taken place. And, here again, permit me sir, to make a further observation, that, where a person is charged criminally for words he is supposed to have uttered, those words ought to be proved with precision. Every witness on this occasion, who hath been examined as to expressions used by my honorable client, either on the one or the other charge, which are held as exceptionable, declares he cannot pretend to recollect the express words uttered by the judge, but only to state what at this distance of time he can consider the amount of what was said. Nay, Messrs.

Lewis and Dallas declare further, that they cannot pretend to say with accuracy, what part of the conversation, of which they give testimony, took place on the first or the second day, or in what order. Such kind of testimony, therefore, ought to be received with great caution, and not to be considered as conclusive. On this subject I will trouble this honorable Court with a passage, from McNally's Treatise on Evidence, page 518.

"It is no evidence in a criminal case, that the defendant said so and so, or in other words to the like effect, because the court must know the very words to judge of their force and effect.—2 Hawk. ca. 46.

"And the reason of this rule is, that of words spoken, there can be no tenor, that is transcript, for there is no original to compare them with, as there is of words written: and though there have been attempts to plead a tenor of words spoken, it has never been allowed. And therefore if a plaintiff declares for words spoken, a variance, in the omission or addition of a word, is not material, and it is sufficient, if so many of the words be proved and found as are in themselves actionable.—12 Vin. abr. 68. pl. 46.

"So in Hussey vs. Cooke, Easter, 18. Jac. 1. in the Star Chamber. The court held, that if a witness depose that a defendant did persuade a juror to appear and to do him reasonable favor, or words to the like effect, this is no sufficient proof in criminals, because the court must know the very words to judge of their force and effect.—Hob. 294. Fos. 200. 1 Hale, p. 6. 111. Kel. 14.

"Hale, Coke, and Foster, fully justify the principle of this rule. Foster says, as to mere words supposed to be treasonable, they differ widely from writings in point of real malignity, and proper evidence. They are always liable to great misconstruction from the ignorance or inattention of the hearers, and too often from a motive truly criminal. And therefore I choose to adhere to the rule which hath been laid down on more occasions than one since the Revolution, that loose words to any actor or design are not overt acts of treason.—Fost. 200.

"Keyling says, I see no difference between words spoken. Foster answers, the difference appeareth to me to be very great, and lieth here. Seditious writings are permanent things, and if published, they scatter the poison far and wide. They are acts of deliberation, capable of satisfactory proof, and not ordinarily liable to misconstruction; at least they are submitted to the judgment of the court, naked and undisguised as they come out of the author's hands. Words are transient and fleeting as the wind, the poison they scatter is at worst confined to the narrow circle of a few hearers: they are frequently the effect of sudden transport, easily misunderstood and often misrepeated.—Keyling 13. Fos. 200.

"The suppression of a word or syllable may change the sense; so the change of an emphasis. So words spoken in exclamation, conveying by sound and gesture surprise and abhorrence, may be represented in evidence as spoken blasphemously or seditiously."

Sir Michael Foster, a judge whose worth has seldom been equalled, perhaps never surpassed, and who has so correctly observed, that a popular judge, that is, one who in his decisions seeks after popularity, was one of the most contemptible beings in the world, is referred to as an authority.

This principle equally applies, where a person is charged criminally on account of words spoken, whether the offence is supposed to be treason, or only misdemeanor; the case referred to in Hobart. page 294, is an authority in point; it is true, this case was determined in the Star Chamber, but being determined in favor of the person accused, it becomes an higher authority—Star Chamber cases are only complained of on account of their oppression.

I will now, Mr. President, proceed to consider the conduct of my honorable client on the trial of Fries, and to examine the law upon that case, and of course to investigate the rights of judges, in criminal cases, as well as the rights of attorneys. I do not mean to go minutely into the testimony, which has been given in that case; but, taking it up on that given by Messrs. Lewis and Dallas, to examine whether the court is to control the counsel, or be mere cyphers, destitute of authority to restrain and keep within bounds the lawyers when acting improperly. The whole of the practice, of which I have heard during this trial, as being usual in the courts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, hath been to me at least as novel as the conduct of Judge Chase appears to have been to the honorable managers. I, sir, have always considered it the province of the court in the course of a trial in all cases, whether civil or criminal, to declare what is the law. This right is admitted in civil cases, but, it seems, is denied in criminal. And therefore, it is contended, that in criminal cases counsel have a right to address the jury upon the law, and to urge them to determine the law in contradiction to the decision of the court. How doth the jury acquire the power of deciding the law in any case? Because, upon the general issue, having a right to give a general verdict, which involves both law and fact, the jury incidentally have the power to decide the law. But this doth not authorize them to give a verdict contrary to law. When a case comes before a jury, the court informs them what is the law, if they believe the facts given in evidence. If they do believe the facts they are bound in duty to decide according to the law thus explained to them by the court. The decision ought to be the same as if the facts had been found by the jury in a special verdict, and the law left to the court. The jury, I admit, have the power to decide the law contrary to the direction of the court, but I deny that they have a right to do it. No person will deny that it is much more proper for the court to decide the law than that it should depend upon jurors, who in general are ignorant of the law. In civil cases, a jury sometimes give a verdict contrary to the direction of the court, but the court correct this abuse of power by interposing and granting a new trial, thereby correcting the evils which would result from such abuse.

Let us then examine this question as to criminal cases. Is it not as important to society that there should be uniform and fixed principles for the decision in criminal as in civil cases? Would it not be highly improper that one man should be convicted for a crime, and another, who had committed the same, be acquitted, merely from the passions, prejudices, or ignorance of jurors, influenced thereby to decide the law differently in the different cases, though perfectly similar in criminality? No person can doubt on this subject.

Where, then, is the difference between the civil and criminal cases? It is not that the jury have a greater right to decide the law in the last than in the first; but that, having the power to give a general verdict, which, incidentally, involves the law, they may give a verdict contrary to law, and contrary to the direction of the court; and the courts of justice, not having in criminal cases, through tenderness, enforced the remedy of a new trial, the abuse of power, thus practised in some cases by juries, have been uncorrected. No person can doubt but that juries, in criminal as well as in civil cases, ought to give their verdict according to law, and, whenever they do not, they are answerable to their consciences and to their God, however they may be exempt from human punishment.

The right of the court to decide the law, is the same in criminal as in civil cases. If there is a demurrer to an indictment, the court decides without the intervention of a jury. If there is a demurrer to evidence, the court decides the law. So, if a special verdict is found, which may be found in a criminal as well as in a civil suit.

The power of the jury, as I have before said, to decide against law, doth not give them the right, any more than the power of a person to knock down a man weaker than himself, gives him the right so to do. And, if juries, in any case, knowingly give a verdict contrary to law, instead of acting impartially—which is the duty of a jury—they act with criminal partiality.

So great is the difference of sentiment between the honorable Managers and some of the witnesses who have been examined in this trial, and myself, upon the right of juries to decide the law in criminal cases, that, in confirmation of my own sentiments, and to convince this honorable Court I do not wish to impose upon them, I hope I shall be indulged in reading to them a very respectable authority upon this subject. It will be found in Co. Lit. 155, as follows:

"The most usual trial of matters of fact, is, by twelve such men; for, ad questionem facti non respondent iudices; and matters in law the judges ought to decide and discuss; for, ad questionem juris non respondent juratores."

Upon this is the following note:

"This decantatum, as Lord Chief Justice Vaughan calls it, on account of its frequency in the books, about the respective provinces of judge and jury, hath, since Lord Coke's time, become the subject of very heated controversy, especially on prosecutions for State libels; some aiming to render the juries wholly dependent on the judge for matters of law, and others contending for nearly a complete and unqualified independence."

"In respect to my own ideas on this subject, (says Mr. Hargrave,) they are at present to this effect: On the one hand, as the jury may, as often as they think fit, find a general verdict, I therefore think it unquestionable, that they so far may decide upon the law as well as fact, such a verdict necessarily involving both.

Trial of Judge Chase.

In this I have the authority of Littleton himself, who writes, that, if the inquest will take upon them the knowledge of the law upon the matter, they may give their verdict generally.

"But on the other hand I think it seems clear, that questions of law generally and more properly belong to the judges; and that, exclusively of the fitness of having the law expounded by those who are trained to the knowledge of it by long study and practice, this appears from various considerations.

"1st. If the parties litigating, agree in their facts, the cause can never go to a jury, but is tried on a demurrer; it being a rule, and I believe without exception, that issues in law are ever determined by the judges, and only issues of fact are tried by a jury.

"2d. Even when an issue in fact is joined, and comes before a jury for trial, either party, by demurring to evidence, which includes an admission of the fact to which the evidence applies, may so far draw the cause from the cognizance of the jury, for in that case the law is reserved for the decision of the court from which the issue of the fact comes, and the jury is either discharged, or at the utmost only ascertains the damages.

"3d. The jury is supposed to be so inadequate to finding out the law, that it is incumbent upon the judge who presides at the trial, to inform them what the law is; and, as a check to the judge in the discharge of this duty, either party may, under the statute of Westminster, the 2d. C. 31., make his exception in writing to the judge's direction, and enforce its being made a part of the record, so as afterwards to found error upon it.

"4th. The jury is ever at liberty to give a special verdict, the nature of which is to find the fact at large, and leave the conclusion of law to the judges of the court from which the issue comes. Formerly indeed it was doubted, whether in certain cases in which the issue was of very limited and restrained kind, the jury was not bound to find a general verdict. But the contrary was settled in Dowman's case, 9. Coke, 11. b., and the rule now holds both in criminal and civil cases without exception.

"5th. Whilst attaints, which still subsist in law, were in use, it was hazardous in a jury to find a general verdict where the case was doubtful, and they were apprized of it by the judges, because if they mistook the law, they were in danger of an attaint.

"6th. If the jury find the facts specially, and add their conclusion as to the law, it is nothing binding on judges, but they have a right to control the verdict, and declare the law as they conceive it to be.

"7th. The courts have long exercised the power of granting new trials in civil cases where the jury find against that, which the judge trying the cause, or the court at large, holds to be law; or where the jury find a general verdict, and the court conceives that on account of difficulty of law there ought to have been a special one. Though too in criminal and penal cases, the judges do not claim such a discretion against persons acquitted, the reason I presume is in respect of the rule that nemo bis punitur aut vexatur pro eodem delicto, or the hardship which would arise from allowing a person to be put twice in jeopardy for one offence, and if this be so, it only shows that on that account, an exception is made to a general rule. Upon the whole, as my mind is affected with this interesting subject the result is, that the immediate and direct right of deciding upon questions of law, is entrusted to the judges; that in a jury it is only incidental; that in the exercise of this incidental right the latter are not only placed under the superintendence of the former, but are in some degree controllable by them; and, therefore, that in all points of law, arising on a trial, juries ought to show the most respectful deference to the advice and recommendation of judges. In favor of this conclusion, the conduct of the juries bears ample testimony; for to their honor it should be remembered, that the examples of their resisting the advice of a judge, in points of law, are rare, except where they have been provoked into such an opposition by the grossness of his own misconduct, or betrayed into an unjust suspicion of his integrity by the misrepresentations and ill practices of others. In civil cases, particularly where the title to real property is in question, juries almost universally find a special verdict as often as the judge recommends their so doing; and, though in criminal cases special verdicts are not frequent, it is not from any averseness to them in juries, but from the nature of criminal causes, which generally depend more upon the evidence of facts than any difficulty of law. Nor is it any small merit in this arrangement, that in consequence of it, every person accused of a civil crime, is enabled by the general plea of not guilty, to have the benefit of a trial, in which the judge and jury are a check upon each other; and that this benefit may be always enjoyed, except in such small offences as are left to the summary jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, which exception, from the necessity of the times, is continually increasing, but which, however, cannot be too cautiously extended to new objects. Thus considered, the distinction between the office of judge and jury seems to claim our utmost respect. May this wise distribution of power between the two, long continue to flourish, unspoiled either by the proud encroachments of ill designing judges, or the wild presumption of licentious juries."

In this prayer I most cordially join, and, with the learned commentator, hope that this wise distribution of power may long continue to flourish unimpaired either by the proud encroachments of ill designing judges, or the wild presumption of licentious jurors. Such as I have here stated, I consider the principles of the English law, and to these principles I cheerfully subscribe.

But the principles adopted on this impeachment, and advocated, as I understand, by the honorable Managers, appear to me to have a direct tendency to break down every barrier between the province of the court and the jury, giving everything to the latter and nothing to the former; and so far from placing them or the counsel under the direction and control of the court, prohibit the court from restraining either the jury or the counsel, under the danger of impeachment. I differ with them. If in any case the law is known to be settled by a uniformity of decisions, a court of justice degrades itself if it permits counsel to take up their time in arguing against it. If the question is not considered as fully settled, counsel certainly ought to be heard, but it is to the court they ought to address themselves. In England the first lawyers who have ever existed, have not thought themselves degraded by arguing the law in criminal as well as in civil cases, before the court. If counsel should attempt to impose on the jury what is not law, is the court to sit tamely by, and suffer them to proceed? Such has not been the practice in the courts which I have attended. Where the law is known to be settled, or where, upon application to the court, a determination is given, the endeavor to distinguish his case, and show that it counsel must go before the jury upon the fact, and doth not come within the law as established; for should counsel attempt to state anything to the jury, which appears designed to controvert the law as declared, they are immediately stopped by the court, and to persist would be considered highly indecorous, nor would the court permit it to be done. In Maryland the lawyers do not claim, as a Constitutional right, to mislead and deceive the judges, much less to mislead and deceive the jurors, free from any control of the court.

But it has been said that juries are most proper to decide the law in criminal cases, thereby to prevent a criminal from being borne down and oppressed by the weight of the prosecuting power. What case can arise in this country, to which this argument can apply? In England, before the Revolution, while judges were dependent on the Crown, if, also, wicked and corrupt, there might, where Government was interested, be some such cases. But is our situation to be compared to that of England, at that time? If so, it was not worth while for us to have taken upon ourselves the risks of the late Revolution to have changed our Government.

Is there anything to induce judges to oppress any individual even though offensive to the Government, while they are independent? Any danger of that kind is to be apprehended from judges who are dependent.

And hence flowed the great Constitutional provision, which secures the independence of the judges, which secures them from being removed or punished while they discharge their duty.

What probability is there that a judge would do injustice to any person with a view to please any party, when he could have but very little prospect of reward, and would be sure that though he did his duty he could not be removed from office or exposed to injury?

I wish this honorable Court to reflect on the nature of man. In a Government like ours, there will always be majorities and minorities. Minorities will often be powerful, and frequently in due time become majorities. If a judge should do an act pleasing to a majority, he must know it may render him hateful to the minority, who, in course of events, may get the power in their hands. If he endeavors to ingratiate himself with the minority, he exposes himself to the displeasure of the ruling majority. It is the duty of a judge to enforce the laws, while they exist, however unpopular those laws may be to any portion of the community. If he enforces such laws, he will gain the approbation of one party, but he will as certainly be disapproved by the other. Would you then wish that your judges should be exposed to be removed from office because, by the most honest conduct, they had displeased one party or the other, and leave them at the mercy of those who should from time to time hold the power of Government in their own hands? No, it is the sacred independence of the Judiciary, and that alone, which can be the best security that the judges shall not act with oppression.

But let me ask, further, are juries more free from undue influence than judges? Have they greater inducements to do what is right? They do not possess the elevated situation of the judges, they feel not the same responsibility; whatever may be the impropriety of their conduct, it would probably be scarcely heard of out of their own neighborhood, not long even there. They are liable to all the political prejudices of men devoted to the different parties which may exist. They are generally men totally ignorant of the law; nay, I shall prove when I come to speak of Basset's case, that though the Managers contend the jury should decide the law, yet ignorance of the law is by them considered the first recommendation of, nay, a necessary requisite for a juror!

Can it then be wise to reduce a judge to the humiliating situation of having the law decided by such a body, exposed to be led into error by the ingenuity of counsel? Can it be the wish of this Court to trust their property, their lives, all that is most dear to them, even as to the legal questions, to the wild ideas of jurors, liable to all the frailties of human nature, in preference to the sound discretion of judges well skilled in the law, and holding a high and responsible station?

Having laid down these general principles as to the relative rights and duties of the court, the bar, and the jury, I shall proceed with my honorable client to the State of Pennsylvania.

It was known that John Fries, charged with treason, had, on a former trial, been found guilty, and that a new trial had been granted upon a suggestion, which I hope will not become a precedent; will never be a rule for decisions. When I say this, I mean not to detract from the merit of that highly respectable character who presided, and who granted the new trial. His conduct flowed, I am convinced, from his humanity; his was the error of the heart, not of the head. It was an honest, nay, an amiable error. My honorable client knew, when he arrived at Philadelphia, that the trial of Fries was to take place that term. He has been acknowledged by the honorable Managers, to be a gentleman of the highest legal talents. In this they have only done him justice; and have been as prodigal of their praise as his warmest friends could have wished. It would have given me great pleasure if they had been as just in expressing their sense of his integrity. He had been in the practice of the law for forty years, and also a judge for a number of years, and for about six years, I believe, presided in the criminal court of Baltimore county, where, during that time, there were more criminal trials probably than in any other court in America. I believe I speak moderately, when I say that I have attended on behalf of the State, at least five thousand criminal trials in that court. From those circumstances it is to be presumed that he was not deficient in knowledge of what related to criminal proceedings, but would he have acted the part of an upright judge, if he had not endeavored to make himself master of the law of treason, when a case of that nature was about to come before him ; particularly the law of treason, as it related to levying war against the United States, or in adhering to those who levied war against them, which is the only kind of treason that our Constitution acknowledges ; although I have heard, I must own, of treason against the principles of the Constitution, and treason against the sovereignty of the people—words well enough suited to a popular harangue, or a newspaper essay, but not for a court of justice.

When Judge Chase arrived at Philadelphia he had the advantage of perusing the notes of Judge Peters and the District Attorney, relating to the former trial ; he thereby became well acquainted with all the points at that time made by the counsel for Fries ; and Mr. Lewis has sworn, that all the points which were intended to have been made before Judge Chase had been made at the former trial. Why then should the court either wish, or be obliged to hear counsel again on the law ? In two previous cases the law had been settled. Judge Paterson, a gentleman of the first abilities, mild and amiable, whom no person will charge with being of a vindictive, oppressive disposition, and who certainly has more suavity of manners than my honorable client had, after a most patient and full hearing, where eminent counsel attended, decided the law as it was decided by the respondent. Judge Iredell, whose encomium has been most justly given us by the Managers, a gentleman of great legal talents, than whom no worthier man has left this for a better world ; and who, while living, honored me with his friendship, after having heard Messrs. Lewis and Dallas, and after full and patient investigation, gave, in the case of Fries himself, a similar decision ; in both which opinions Judge Peters perfectly coincided. Under these circumstances, Judge Chase, who had no doubt of the propriety of those decisions, to prevent waste of time when there was so much business to transact, and to facilitate the business, thought it best to inform the counsel on each side, that the court considered the law to be settled, and in what manner. For which purpose they delivered to the clerk three copies of their opinion, one for the counsel on each side, the third to be given to the jury, when they left the bar. On this subject, Mr. Lewis, in his testimony, said it was to be given to the jury when the counsel of the United States had opened, or after he had closed the pleadings, but he believed the last. Mr. Rawle is clear that it was to be given to them, when the case was finished, to take out with them.

No gentleman on behalf of the impeachment has denied the correctness of this opinion. But the criminality of the judge, is, we are told, not in the opinion itself, but in the manner and the time in which it was given.

Was there anything improper that the opinion should be reduced to writing ? Why are opinions given ? Surely to regulate the conduct of those to whom given ; for this purpose they ought to be perfectly understood, and in no degree subject to misconception ; delivering the opinion, in writing, greatly facilitates these objects ; if therefore it was proper to give an opinion, it was meritorious to reduce it to writing, and Judge Chase, in so doing, most certainly acted with the strictest propriety. And, unless a court of justice is bound to sit and hear counsel on points of law, where they themselves have no doubts, before they give their opinion, my honorable client could not be incorrect in delivering it at the time when it was delivered. If the opinion was proper, how, I pray, could any injury be done to Fries by its being delivered ? The honorable Managers say, it was intended to influence the jury. In the first place, this assertion is not supported by the evidence. When the paper was thrown on the clerk's table, not one word was said of its contents ; nor did the court declare any opinion on Fries case. They only determined the indictment correct in point of form, and not liable to be quashed. They determined that the overt acts stated were overt acts of treason, if Fries had committed them, but whether Fries had committed those acts remained for the jury to determine upon the evidence ; as to that part of the case the court gave no opinion. But the honorable Managers have told us that Judge Chase must have known what were the facts in the case, because they had been disclosed in the former trial. And I pray you, sir, if he had the knowledge, could it alter the law in the case, or render the declaration of what the law was, more improper ? But, as a new trial was granted, the judge could not know what additional evidence might be brought forward to vary the case from its former appearance.

Nor did, sir, the judge's conduct, either improperly influence, nor was it intended so to influence, the jury. No copy of the opinion would have been taken but for the conduct of Mr. Lewis, and no testimony has been offered to show the least probability that one single jurymen ever saw the copy, or knew one word of its contents. Nay, sir, it is proved, that Judge Chase took uncommon pains to prevent any of the jurors from being prejudiced against Fries ; for, although a great number of criminals, indicted for sedition, submitted to the court before Fries was put upon his trial, the judge would not permit one single witness, who was summoned against Fries, to be examined on the submissions, lest the jury, by an examination which would have been, as to Fries, ex parte, might take up prejudices against him. This, Mr. President, was an act of the judge that carries with it the most convincing proof, that he had no wish to oppress Fries, or to prevent him from having an impartial trial : and I pray that this circumstance may be deeply impressed on the mind of every member of this honorable Court.

But if the opinion had been publicly read and known, how could it have injured Fries ? He was to have an impartial trial. What is the meaning of these expressions ? It is a trial according to law and fact, in which, if he is proved innocent, he shall be acquitted ; if guilty, convicted. If, then the opinion was agreeable to law, it could not prevent, it could not interfere with his having an impartial trial. If in any case a person is acquitted, when the facts are clearly proved, and the law is against him; it must be because he has had a partial, not an impartial trial.

I again ask, sir, ought the court, who were perfectly satisfied with respect to the law, and who considered it settled by previous decisions, in which they perfectly concurred, to have wasted perhaps several days of the public time before they gave their opinion, in listening to Messrs Lewis and Dallas, exerting all the powers of eloquence and of sophistry to mislead their judgment? Nor did even Judge Chase give his opinion without the full consideration of the arguments of each of these gentlemen in the very case of Fries. On his arrival, it is admitted by the Managers, that he became perfectly acquainted with the proceedings in the former trial, as to the legal questions which had occurred, from the notes of Judge Peters and of the District Attorney; and this honorable Court have had an opportunity of witnessing with what precision that gentleman takes down the substance of proceedings on a trial. Judge Chase had an opportunity of examining and considering the arguments used by Messrs. Lewis and Dallas, at the former trial, on the different legal questions then brought forward, the authorities produced, and the applicability of those authorities. He there saw everything that the great legal knowledge and high talents of those gentlemen, indulged to the utmost extent and heard with the greatest patience, had produced in favor of Fries. And he had the opportunity of calmly and deliberately considering the whole of these arguments and authorities in his chamber. And having done this, where would be the propriety of spending day after day in listening to the same arguments orally repeated in court, which he had read in his closet, the merit of which he had there coolly discussed, and deliberately decided?

But the Managers say that this ought to have been done. That, though the court had no doubt of the law, and although it is not contended but that the opinion given is correct, yet it was the duty of the court to have patiently listened to the counsel, and suffered them to exert all their eloquence, their ingenuity and sophistry, to pervert their judgment, and lead them into error, to prevail over their understanding, and obtain from them an erroneous opinion. And yet in the same breath we are told, by one of the honorable Managers, (Mr. Campbell,) that if a judge gives an erroneous opinion, the presumption is that he doth it from corrupt and criminal motives: and that on impeachment, it is necessary that he should prove the uprightness and integrity of his intentions.

Thus, then, they insist, that if a judge, intelligent, sensible, well acquainted with the law, doth not indulge counsel in their attempt to lead him into error, he is to be impeached for it. And, if the judge should listen to counsel against his well formed opinion, and, by their ingenuity, be led to give up his better judgment, and pronounce an erroneous opinion, he is to be impeached for that also?

pletely the law is considered to be settled, the more absolutely necessary it is that the criminal's counsel should be permitted to argue the law to the court, and to contend against the law so settled. Thus, then, I suppose, if a person is tried for an assault and battery, the prisoner's counsel must be indulged by the court, and that under pain of impeachment, in spending as much time as they please, in endeavoring to convince the court, that, to come up behind an innocent, inoffensive man, and fracture his skull with a bludgeon, doth not amount to an assault and battery; or, if a person is tried for a burglary, his counsel must also, under the same penalty, be indulged in the endeavor to convince the court, that to break into a dwelling-house in the night time, and steal therefrom, is not the offence of burglary.

But the honorable Managers do not stop even here. They say that even had Judge Chase indulged the counsel of Fries with all the length of time they might think proper, in an endeavor to pervert the judgment of the court, and their endeavor had proved unsuccessful, the court was further under pain of impeachment, after they had correctly declared the law to the jury, to suffer the counsel to take up as much more time as they pleased in endeavoring to mislead the jury, by impudently and insolently, in the face of the court, attempting to impress them with the idea that the court, though acting under a solemn oath, and having no interest to mislead them, had given an erroneous opinion; and, to induce them to receive the law from the counsel themselves, acting not under similar obligations, but whose fame and whose fortunes might be materially benefited by deceiving the jury—from counsel whose every interest might be to pervert justice.

All which indulgence, the court, it seems, is also equally bound to give to the counsel in endeavoring to mislead the jury, and pervert justice, in the cases I have before mentioned, of assault and battery, or burglary, or, in reality, of any other offence, however incontestable the principles of law in such cases may be. Such are the Constitutional rights which criminals and their counsel, we are told, possess—the Constitutional right, if possible, to impose upon the court—and, if they fail there, the Constitutional right to impose upon the jury; in other words, the Constitutional right to pervert justice!

Nay, we are told the more manifest the guilt, the more indisputably criminal the offender is, the more necessary that he should enjoy these Constitutional rights; and so it would be if the Constitution intended, as seems to be the idea of the Managers, that guilt should go unpunished; since such offenders can have no chance to escape unless justice be perverted, through the ingenuity of counsel operating upon the ignorance, the passions, or the prejudices of judges or jurors.

The Managers have, consistent with the above idea, which they seem to have adopted, exclaimed, "what good could counsel do to Fries after the court had decided the law? As to the facts there was no dispute. Under such circumstances, to assign counsel to him was mockery, was insult."

Trial of Judge Chase.

In reply, I will admit that Fries's case was such that counsel could not render him much service, but this was not the fault of the court, it was the fault of the case itself, it was because the law was clearly against him, and because the evidence indisputably proved that he had committed acts which brought him within the law.

In such cases, what is the duty of the counsel, whether assigned by the court or employed by the prisoner? It is to advise the prisoner to plead guilty, and throw himself upon the mercy of his country, instead of taking up the time of the court, and creating expense by a jury trial; but such advice, however agreeable to the Constitution of our country, would not, I admit, agree very well with the constitution of a lawyer, as thereby he might occasionally lose large fees extorted from a criminal, fed on a vain hope that the eloquence and chicanery of his lawyer might procure his acquittal, contrary to law and contrary to evidence.

But counsel may be of service to a criminal however guilty he may be, and has duties which he may correctly perform. The counsel may with propriety avail themselves of any defect in the indictment or other proceedings; they may take care that the panel of jurors are legally and impartially returned; they may direct the prisoner as to his challenges to jurors; they may take care that no incompetent witnesses are sworn, and that no improper testimony is given; they may, in any questions of law not considered settled, be heard, and have the questions decided; in fine, they may take care that the prisoner has a fair trial; but, when all this has been done, if agreeably to law and clear undoubted evidence, the prisoner is guilty, it is the duty of the counsel to submit his client's case to the honest decision of the jury, without any attempt to mislead them; and this, whether the counsel are appointed by the court or employed by the criminal. Thus lawyers in Maryland are in the habit of conducting themselves in such cases, and thus ought lawyers who respect themselves, and have a regard for their own characters, to conduct themselves in all places.

I have heard so much, Mr. President, in this case about the Constitutional rights of criminals to have counsel; and that the counsel should argue to the jury upon the true construction of the law, against the direction of the court; and that the jury have the right to decide the law without regard to such direction; and finding, also, that this article of impeachment, as well as the arguments in support of it, appear to be grounded on these principles, that I had been almost induced to suppose I had mis-read the eighth amended article of the Constitution; but, on turning to it, I find that the Constitution secures to the criminal the assistance of counsel, to see that his trial is fairly and correctly conducted, but has not given to the person charged with an offence, or to his counsel, if he is guilty, any Constitutional rights for the purpose of his evading punishment by the imposition of counsel either on the judge or the jury.

Whatever may have been the practice, I have ever considered it contrary to the duty of counsel, either in civil or criminal cases, to exert their abilities in attempting to procure a decision which they are conscious is unjust. The duty of a lawyer is, most certainly, in every case to exert himself in procuring justice to be done to his client, but not to support him in injustice.

Having made these observations on the relative duties of the court and counsel, let me advert a moment to the conduct of Mr. Lewis, as appears from his own testimony. When my honorable client delivered at the clerk's table the copy of the opinion designed for the defendant's counsel, having taken it in his hand—without opening it, without reading one word—Mr. Lewis contemptuously threw it from him, publicly declaring that he “would never contaminate his hand by receiving into it a prejudicated opinion in any cause where he was concerned, from any judge whatever.” What insolence! Would to God no lawyer may ever contaminate his hand in a more disgraceful manner, than by receiving therein a sensible, correct, legal opinion, in a cause about to be tried, at whatever time it may be delivered to him!

He also informs us, that he declared to the court that he never had, nor ever would so far degrade himself as a lawyer, as to argue a question on law, in a criminal case, before the court. What arrogance! Sir, the most eminent, the most respectable lawyers both in England and America, have been in the constant habit not only of arguing questions of law in criminal cases before the court, but in modestly submitting to their decisions, without ever considering it as lessening their consequence. I have long been at a loss, sir, for the enmity the State of Pennsylvania has shown for its bar, and the desire of its citizens to get rid of their lawyers; but if such is the manner in which the lawyers conduct themselves to their courts, if they, when they are employed in a cause, claim the Constitutional right, uncontrolled by the court, instead of furthering justice, to pervert it, I wonder no longer why the citizens of that State wish to be freed from them, and will readily join in the sentiment, “the sooner the better.” I will go further, and say if their courts submit to such conduct, and think themselves bound to be the passive witnesses of such perversion of justice, it is not much matter how soon they also get rid of their courts, for they might as well be without them.

The principles which have been advocated in support of this article, are subversive of the whole order of things; instead of lawyers being the officers of the court, subject to their control, and amenable for the propriety of their conduct, the judges must be the menial, degraded instruments of the lawyers, and must suit their conduct, not to propriety and justice, but to the pleasure of any haughty, overbearing lawyer possessing abilities and popularity, and that too under the hazard of being impeached, and turned out of office if his principles should, on any occasion, render him restive, or, in the language of the testimony, if he should “take the stud.”

And here, Mr. President, I hope I shall be indulged with some inquiry as to this "prejudicated opinion," which Mr. Lewis seems to think has such a contaminating, polluting tendency to the hand of a lawyer, and of which he was so apprehensive, that he would not retain it for a moment. I confess I feel myself here at a loss to know exactly what the witness meant by a "prejudicated opinion" on the law. I should suppose that the expression, if it can in any instance be correctly applied, must mean the same as to prejudge the law; which if used to signify anything improper, must be confined to the case where a person forms an erroneous opinion of the law, without using all due means to acquire correct information.

To prejudge any case, I consider as meaning, that a person without competent knowledge of facts, hath formed an opinion injurious to the merits of the case. If the term "prejudication" is used in this sense, there is no pretence that my honorable client gave a prejudicated opinion in the case of Fries; for it is not alleged that the opinion given was not strictly legal and correct; neither Mr. Lewis nor Mr. Dallas have ever attempted to hazard their characters by suggesting the contrary, nor have the honorable Managers taken that ground; they do not contest its propriety. Should they, in their reply, I shall cheerfully rest that question upon the well known legal abilities of Judges Iredell, Paterson, my honorable client, the associate judges who concurred with them, and the legal knowledge of this honorable Court.

But if by a prejudicated opinion, is meant that the judge, from his great legal knowledge, and familiar acquaintance with the law as relative to the doctrine of treason, particularly levying war against the United States, had formed a clear, decided opinion that the facts stated in the indictment against Fries, if proved, as laid, amounted to treason, I will readily allow that I have no doubt my honorable client had thus prejudicated the law, not only before Fries was brought to trial, but before he had committed the treason for which he was tried. But if this manner of prejudicating law is thought improper, nay, criminal, in a judge, a prejudication which is nothing more than an eminent and correct knowledge of the law, why, I pray, are gentlemen of great talents and high legal attainments sought for in your appointments of judges? How, sir, are they to free themselves from this obnoxious prejudication of the law and acquire the contended fitness for the trial of a cause, but by forgetting all that legal knowledge which had been a principal inducement to their appointment? If I understand the gentlemen, to gratify their ideas we ought to have judges, who, when they take their seats on the bench to preside at the trial of a criminal, should not have one single legal idea relative to the offence about to be tried, but should have their minds exactly in that state in which some ingenious metaphysicians tell us the human soul is, when first united to the body, like a pure, unsullied sheet of white paper, ready to receive any impressions which may be made upon it.

Well, be it so, and let us consider the trial of Fries as if it had been conducted on that principle. The judges, with their minds like this white sheet of paper, were to sit still and suffer the counsel to scrawl thereon whatever characters they pleased, to blot and to blur it until they were perfectly satisfied. After this ceremony, the judges, examining the impressions thus made upon the antecedent clean sheet, were from these, and these only, to form their opinion of the law; and this opinion, having been thus formed from nothing but what occurred during the trial, and after the jury were sworn, would not be called a prejudicated opinion, and therefore, I presume, would be perfectly satisfactory to the honorable Managers. So far we should have done very well as it related to the trial of Fries. But next day another criminal is to be tried for a similar offence; Messrs Lewis and Dallas are not his defenders. Getman has selected Mr. Tilghman for his counsel. How, I pray you, are the judges to be qualified to preside with propriety in this trial? Yesterday they gave a solemn determination in Fries's case upon the same question of law which now must come forward in the case of Getman. Mr. Tilghman was not then heard. The opinion then given is, as to Mr. Tilghman and his client, as much a prejudicated opinion, an opinion as contaminating to the hands of a lawyer to receive, and as highly criminal for a court to give, as was the opinion given by my honorable client. What can be done? The minds of the judges are no longer a pure, unsullied sheet of paper. Yesterday, in the trial of Fries, they had been scrawled upon and sullied by Lewis and Dallas; the impressions still remain. I, sir, can think of no remedy in this difficulty, except that the judges should be supplied with a reasonable quantity of India rubber, or something which will answer in its place, with which they might wipe off and erase every impression which had been made the day before by Lewis and Dallas, during the trial of Fries; and thus once more take their seats on the bench for the trial of Getman, with minds again like clean sheets of white paper, ready to be again scrawled over, again to be blotted and blurred at the pleasure of Mr. Tilghman, and from these scrawls, blots and blurs, and from these alone, to take their impressions as to the law, and form their decision as to Getman's case, without regarding, or even remembering the decision they had given the day before; and in this manner to proceed in every case that might come before them successively in their judicial capacity.

If, sir, judges are to be censured for possessing legal talents, for being correctly acquainted with the law in criminal cases, and for not suffering themselves to be insulted, and the public time wasted, by being obliged to hear arguments of counsel upon questions which have been repeatedly decided, and on which they have no doubt; I pray you let not our courts of justice be disgraced, nor gentlemen of legal talents and abilities be degraded by placing them on the bench under such humiliating circumstances! But let us go to the corn-fields, to the tobacco plantations, and there take our judges from the plough and hoe. We shall there find men enough possessed of what seems to be thought the first requisite of a judge, a total ignorance of the law! That degradation which no gentleman of merit and abilities could endure they will not feel.

In reply to an observation made by my very respectable colleague who opened our defence, and which I have endeavored to enforce, "that, if the opinion given by the court was correct, Fries could receive no injury thereby, though Messrs. Lewis and Dallas had not been suffered to argue against that opinion, because the opinion ought, notwithstanding, to have been the same;" one of the honorable Managers has said, that had Judge Chase sentenced Fries to death without the verdict of a jury; had he decided the fact as well as the law, and he says he might have done the one with as much propriety as the other, it might have been urged in the same manner in defence of the judge, "that it was of no consequence to Fries, for the fact being clearly against him, had he been tried by a jury, the jury must have found him guilty, and then the judge must have done what he did, sentence him to death."

This argument is totally fallacious. By the Constitution and laws of the United States, the criminal has a right to demand that the facts shall be decided by a jury. This the court cannot refuse if the criminal requires it. Was a judge to refuse the criminal the trial of the fact by a jury, he would violate a well known legal and Constitutional right of the criminal. But as the criminal has a right that the jury should determine questions of fact, so do the principles of jurisprudence equally declare it to be the right of the court to decide questions of law, and the Constitution in no part contravenes this right; it nowhere says that the judges must be ignorant of the law, and take their impressions from the counsel of the criminal, or that it is the right of counsel to be heard where the court has no doubt of the law, or to argue to the jury that the law is contrary to the direction of the court, or that the jury should have a right to decide the law contrary to such direction. Hence, therefore, there is this great distinction between the two cases; in the first the court only exercise their own rights, infringing no right of the criminal; while in the last, the court would act in direct violation of his well-known legal and Constitutional rights. But though the criminal has the Constitutional right to have all facts decided by a jury, he may waive this right, in which case the court may pass sentence without the intervention of a jury; as where the criminal demurs to the indictment, and rests upon his demurrer, or where he pleads guilty, in which cases the court, without the intervention of a jury, proceed to pass sentence according to law and the nature of the offence.

In the opening of our defence, it has also been urged, that if there was any impropriety in the conduct of the court respecting the trial of Fries, on the first day, it was amply compensated by the conduct of the court on the second day, in having called in the written opinions, and the copies which had been taken, and given the counsel liberty to proceed in such manner as they should think proper.

In answer to this the honorable Managers have replied that it was then too late. The mischief that had been done the first day was irretrievable; the sin that day committed was inexpiable; Nay, one of the Managers has told us that the excuse is as absurd, as would be the excuse of a person who, having thrown a firebrand into combustibles, and set the whole neighborhood in a blaze, should attempt to excuse himself by saying "he had again got into his possession, and extinguished the brand with which he had enkindled the fire, although the conflagration was still extending, and consuming everything before it"—a most happy simile.

But let us examine wherein the mischief was so irretrievable—the sin so inexpiable. Neither more nor less than in this: that as the written opinion only contained the impressions on the minds of the judges, the destruction of that written opinion would not prevent the same impressions remaining on their minds, and those impressions would be as difficult to remove after the opinions were called in as before. It is all very true; but how came the judges to have on their minds those impressions? Not from having committed them to paper, but from their correct knowledge of the law. And how were those impressions to be removed? Certainly by no means, unless that correct knowledge of the law could also be removed. To accomplish which, I know of no means that could be used, unless the judges could have been supplied with a quantity of our India rubber, or with a few barrels of the water of Lethe, with the one to rub out and efface from their minds all their legal knowledge, or by copious draughts of the other to wash it away. But, sir, I have not made, nor shall I make any use of the proceedings of the second day as an excuse for any impropriety of the court on the first; I only consider them as incontestable proofs, that the court had no other object in view, on either of those days, than conscientiously to discharge their duty by giving Fries a fair and impartial trial; that if he was guilty, he might be punished; if innocent, acquitted. I deny that the court was guilty on the first day of any impropriety; I take higher ground, and have contended, and do contend, that the conduct of the court on the first day was correct and proper, and during the whole trial I find nothing improper in their conduct, except their almost humilatingly soliciting the counsel of Fries to do their duty, instead of committing them to jail for the impropriety of their conduct, which the court ought to have done; but even in this the court has afforded the strongest proof of their solicitude that Fries should have every legal and Constitutional benefit of counsel at his trial.

Reflect, also, that at the time when Mr. Lewis thus contemptuously dashed from his pure hand the contaminating opinion, he had not read a single word, nor received the least intimation of its contents; nor did he know its contents until long after, and yet he instantly formed the determination not to appear for Fries, and to advise their client not to accept the assignment of any other counsel should the court offer it. Whence this conduct? How did he know the opinion was not favorable to his client? His conscience told him it was not. His own great legal knowledge confirmed to him the truth. He well knew the law; he was acquainted with the correct decisions which had been before given. He well knew the great legal knowledge of the judge, who on this occasion presided; he was certain my honorable client could not but concur with his brethren. He acknowledges they had no hope to change the opinion of the court, and that they had not the vanity to suppose the jury would, under their influence, decide the law contrary to what the court should direct; therefore that they had no hopes of the acquittal of their client by the jury on the trial, whatever services they were permitted to render him, and therefore, as the only chance which they had to save his forfeit life, they assumed that line of conduct which has been disclosed in the evidence. When Mr. Lewis, in giving his testimony, mentioned, "Judge Peters asked us on the next day whether 'if the court had got into a scrape the first day, 'the counsel would not let the court get out of 'it.'" "No," said Mr. Lewis, "we were determined not to let them get out of it, as the only means to save our client's life;" and in the conclusion of his testimony he repeated that they were actuated in their conduct, from considering it the only chance they had to save the life of their client, and not from any other motive. And Mr. Dallas also observed in his testimony, that when the court on the second day pressed them to continue their services as counsel of Fries they refused, determined not to depart from the policy they had adopted, and to withdraw, as the most probable means of benefiting their client.

I shall conclude what relates to this article by observing, that the conduct of Fries's counsel to the court on that trial was such as nothing can excuse. It can only be palliated by the reflection, that for his crimes he was liable to suffer death. Feelings of humanity and compassion, independent of interest, might excite in their bosoms an earnest anxiety to save his life, this may serve to mitigate censure; but even those feelings, however amiable, ought not to be gratified at the expense of national justice, nor by an endeavor to stamp upon judges of uprightness and integrity the dishonorable charge of partiality and oppression. I fear, sir, I have been tedious on this article; but it will be considered that, whatever may be my own sentiments of the futility of any part of these charges, I cannot determine how far this honorable Court may correspond with me in sentiment; nor can I do otherwise than treat, as of consequence, any charge brought forward by the honorable House of Representatives, or not consider it as being of importance.

I will now, Mr. President, proceed to those articles which arise out of the trial in Virginia; and I find it stated in the beginning of the second article that my honorable client went there prompted by the same shameful spirit of persecution and injustice, the truth of which I am ready to acknowledge, after having satisfactorily proved that at Philadelphia he had not shown in any manner whatever a spirit of persecution and injustice, but had acted with uprightness and integrity; and that his greatest fault on that occasion was, that he did not commit the counsel of Fries to the public jail for their insolent, their arrogant, their contemptuous behaviour to the court; and I flatter myself that I shall be able to show that my honorable client acted with the same uprightness and integrity in the case of Callender as I have shown he acted in the case of Fries.

The second article goes on to charge Judge Chase with overruling the objection of John Basset, who wished to be excused from serving on the jury in the trial of Callender, and causing him to be sworn, and to serve on the said jury by whose verdict Callender was convicted.

This article requires a discussion of the law relating to challenges of jurors, and whether Mr. Basset was legally sworn on that jury. And here again, as well as in the case of Fries, I meet with the most perfect novelties, for except in those trials I never heard of jurors, when called to be sworn, examined on oath whether they had formed, or formed or delivered, or whether they had formed and delivered an opinion on the subject about to be tried. And here also let me observe that there is no just grounds for the charge that Judge Chase from partiality administered the oath differently in Callender's case from the manner in which he administered it to the jurors in the case of Fries; for Mr. Rawle, referring to his notes taken at the time, has told us that in the case of Fries, one or two of the first jurors were only asked whether they had formed an opinion, after which the question was put, whether he had formed or delivered an opinion, but ultimately the question asked was, whether they had formed and delivered an opinion, which question was put to the greater part of the jurors; so that the interrogatory ultimately fixed upon in the case of Fries is the same which was put to all the jurors who were interrogated in the case of Callender.

I have, Mr. President, been in the practice of the law for thirty years. Before the Revolution I attended, two or three years, the two counties on the Eastern Shore of Virginia—Sussex county in Delaware, and Somerset and Worcester in Maryland; since the Revolution I have constantly attended the general courts on the Western and Eastern Shores of Maryland, and the civil and criminal courts of Baltimore county, and for about six years several other counties in Maryland. In the whole course of my practice, I have never known a single case, either civil or criminal, in which the jurors have been, when called to the book, demanded to answer upon oath either of the aforesaid questions which the defendant's counsel requested to be put to them.

Trial of Judge Chase.

If either party choose to challenge a juror for favor, on account of declarations made by the juror, the only ground for it is that he has used expressions showing his determination to decide for one party or the other without regard to truth and justice. In which case the party makes his objection to the particular juror specifying the expressions uttered by the juror indicative of such improper determination, and produces witnesses to establish his objection; for the juror cannot be examined on oath to substantiate the charge; and, unless by mutual consent, the objection made must be decided, not by the court, but by triers. And the only matter to be decided is, whether the juror has made any declaration of a design to give a verdict one way or the other, whether right or wrong; for if the juror made the declarations from his knowledge of the facts in the case, this would be no cause of challenge, nor any objection to his being sworn on the jury. And as the juror himself against whom such objection is made cannot be examined on oath, it follows, of course, he cannot be challenged for having formed an opinion, but only for having delivered it, as third persons cannot know of an opinion being formed but by its having been delivered. And, as I have observed already, even the delivery of an opinion is no cause of challenge, if it appears to have been founded upon the juror's knowledge of facts, and not from partiality. In consequence of this principle of law, it can be no objection against a juror being sworn, even though he should have the most perfect knowledge of every fact relative to the issue, to try which he is about to be sworn; on the contrary, the principal reason assigned why trials ought to be by jurors from the vicinage, is the presumption that they will be best acquainted with the facts which will be put in issue for their decision.

Suppose a person, summoned as a juror to try an indictment for assault and battery, or any other offence, had seen the offence committed and perfectly knew the offender, it would be no cause of challenge against the juror, nor could he for that reason be rejected at the trial; on the contrary, the law considers him the better qualified to serve in that case as a juror, in consequence of that knowledge. If, in the instance I have put, such juryman had declared that the criminal had committed an assault and battery, and that he was determined to find him guilty, this declaration being founded on the knowledge of the juror as to the truth of the case would be no ground for challenge; to support a challenge, the juror must show an intention to act partially, through favor or malice. It is, therefore, no objection to a person serving as a juror because he is also a witness.

And so far is it from being the case that a juryman's knowledge of the law, or his having declared his opinion of the law arising in the case to be tried, should be a cause of challenge, that, if two or more persons are indicted in the same indictment for the same offence, and one is tried and convicted, a juryman, who served on that trial, may be sworn on the subsequent trial of the other person joined in the indictment, and cannot be challenged, although as to the law arising in the case he had not only declared his opinion, but even declared it on oath in the former trial. So, also, is the case of a judge, whether he is to decide the law only, as in jury trials, or the law and fact both, as here in the case of impeachments; his knowledge of the facts in the cause is no objection to his acting as a judge, and he may be called on to give testimony, and yet give his decision in his judicial capacity. In support of these principles, in addition to the authorities adduced by my very respectable colleague, (Mr. Key,) I will trouble this honorable Court with Brookes's Abridgment, title Challenge, pl. 90, where he says: "It is a cause of challenge to the favor if the juror has declared that should he be empanelled he would give a verdict for the plaintiff."

This authority shows that a declaration, as I have contended, must have been made; but I shall now also show that, as I have before stated, the declaration must be made from motives of partiality, that is, from favor or ill will, to the one or the other party. For this purpose I will read 2d Hawkins, chapter 43, section 28: "It hath been allowed a good cause of challenge on the part of the prisoner that the juror hath declared his opinion beforehand, that the party is guilty, or will be hanged, or the like. Yet it hath been adjudged that if it shall appear that the juror made such declaration from his knowledge of the cause, and not out of any ill will to the party, it is no cause of challenge." This doctrine is as old as the seventh of Henry VI.; during whose reign it was determined that though a juror had said twenty times that if he was sworn he would give his verdict for one of the parties, yet, if he said this from the knowledge which he had of the matter in dispute, and the truth of the case, such juror was indifferent; but, if he said this from any affection to the party, the juror in that case was favorable, and thus Judge Babington directed the triers. See Brookes's Abridgment, title Challenge, pl. 55.

In Viner's Abridgment, vol. 21, p. 266, we find the same principle recognised. It is there stated that "if a juror says twenty times that he will pass for the one party, this is not a principal challenge, for it may be that he speaks it for the notice which he has of the thing in issue, and not for affection." A decision in the seventh of Henry VI., and another in the twentieth of the same King are referred to; and the authority from Brooke, Challenge, pl. 55, before mentioned, is in the note introduced with approbation.

In 2 Hawkins, chapter 43, section 29, we find in confirmation of the positions I have taken, the law thus declared: "It hath been adjudged to be no good cause of challenge, that the juror hath found other persons guilty on the same indictment, for the indictment is in the judgment of law several against each defendant, for one must be convicted by particular evidence against himself." The same principle is established by the decisions in vol. 4, State Trials, pages 141 and 175, (which he turned to and read.) Volume 2, State

Trial of Judge Chase.

Trials, 255, 256, also show that, though a person is a witness in the cause, it is no reason he should not serve as a juror, and also the knowledge which a juror may have of the case to be tried by him, is no disqualification. It also shows how questions of this nature are to be tried.

And to prove that the knowledge of the facts to be decided doth not in any degree interfere with the right of a judge to decide in the case, and that any member of this honorable Court might be sworn as a witness, and yet give his decision in the cause. I will read an authority from State Trials, vol. 2, page 632, where Lord Stafford, on his trial, puts this question to the court. "If I shall name any of the House of Lords as my witnesses, can that exempt them from being judges?" The answer given by the Lord High Steward was, "No, my Lord, if your Lordship has any witnesses among my Lords here, they may well testify for you, and yet remain in the capacity of your judges, for my Lord of Strafford had a great many witnesses, who were Peers."

Thus, though in this instance the judges had to decide both the law and the fact, the knowledge of any one of them in no respect formed an objection to his deciding as a judge.

I have said, also, that a juror cannot be examined on oath to prove that he has made any declaration which would be a good cause to challenge him for favor. To support this position, I will trouble the honorable Court with two authorities. The first from Leitch's edition of Hawkins, 2d vol., page 589, in the note. In the text it is mentioned as a cause of challenge, "that a juror hath said the prisoner is guilty, or will be hanged, or the like," &c. In the note it is stated that the prisoner shall not examine a juror, concerning such matter, on a voir dire, because it sounds in reproach.

The second, from Cooke's case, 1 Salk. 153, where it appears that Cooke, being indicted for high treason, offered to ask the jurors when called, in order to challenge them, "if they had not said he was guilty, or would be hanged." And, by the court, "this is a good cause of challenge, but then the prisoner must prove it by witnesses, not out of the mouth of the jurymen."

With these observations, I shall rest the question as to what disqualifies a juror, and shall proceed to examine whether Basset was improperly or illegally sworn upon that jury which tried Callender. I have shown that he might not only have formed, but delivered an opinion respecting the conduct of the criminal, and yet that, unless his declarations tended to prove that he did not mean to give a just and impartial verdict, but to decide against propriety and right, he was competent to be sworn on the jury. The question which was put to the jurors by the court, no law required to be put, nor was any of the jurymen bound by any law to answer the question; and the judge was perfectly correct when he said, upon the counsel insisting that the indictment should be read to the jurors, and that they should then be asked if they had formed or declared an opinion as to the charge in the indictment, that the court had already indulged them beyond what they were entitled to by law. But, to proceed with Basset: What was his situation? He expressed no wish to be excused, provided there would be no impropriety in his being sworn, but, from a delicate scruple, he informed the court that he had seen in the newspapers, extracts said to be taken from "The Prospect Before Us;" that he had no knowledge whether they were truly extracted, but if they were, and the context did not explain away the apparent meaning of the extracts, he had made up his opinion unequivocally that their author came within the provisions of the seditious law. But let us suppose that Mr. Basset had actually seen and read "The Prospect Before Us," and had found the extracts fairly taken from it, and had formed and declared his opinion, that it was a publication which came within the seditious law; as to Callender, it would have amounted to no more than this, that if he was the author or publisher, and could not prove the truth of his charges, and had published them maliciously, to defame the President of the United States, he ought to be punished. And what honest man ever thought differently? None, whom I ever heard speak of the book. Whether the extracts he had seen agreed with the contents of the book; whether the context supported the apparent meaning; whether the charges were true; whether Callender was the author or publisher; and if so, whether he wrote or published them maliciously to defame, &c., were subjects of which Mr. Basset was ignorant, and on which he had declared no opinion. On these questions he was at liberty freely to decide, according as the evidence in the case should justify him.

But, it is said, this opinion formed, and declaration made, was improper, because they say the criminal ought to have the law and the fact both decided by the jury; and a juror should have his opinion as little made up on the law as on the fact. Hence, then, we are to infer, that as want of knowledge of the law is the best qualification for a judge, so the ignorance of the law is the best qualification for a juror; and yet, we are told, that a juror has a Constitutional right to determine the law, and that too, in defiance of the opinion of the court! Thus, it seems, the more ignorant they are, the greater our security for obtaining a just decision! I admit, the greater their ignorance, the better will they be qualified for taking what is contended to be the due impression from the exercise of what, we are told, is the Constitutional right of counsel!

But, in this case, as appears from the testimony, there were others besides Callender, concerned in printing and publishing "The Prospect Before Us;" suppose some other person, for instance, Mr. Rind, had also been indicted; that, on the trial of Rind, Mr. Basset had served as a juror, and had found him guilty; that Callender had afterwards been brought to trial, and Mr. Basset had been called as a juror, he could not be set aside, according to the authorities I have produced, although in the case of Rind he had, and that on oath, declared his opinion of the law.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Mr. Basset, although being possessed of a liberal fortune he doth not now practice, was bred to the law; his legal knowledge was such that he could not doubt but that such publications as "The Prospect Before Us," came under the provisions of the sedition law. And it is, for this reason, that the Managers contend that he ought not to have been sworn. Yes, sir, this very knowledge of the law which rendered him a more proper character to serve on the jury, is by honorable Managers insisted on as what ought to have been his disqualification! And yet they contend that the jury have the uncontrollable right to decide upon the law!

Suppose, Mr. President, a person to be indicted for an assault and battery, or for burglary; if any person should be summoned on the jury who had so much common sense and general information as to know that the man who comes behind the back of another and knocks him down, is guilty of an assault and battery, he would be unfit to serve as a juror in the first case; or to know that if a man breaks into a dwelling-house in the night time, and steals therefrom, such offender is guilty of burglary, he would be equally unfit in the last case.

Hence, then, it follows that, in the opinion of the honorable Managers, that as judges ought to have no previous knowledge of the law, relative to cases which are to be tried before them; so, also, jurors ought not to have any knowledge of what is the law, in cases to be tried before them; and that if any juror, with such legal knowledge, should be summoned, he ought not to be admitted to serve, unless, indeed, he can be rendered properly qualified by the application of the India rubber, or by the use of the Lethæan waters; by the one mode or the other, to be reduced to that happy state of ignorance thought by the Managers to be the essential requisite of a juror.

I would, before I conclude this subject, remark upon an observation made by one of the honorable Managers (Mr. Campbell;) he has charged Judge Chase with having caused Mr. Basset to be sworn as one of the jury for the very purpose of convicting Callender, from his knowledge of Basset's political principles.

My worthy colleague (Mr. Key) has with great strength of argument shown that Judge Chase could not, from the facts proved, be otherwise than a stranger both to the person and to the political principles of Mr. Basset. But I am aware that, in reply, it will be said the declaration Mr. Basset made in court showed what were his political sentiments. He only there declared that "The Prospect Before Us," if the extracts he had seen were justified by the book, was a seditious publication. This could be no proof that he was a federalist. I never knew a gentleman of any political principles that did not uniformly declare, that if the sedition law was Constitutional, that publication was clearly within the provisions of the law. Even his counsel have declared that they did not appear on his account, that they despised the wretch, and considered him as a disgrace to society. They have declared they had no hopes of saving him unless by establishing the unconstitutionality of that law.

But even had Judge Chase known the political principles of Mr. Basset to have been federal, it would not have justified him in excusing him from being sworn; nor would he have been justified in setting aside a juror because he was a republican, unless there had been in each case some other legal objection. There is no distinction between the two cases; the political principles of a man is not the test of his fitness to serve as a juror. If Mr. Basset had been exempted from being sworn on the jury in consequence of the scruples he suggested, the court must have exempted all who should make similar excuses, or they must have given just cause for complaint. It was the duty of the court to direct the jurors to be sworn, as they were called, against whom there was no legal objection. I flatter myself, I have sufficiently shown that, against Basset, there was no such objection; that the judge was not only free from impropriety in directing him to be sworn, but that his conduct would have been censurable had he acted otherwise; and here, sir, I conclude my observations upon the second article of impeachment.

I now come, Mr. President, to the third article, wherein my honorable client is criminally charged for the rejection of the evidence proposed to be derived from Colonel John Taylor.

In this part of the case the facts are admitted. The next question of law, therefore, which presents itself for discussion is, whether or not Col. Taylor's evidence ought to have been received, or was properly rejected. Here again I must observe that the honorable Managers, to support their charge, resort to principles which are to me, to the last extremity, strange and novel. We are told that the court has no right to order questions which are meant to be put to a witness to be reduced to writing. Nay, that the court have no right to know what evidence is meant to be given by the witnesses, or its connexion with other testimony, or its bearing on the cause, but to receive it drop by drop, as the counsel think proper to deal it out. In answer to these extraordinary ideas which we have had thus introduced, I must be permitted to assert that the court have, in my opinion, an undoubted right to require of the counsel that they should open their case, explain the nature of the evidence meant to be given, and on the production of a witness, state what they expect to prove by such witness. In the course of my practice it has been the usual method of proceeding for counsel to conduct themselves in this manner, and on this subject McNally, in his rules of evidence, page 14, expressly lays it down as a rule, "that counsel ought not to call a witness without first opening to the court the nature of the evidence they intend to examine into. This has been often solemnly adjudged, though not strictly adhered to in practice." And in page second he gives us as the first rule, "that no evidence ought to be admitted to any point but that on which the issue is joined." But how is a court to prevent, and it is only the court which can prevent, evidence being admitted which is not pertinent to the point on which the issue is joined, unless they are first informed what evidence is meant to be given? It is then upon the authority of McNally established that the court have the legal right to know what counsel mean to prove by a witness; and having that right, they may exercise it whenever, in their discretion, they may think it necessary.

To determine, therefore, whether they acted correctly in rejecting the testimony of Colonel Taylor, let us examine what testimony they hoped to obtain from him; and for this purpose, what were the questions proposed to be put to him.—They were,

1st. Did you ever hear John Adams express any sentiments favorable to monarchy, or aristocracy, and what were they?

2d. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams, while Vice President, express his disapprobation of the funding system?

3d. Do you know whether Mr. Adams did not, in the year 1794, vote against the sequestration of British debts, and also against the bill for suspending intercourse with Great Britain?

Colonel Taylor's testimony was offered as being relevant only to one set of words stated in the two counts of the indictment, to wit: "he (meaning the said President of the United States) was a professed aristocrat; he (meaning the President of the United States) had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest—(inuendo) against the interest and welfare of the United States."

Need I state to this honorable Court, that words which do not in themselves, or on the face of them, purport anything criminal, cannot be made so, or considered as libellous, but by laying an inuendo, giving them a criminal meaning, without which they would be innocent; and, also, that the criminal meaning laid in the inuendo must be strictly proved?

Let us now examine the set of words to which Colonel Taylor's evidence was meant to apply; they were without any inuendo, as follows: "He was a professed aristocrat; he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest."

This sentence consists of two separate distinct clauses or parts; the first, that "he was a professed aristocrat;" the second, that "he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest." I ask this honorable Court if either of these clauses or parts, of themselves, and without an inuendo, carry with them any charge of criminality, or any thing libellous? To say that a man is an aristocrat, a democrat, or a republican, is not of itself charging the person with anything criminal, nor is it slanderous, unless indeed the charge is accompanied with an inuendo, stating that, by the epithet so used, something very bad was intended; and that Government would indeed merit contempt in which a person should be punished upon such a charge. So, also, to say that a man had been faithful and serviceable to the British interest charges him with nothing criminal, and therefore cannot be slanderous, because the British and the American interest in many instances have been and may be the same.

There may be a variety of instances in which the interest of two nations may concur. There have been many in which the interest of America and of Britain did concur; many also in which the interest of America and France have combined. In the first instance a man may have been faithful and serviceable to Britain; in the other to France, without the violation of any duty to the United States—without having been guilty of the least criminality.

The sentence then taken altogether, connecting the two clauses, does not of itself import anything criminal, and consequently is not slanderous, if it remained without any inuendo; and if it was free from an inuendo, being not slanderous, would not require any evidence relative thereto. Nay, it would be no part of the charge put in issue, for in legal construction it is only such part of the publication stated in an indictment which is slanderous; that is the point in issue.

I will now, sir, read that part of the indictment in connexion with the inuendo: "He (meaning the President of the United States) was a professed aristocrat." Here there being no inuendo, this clause or part of the sentence remains in its primitive innocence; he (meaning the President of the United States) had proved faithful and serviceable to Great Britain." This of itself, as I have observed, is perfectly innocent; but here comes the inuendo with its sting in its tail—"inuendo, against the interest and welfare of the United States of America." Thus it was only the latter clause in the sentence that was presented as being libellous; and how was that part of the sentence to be justified? By showing that the President had, in the high station he had occupied, prostituted his character by sacrificing the interest of the United States to the interest of Great Britain. And how was this justification to be proved? Not by any answer Mr. Taylor could give to the first question, for that, as far as his answer could have relation, could only relate to the first clause; but that clause being of itself inoffensive, and not made criminal by any inuendo, was no part of the criminal charge in issue, but was merely introduced as being part of a sentence, the latter clause of which was only charged to be criminal. Any evidence from Colonel Taylor as to the first clause was therefore totally irrelevant, as not going to the point in issue, and as only going to prove the truth of what was neither stated nor relied on as being criminal, and therefore was properly rejected by the court.

As to the second question, to wit: "Whether Mr. Adams, while Vice President, had expressed his disapprobation of the funding system?" The question could not be in any degree relevant to the one or the other clause in the sentence.—Whether Mr. Adams expressed his disapprobation while he was Vice President, of the funding system, or not, could in no respect go to prove or disapprove his being a professed aristocrat, or his having sacrificed the interest of the United States to the interest of Great Britain. The court therefore, considering this question totally irrelevant to the "point in issue," did as was their duty to do, they refused to suffer it to be put to the witness.

So much for the two first questions. We now come to the third, respecting the votes of Mr. Adams, when Vice President, against the bill for the sequestration of British debts, and the bill for suspending intercourse with Great Britain. For the conduct of my honorable client in refusing to permit this question to be put to Colonel Taylor, two reasons may be assigned; the first, that if the fact was as stated, it could not be proved by Colonel Taylor. The second, that if the fact was established, it would be totally immaterial to the issue. Colonel Taylor's evidence was not the best which the nature of the case admitted. I will not say that the traverser, in order to prove this vote, was under the necessity of procuring a copy from the Journal of the Senate, properly authenticated by their clerk, but he certainly ought at least to have produced a printed copy of the votes and proceedings of the Senate as published by them. One thing at least is certain, that the traverser could not consistently, with rules of law, give parole evidence to establish the vote of Mr. Adams, and therefore that Colonel Taylor could not be legally examined on that subject. But I will go further in defence of my client, and will say, that if they had had the best possible evidence of the fact, if they had had an attested copy from the records of the Senate, the judge would have departed from his duty if he had permitted the evidence which was wished to have been obtained from Colonel Taylor to have been given to the jury. Ought any evidence to be given to a jury which is not proper and pertinent to prove the fact in issue, or to prove some fact from which the fact in issue ought legally to be inferred—evidence not relevant to the point before the court and jury? Was not, as to this part of the charge, the fact in issue, whether Mr. Adams had swerved from his duty by intentionally prostrating the interest and welfare of his country to the interest and welfare of Great Britain? Should not a charge of so atrocious a nature be proved by some direct act of this criminal sacrifice of the interests of the United States to the interest of Great Britain, or by the proof of some other act from which such criminal sacrifice must and ought on principles of law to be clearly and necessarily inferred? And what was the proof proposed to be offered for this purpose? That upon the question whether British debts should be sequestered, and whether our intercourse with Great Britain should be suspended, after full discussion one-half the members of the Senate voted in favor of those measures, and one-half of the Senate against them; and that in this situation Mr. Adams thinking them of too hazardous a nature, and such as might involve our country in a war, did not choose to take upon himself so great a responsibility as to give his casting voice in the affirmative.

I have, Mr. President, neither time nor inclination to enter into a discussion of either the propriety or policy of those measures, but I have no hesitation to express my belief, that the honorable members who voted for or against those measures, were equally actuated by the same purity of motive. That those who voted on the one side or the other acted from the sincerest desire to promote what they respectively considered the best interests of their country.

Shall then the rejection of the evidence, that Mr. Adams, on measures in fieri, on which the Senate was equally divided, gave his casting vote with the Senators whose political sentiments accorded with the then majority; and which evidence, if admitted, would have proved nothing, be considered as a ground of impeachment? I say evidence, which, if admitted, would have proved nothing; for that act of Mr. Adams certainly would not have proved that he had corruptly and wickedly sacrificed the interest and welfare of the United States to Great Britain; nor would it have proved anything, from which such sacrifice ought legally and necessarily to be inferred. Where is the man who would dare say, that the members of the Senate who voted for or against the bill for sequestration of British debts, and the suspension of our intercourse with Great Britain, acted from corrupt motives? Is there a member of this honorable Court who believes that the Senators who voted against those measures were actuated by a desire to promote the interest of Great Britain at the expense of their own country? Or, that those who voted in favor of those measures were actuated by a desire to promote the interest of France at the same expense? The heart of every member of this honorable Court, I am confident, revolts at the idea! Ought then any judge to have suffered this act of Mr. Adams to have been offered to a jury as evidence directly to establish that he had wickedly and corruptly preferred the interest and welfare of Great Britain to that of the United States, or as an evidence from which the jury ought, upon legal principles, necessarily to infer that he had thus acted?

The judge who would have permitted such evidence to have been given for such purpose, in my opinion, ought much rather to be impeached for his conduct, than the judge who should reject it.

It is the sole province of the court to determine what evidence shall go to the jury, either as proper, directly to prove the fact in issue, or to prove any facts from which that fact ought to be inferred. The court are the sole judges of the competency and admissibility of the evidence—the competency depends upon its legality; the admissibility upon its relevancy to the question in issue. If illegal, it is their duty to reject it; but though legal in its nature, yet if not relevant to the point in issue, it ought equally to be rejected; because its production only wastes time, and has a tendency to mislead the jury.

The right of the court to decide what evidence shall go to the jury I never heard questioned till in the course of this trial. The honorable Managers appear disposed to advocate a different doctrine, and as they claim the right that the jury should decide the issue without regarding the opinion of the court as to the law, so they seem to think that the court ought not to restrict the evidence to the jury. And hence they have expressed some indignation against my honorable client, because he told the counsel in Fries's case that they might go on as they pleased, but still subject to the direction of the court as to what evidence they might offer. On that occasion they exclaimed "the court took upon themselves to decide what evidence should go to the jury! But perhaps that evidence which might have been rejected might have influenced the decision of the jury, and as the jury have a right to decide the law, uncontrolled by the court, they ought to have before them all that evidence which might possibly influence their decision!" Charming doctrine! Thus the jury are not only to decide the law on the issue, but likewise all questions of law which arise upon the proceedings in the cause and upon the evidence that is to be admitted. The honorable Managers seem to forget that it is only in consequence of the right of the jury to give a general verdict that they get incidentally the power of deciding the law in any case, but that this cannot in any manner enable them, either as to power or right, to have any control over the court in any collateral questions.

The maddest enthusiast that ever yet advocated the rights of jurors, has never questioned the right of the court to determine upon the competency and admissibility of evidence. Such being the law, it was the duty of Judge Chase, when the question meant to be established was, that Mr. Adams wickedly and corruptly sacrificed the interest of the United States to Great Britain contrary to his duty, to prevent the vote of Mr. Adams on that occasion being given in evidence to the jury, either as proper directly to prove the fact, or from which they ought necessarily to infer it. And I again repeat, if he had suffered such evidence to have been given to them as proper and relevant, he would have been much more deserving of impeachment.

I have stated that there are two ways of proving the issue—either by directly proving the fact in issue, or by proving some fact from which the fact in issue ought legally to be inferred; and that, in the one case and the other, the court are the judges as to the competency and the admissibility of the testimony. But I go further; it is the court who have a right to determine whether or not the fact in issue ought to be inferred from a fact proved, or what fact being proved will justify a jury in inferring and accordingly finding the fact in issue. I will, sir, explain my meaning—the question in issue is a grant or no grant of a tract of land; the grant is the fact to be established; no grant can be produced, but evidence is given of possession for a great length—a regular transference of the property as having been granted—payment of rents to the successors of the supposed grantor, &c.; the court not only determine what testimony is proper to establish these facts, but they direct the jury that, if they believe the evidence, they then ought to find that a grant had been given. On this point I refer to Cowper, page 112, and 12 Coke, 2. So, sir, if, in an action of indebitatus assumpsit for money due, the defendant pleads the act of limitation, and the plaintiff replies a promise to pay within three years. If, on the trial of the cause the plaintiff proves an acknowledgment of the debt within the limited time, the court will instruct the jury, that, if they believe that fact, they ought to find from it, as being sufficient evidence for the purpose, the fact in issue, that he did promise to pay. Yet, if the jury was to find a special verdict, stating that within three years the defendant had acknowledged the debt, the court could not give judgment, but must order a venire facias de novo, because the jury would not have found the fact in issue, but only a fact which was, as evidence, sufficient to have justified them to have found by their verdict that the defendant assume. Again, in the case before supposed, if evidence was given to the jury that the defendant had acknowledged the debt as aforesaid, the court would instruct the jury that upon that evidence they ought to find the defendant had promised; and if the jury did not give their verdict for the plaintiff, the court would grant a new trial. So, sir, in an action of trover and conversion. If it was proved that the defendant had the thing in possession for the conversion of which the suit was brought, and evidence is given that the plaintiff demanded the article from the defendant, and that he refused to deliver it, though this is not itself a conversion, and if the jury was to find a special verdict stating these facts, the court could not give judgment, yet the court would direct the jury that, upon such fact being proved, they ought to find the fact in issue, to wit, the conversion; and if the jury was not to find for the plaintiff the court would grant a new trial. Again, in the case of an action brought to recover money, and the statute of limitation pleaded; if the defendant acknowledges the justice of the debt, but at the same time absolutely and unequivocally declares that he never will pay any part of it, the court would instruct the jury that upon such evidence they could not find for the plaintiff, for that the acknowledgment of the debt being only presumptive of a promise to pay, that presumption was taken away when the acknowledgment was accompanied with a direct unequivocal declaration that he never would pay any part of it. So in the case of trover and conversion, if the thing in question was large, heavy, and unwieldy, as a large piece of mahogany or other timber, and when the delivery of it was demanded, the defendant was to refuse troubling himself on the occasion, but to direct him to where this ponderous article lay, and tell him that he might take it into his possession when he pleased; the court would certainly say there was no proof of conversion—the prima facie evidence being defeated by the circumstances of the case.

I have introduced these cases by way of illustration; and to show that the court determines what is proper evidence to prove the fact in issue, from what fact the fact in issue may be inferred, and also what evidence is admissible to prove this secondary fact; and therefore as the vote given by Mr. Adams of which Callender wished to give evidence was not sufficient to prove directly the charge that Mr. Adams had wickedly, and against his duty, sacrificed the interest of his country to that of Great Britain—nor was a fact from which the jury, on principles of law, ought to have inferred it; and I am sure no person will attempt to support the contrary, therefore, that my honorable client instead of being impeachable for rejecting such evidence, would have exposed himself to censure had he admitted it.

Nor can I doubt but that the respectable counsel who were concerned for Callender, would have cheerfully acquiesced in and approved of my honorable client's conduct in this respect, had it not been for a cause, which they honestly acknowledged—their extreme ignorance of the law which relates to the doctrine of libels; and which had induced them to use every exertion to obtain a continuance of the cause to a future term; that in the mean time, either in their own offices, or under the instruction of some legal character, they might acquire a more accurate knowledge of that branch of the law. An indulgence that it seems they could not prevail upon the court to give—for the refusal of which, however, I hope my honorable client will not be thought impeachable.

I have now, sir, finished my observations on the third article, and am under the direction of this honorable Court whether I shall proceed to the fourth, or wait till they take some refreshment. (It was now three o'clock, and the Court adjourned for half an hour.)

I shall now, sir, proceed to the fourth article, which charges the respondent's conduct to have been marked during the whole course of the trial by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance.

From the evidence it certainly appears, that Judge Chase prevented the counsel from arguing to the jury that the sedition law was unconstitutional; and this seems to have given rise to a great portion of the altercation and ill humor between the court and the bench.

I admit that the Constitution gives to a criminal the right of having counsel; but the Constitution has not defined the rights or duties of counsel, or to what extent they are to exercise them. One thing, however, is certain; that they have no Constitutional right to impose upon the court or mislead the jury.

When Callender's counsel contended that if the jury have a right to decide questions of law, then the Constitution being the supreme law of the land, the jury must of course have the power of deciding on the constitutionality of a law; the judge might well say it was a non sequitur.

What has been allowed to the jurors as their incidental right on the general issue? Not to decide whether there is an existing law, or whether a law is in force, but to declare the true construction of an existing law, and whether the case at issue comes within the true construction of such law.

But those who contend that the jury have a right to determine the constitutionality of a law, insist not for the power of the jury to decide its true construction and whether the prisoner's case comes within it, but to decide whether what is produced as law is not void, a mere nullity, a dead letter; or in other words whether such a law is in existence. The maddest enthusiasts for the rights of jurors, their most zealous advocates, have never contended for such a right before the cases of Fries and Callender. Whether a law exists, whether a law has been enacted, whether a law has been repealed, whether a law has become obsolete or is in force? The decision of these questions hath always been allowed the exclusive right of the court. The power of the court to decide exclusively upon these questions hath never been before controverted. Nay, the very right claimed on behalf of jurors, that they may determine what is the true construction of the law, and whether the case is within its provisions, of itself necessarily presupposes, and is predicated upon the existence of a law, the construction or meaning of which they are to determine. It has indeed been seriously questioned, and that by gentlemen of great abilities, whether even the Judiciary have a right to declare a law, passed by the Legislature, to be contrary to the Constitution and, therefore, void! I shall not enter into an examination of that question, but I have no hesitation in saying that a jury have no such right, that it never was intended they should have such right, and that if they had the right, we might as well be without a Constitution.

The first specific instance of my client's unjust, partial, and intemperate conduct, which is stated in this fourth article is, that he compelled the traverser's counsel to reduce to writing the questions which they meant to propound to Colonel Taylor. The correctness of this procedure will depend on the question whether the court had by law such a power, for if such a power was possessed by them, it is to be presumed that they, on that occasion, exercised it according to their best discretion, nor can it be inferred that their conduct was criminal, because the procedure was novel in Virginia. There are cases in which the practice of a court may be considered the law of the court; but these are not in any manner analogous to the case in question; nor do I find the practice of the State courts is obligatory "in any case of this kind on the courts of the United States." My honorable client did not consider what was usual in Virginia, but what was correct and proper; he knew that the law authorized him to make this demand. In Maryland, where he imbibed his legal knowledge, and where at the bar and on the bench he had carried it into practice, nothing was more common than for questions to be reduced to writing at the request of counsel, or at the request of the court. If counsel doubt of the propriety of the evidence meant to be drawn from the witness, or the correctness of the question meant to be propounded to him, they have a right to request it to be reduced to writing. So also, if the court, without whose approbation no testimony can be given to a jury, and whose duty it is to prevent improper testimony to be given, has reason to suspect an intention to introduce such evidence, they have a right, and they ought to require the questions to be reduced to writing, that there may be no misapprehension of the tendency of the question, and that they may more deliberately decide whether it is proper to be put to the witness. And in this case, the counsel were not required to reduce their questions to writing in the first instance, or before they had stated what they had meant to prove, as hath been suggested. When Colonel Taylor was called and sworn, the court desired to be informed what they meant to prove by him. McNally is an authority that in so doing they acted legally. The counsel stated the facts, to prove which Colonel Taylor was called; upon which, the court doubting the admissibility of the testimony directed the question to be reduced to writing for their consideration. It cannot for a moment be seriously contended, but that the court had a right so to do. As my respectable colleague (Mr. Key) has observed, the practice of this honorable Court during this trial, hath perfectly sanctioned that part of my client's conduct. If at any time a question has been put, the propriety of which hath been doubted, it has been directed to be reduced to writing. It is true, that this has been, principally, when an objection has been made by the counsel; but there can be no doubt, that if any honorable member of this court had apprehended the question to be improper, the court would have had a right, and would have directed the question to be propounded in writing for their consideration. The propriety, the principle, in each case is the same. On this part of the charge I need not dwell any longer.

The next instance of the judge's conduct specified in this article is his refusal to continue Callender's case to the next term, notwithstanding the affidavit filed, and the applications made. On this subject, I shall not make many observations as to the law; but I may venture to assert that the conduct of Judge Chase in this instance also appears to have been free from any corrupt or oppressive motive or design; no part of his conduct on this occasion has been produced to show that he entertained a disposition to prevent Callender from obtaining the testimony of his witnesses, or deprive him of the necessary time to procure their attendance. Let it be recollected that the first affidavit prepared and proposed to be filed in order to obtain a continuance of the cause was a general affidavit. By the laws of England a general affidavit is not sufficient to entitle the party to a continuance, and upon principles of law as adopted in England and the United States, at least in Maryland, a supplemental affidavit cannot in a case of this nature be received.

If, then, Judge Chase had wished that Callender should have been, at all events, prevented from a continuance of his cause, he would have suffered them to file their general affidavit.

According to the laws of England, and so is the law considered in Maryland, to entitle the party to a continuance, he must file an affidavit showing what witnesses he wants—what he expects to prove by them—that he has used due diligence to procure them—and that he has a reasonable expectation to procure their attendance at some time. Judge Chase, had he wished that Callender should be deprived of a continuance of his cause, would have suffered them to file their general affidavit, but what was his conduct? Desirous they should not improperly and hastily commit themselves, and lose advantages to which they might be entitled, he gave them a caution, and time till next day to profit by it. On the next day they did, it is true, file a special affidavit; but this special affidavit, so drawn up, under the caution given them by the court, is not such as can, in any degree, stand the test of legal investigation, even under the authority which one of the honorable Managers (Mr. Rodney) hath this day introduced. Callender did not, in his affidavit, state that he expected to be able to procure his witnesses at the next term, the term after, or at any term. He also stated that there were certain books necessary for his defence, but he could not state that he had endeavored to procure them before, or that he expected to get them against the next term. And surely, if when Callender wrote that libel, he founded any part of his charge upon books which had been published, he ought to have had them by him when he wrote and published, and to have kept them by him for his defence whenever he should be called upon to answer for that publication, and could have no right to claim a continuance for the purpose of obtaining such books. One of the honorable Managers, (Mr. Rodney) has this morning referred us to 6th vol. Bacon's Abridgment, from page 650 to 652, upon the subject in contest, the mode of putting off a trial, and there, as he acknowledges, and as the authority enforces, "if there is any cause of suspicion that delay is the object, the court should be satisfied, from circumstances, that the person absent is a material witness; that the person applying has been guilty of no laches or neglect; and that he is in reasonable expectation of being able to procure his attendance at some future time." That the court had, in Callender's case, just reason to believe that delay was the sole object of the counsel, no person can doubt. Nay, the counsel themselves have upon oath declared that delay was their object; that they had no hope or expectation that witnesses could be of any service to them; that they considered Callender's cause desperate, if the law was Constitutional; and that their great object was to continue the cause to another court, that it might not be tried by my honorable client, of whose conduct in the case of Fries they had heard, and against whom they had formed, it seems, the most decided prejudices.

This authority, then, produced by the honorable Managers, perfectly justifies the conduct of my client in refusing, upon that affidavit, to continue the cause to the next term. The court was then sitting to hear the charges brought before them; it was their duty to have them determined without unnecessary delay, that if the party was innocent he should be acquitted; if guilty, he should be brought to speedy punishment. The same honorable Manager has, from the same authority, shown "that, upon the particular circumstances of the case the court will make a rule for putting 'off the trial of a cause to the second term after the rule for putting off the trial is made." I admit the law, and will therefore readily admit that if an affidavit had been made by Callender, stating that he expected to be able to prove certain facts, stating what the facts were, by witnesses, who, from their particular situation, could not with any probability be produced before the second term, after the affidavit, and could then probably be had, the court might with propriety, and perhaps ought to have continued the cause to the second court, but no such affidavit was made; therefore, not having made out such a case, they have no reason to complain that they had not the benefit of it. They did not even swear that they expected to be able to procure the attendance of their witnesses at any time whatever.

Trial of Judge Chase.

A case has also been referred to in Cowper's Reports, where the defendant wanting the testimony of a witness who lived out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the court not having the power to issue a commission to obtain his testimony, the court declared that if the plaintiffs would not consent to have the deposition of such witnesses taken to be read at the trial, they would continue the cause indefinitely. The honorable Manager has further said, that though in England the court cannot issue a commission to examine witnesses, yet here the court has a power to issue a commission for that purpose. The honorable Court will recollect that the case of Callender was a criminal prosecution. I doubt whether the court has any power in a criminal case to issue a commission to examine witnesses for or against the prosecution. I do not know of any law which gives them that power. If the honorable Managers know of such a law, they will be so obliging as to refer us to it. But I will take up the objection upon each view. Suppose a commission might have been issued, the counsel of Callender did not apply to the court to grant a commission, and to continue the cause till the commission was returned; suppose a commission could not be issued, Callender's counsel did not apply to the Attorney General of the district for his consent that these witnesses should be examined where they lived, and their deposition be read in evidence on the trial; they did not apply to the court for their determination, that the counsel for this prosecution should consent to this, and that if he refused, the cause should on that ground be continued. Had they prayed a continuance on either of these grounds, and it had been refused, they might have had some pretext under their authorities for complaint, but this ground they never attempted to take.

Had they prayed for a commission, and the law authorized it, it is to be presumed the court would have granted it. If the court could not grant a commission, and the defendant's counsel had proposed that the depositions of absent witnesses should be taken to be read at the trial, it is possible the court would have continued the cause, unless the prosecutor would have consented that depositions should be thus taken. Hence, therefore, on no principle doth it appear that there was anything improper, incorrect, or illegal, in refusing a continuance of the case of Callender.

But, sir, there is another ground upon which the conduct of the court was strictly justifiable, in requesting to know by the deposition what the absent witnesses were expected to prove, and also in refusing to continue the cause. Upon their own statement, the witnesses wanted were only material to a few of the charges in the indictment. Their absence, therefore, could not be a sufficient reason to put off the trial. The Attorney might have struck out of the indictment those sets of words to which their testimony was wanted, and proceeded to the trial upon the other part of the charge. And as the punishment both as to fine and imprisonment was discretionary, not exceeding a certain sum and time, Callender was equally in the power of the court, convicted on a part, as if he had been convicted of the whole of the charges; and the court having the discretion, and having refused a continuance for the want of the testimony suggested, had it in their power, when they passed sentence, to throw out of their consideration those parts of the charge for which the testimony was wanted.

And on this subject, the case put by my respectable colleague (Mr. Key) is perfectly in point; he supposed the case of a person indicted for stealing a horse, saddle, and bridle; to delay the trial, the prisoner suggests the want of witnesses; the court compel him to declare in his affidavit what he expects to prove by them. It appears that he only wants to prove that the bridle was his own! This, surely, would be no cause for delaying the trial. The prosecutor might instantly strike out of the indictment the bridle, and there could not be the least pretext for not going to trial upon the residue of the charge—the stealing the horse and saddle. So in Callender's case, the want of witnesses to justify as to a few sets of words could afford no reasonable cause why he should not be tried upon a dozen or more sets of libellous words, charged in the indictment, as to which he did not pretend to allege that he wanted a witness.

In Maryland, it has ever been the practice to try criminal prosecutions of what nature soever at the first court, if practicable, and not to continue them unless some legal cause is shown. Judge Chase had been accustomed to this mode of procedure. It was in Maryland that he acquired the first rudiments of law. It was in that State that his legal knowledge was matured by practice.

Why should capital cases, rather than inferior crimes, be tried at the first court? The honorable Managers admit that it is the general rule not to continue, but to try at the first term, capital cases. Surely if indulgence, if delay is necessary in any case, it is in a capital case, where life is at risk; where an injury, if done, is irretrievable!

There are many reasons which show the propriety that prosecutions of every kind should be decided with as little delay as possible. One of the principles as to criminal jurisprudence, as Governor Claiborne has justly observed, is, that though punishments should be mild, yet they ought to be speedy; by having an immediate decision

there is a great certainty that the criminal shall not elude justice by flight. The expense, whether to the criminal or to the public, is increased by delay; delay also hazards the loss of testimony by the death or absence of witnesses; and therefore diminishes the chance of having justice done, either to the party or to the public, the one or the other of whom may be essentially injured for want of testimony, which might have been had if the trial had not been delayed; but even if witnesses live, and can be had at the trial, yet the lapse of time impairs memory, and their testimony cannot be relied upon in the same manner as if they were examined immediately after the transaction, when every circumstance would be fresh in their memory. These, with many other reasons which might be given, have actuated our courts of justice in Maryland, never to continue criminal prosecutions of any kind, if it can be avoided; and show the propriety of their conduct.

The next specification, in this article, of improper conduct in the judge, is, that he "used unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and insinuated that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to the law, to which the conduct of the judge did at the same time manifestly tend." As to this part of the charge, there is but little of a legal nature contained in it, I shall therefore hastily pass over it. If true, it seems to be rather a violation of the principles of politeness, than of the principles of law; rather the want of decorum, than the commission of a high crime and misdemeanor. I will readily agree that my honorable client has more of the "fortiter in re," than the "suaviter in modo," and that his character may in some respects be considered to bear a stronger resemblance to that of Lord Thurlow than to that of Lord Chesterfield; yet Lord Thurlow has ever been esteemed a great legal character, and an enlightened judge.

But let me ask this honorable Court whether there is not great reason to believe that the sentiments my honorable client expressed with respect to the conduct of the counsel, and their object, was just and correct? What was the conduct of Callender's counsel? Was it not such as immediately tended to inflame the minds of the bystanders, and to excite their indignation against the court, and highly insulting to the judges? In the first place, they endeavored to obtain a continuance of the cause to the next court, merely with an intention to procure delay, and to prevent the cause being tried before Judge Chase, acknowledging that they had no hopes or expectation from any testimony to save their client if the law was determined to be Constitutional; and yet they brought forward their client to swear just what they pleased, in order to procure this delay, with respect to the necessity of witnesses, whose testimony they acknowledge they were conscious could be of no service to them, and yet they wished the bystanders to consider the court acting highly improper for not granting that continuance? Was this even to serve Callender? No, they avow they did not appear to serve him, but to serve the cause.

Sir, it appears from their own evidence that Callender would have submitted to the court, but for their interference; that they volunteered on the occasion not for him, but for their cause; and yet the volunteers wanted the court to give them to another term to prepare themselves, and made Callender swear what they pleased to effect their purpose. They said they were not well acquainted with the law upon libels, and therefore wanted time to examine the subject; but surely when persons undertake to volunteer their services on any subject, they ought to be masters of it, and are entitled to no indulgence of delay. And as they declare they had formed the determination, on the first instance of an indictment under the seditious law, to come forward and volunteer their services for the sake not of the man, but of their cause, common decency to the court, and a proper respect for themselves, ought to have dictated to them in the interim to have made themselves fully acquainted with all the law relative to that subject in which they had thus determined officiously to interpose.

In the next place, when the jury were about to be sworn, they challenged the array in order to set aside the whole panel. Such challenge can never be made correctly, but for the jury being returned by an officer not authorized, or for unfair and partial dealings in the officer who summons the jury. The reason assigned was that one of the jurors who was returned had expressed sentiments inimical to Callender. This, if true, might be a good cause to challenge the individual juror for favor, but no boy, who had read in an office six months, would have supposed this a sufficient cause to have challenged the array, unless it had been further alleged that the marshal knew the juror had expressed such sentiments before he had summoned him, and had summoned him for that reason; which was not suggested. Is it possible to believe that legal characters of so great estimation, that one of them was then the Attorney General of the State of Virginia, another almost immediately after appointed Attorney General of the United States for the district of Virginia, and the third, appointed one of the chancellors of that State, should have been so utterly ignorant of the law relative to the challenge of the array, as to have made the motion they did? If not, it must be presumed their conduct was influenced by a wish to embarrass the court; to hold up the prosecution as oppressive; to excite public indignation against the court and the Government, who endeavored to enforce it, by attempting to impress a belief on the public mind, that even their marshal had, in the very beginning, violated his duty to gratify the wishes of an oppressive Government, and that for that purpose he had unfairly packed a jury! Was not this immediately, was it not designedly done for the purpose of exciting public indignation? What was the conduct of the same counsel when the court desired them to reduce to writing the questions they meant to propound to Colonel Taylor? They have declared they hesitated whether they would do it; and before they did comply with the court's direction, they made a direct effort to hold up to the bystanders that the court was acting with oppression and partiality, to the prejudice of Callender, by imposing on his counsel difficulties and impositions which the court had not imposed upon the counsel for the prosecution! Whereas in fact the counsel for the prosecution had fairly stated the testimony he meant to offer, before he produced his witnesses, having no desire that the jury should be surprised with improper evidence,—whereas the counsel for Callender wished to have witnesses examined to the jury, without the least previous disclosure, to the jury or court, of the evidence meant by them to be given; most evidently that they might have testimony illegal thus imposed upon them; and because they were, by the correct interposition of the court, defeated in this object, they could not consent even to let this act of the court pass, without a direct attempt to impress upon the bystanders that it was another instance of the unfair and oppressive conduct of the court, which ought to excite their indignation! And here let this honorable Court remember that Callender, in his Prospect Before Us, had in the most solemn manner appealed to the State of Virginia, that if ever the time should come, when the Government of the United States should attempt to prosecute him and make him a victim under the sedition law, that State was bound under every principle of interest, of justice, and of the claims he had upon them, to come forward, and at all risks and by all means to protect him. Is there not, sir, great reason to believe, that the object of counsel was to second this appeal so made by Callender, and to induce the people of Virginia to come forward to save their client from the pretended oppression of Government,—to rescue him from their fangs!

One of the gentlemen who was counsel for Callender, has told us, that whenever a prosecution should be attempted under the sedition law, he had formed the determination to come forward and prove its unconstitutionality. That, in consequence of this determination in Callender's case, and only for that purpose, he did appear in order to argue its unconstitutionality. He has told us further, that he had no hopes of convincing the court, and scarcely the faintest expectation of inducing the jury to believe that the sedition law was unconstitutional; but yet, that he wished to argue the question, with a view of making a proper impression upon the public mind; and yet he has disclosed to us upon his oath, that when the court had charged him with wishing to address himself to the populace and not to the court, he denied the charge, and told the court he only wanted to address himself to and to be heard by the jury and did not wish to be heard by the jury and by the bystanders! When, at the same time, he knew he could not be heard by the court without also being heard by the jury and the bystanders, unless they had all been, a thing unknown, sent out of the court house; or what is equally unknown, had their ears stuffed with cotton, or filled with wax; and yet the same gentleman has said on oath, notwithstanding that declaration, that it was his chief, almost his sole, object upon that subject, to be heard by the bystanders, and on them to make proper impressions! What barefaced, what unequalled hypocrisy doth he admit he practised on that occasion! What egregious trifling with the court! But, I would ask, this honorable Court, what were the impressions which Mr. Hay was so solicitous to make on the people? Was it merely to convince them that the sedition law was unconstitutional, and ought not to be enforced? Had not the Legislature of his State, some time before, denounced this law as unconstitutional, and destructive to liberty? Had they not circulated the denunciation throughout every part of their own State, and sent it to every Legislature in the Union? Do not let me here be misunderstood to censure that honorable body, or to question the propriety of their conduct, or the rectitude of their motives; far be it from me to doubt that they honestly believed the law to be unconstitutional, and fraught with all the evils which they suggested would flow from its execution; and, therefore, that they thought it a sacred duty to act as they did. I am not in the habit of questioning the motives which influence public or private bodies; it is my duty to leave that question to their own consciences and to their God; I myself view them in the most favorable light. I only mean to state, as a fact, a transaction of notoriety; but can it possibly be supposed, after this, the people of Virginia wanted a speech from Mr. Hay, to induce them to consider the sedition law unconstitutional, or could he expect that those who doubted, after being so well acquainted with the sentiments and conduct of their Legislature, would be made converts by anything they should hear from him? No, sir, no person can think it. What, then, was his motive? Was it not to impress on the people that, not only an unconstitutional, oppressive law, was about to be enforced, but also that the court, in order to enforce it, was acting in the most unfair and oppressive manner, as well as the marshal; and thereby to inflame the resentment and indignation of the populace against the court? I will not say that he really wished so far to have excited their violence against my honorable client as to have endangered his life; but it is impossible that I should doubt but that it would have given him pleasure, that their violence should have been so far, at least, excited, as to have intimidated the court from executing this obnoxious law.

When my honorable client went from Baltimore to Richmond, to hold the circuit court, he knew how violently that State was opposed to the enforcement of this law; but he equally knew that it was his duty to carry it into execution, without regard to the sentiments of any portion of the community, or however disagreeable it might be to them. Under these circumstances he went to Richmond, and found the counsel, from the first step in this cause, attempting, as he could not but consider it, to inflame the audience and excite their indignation against him. My honorable client, who well knows mankind, and has been accustomed to popular assemblies, appears to have been anxious, as his best security, to keep the bystanders in good humor, and to amuse them at the expense of the very persons who were endeavoring to excite the irascibility of the audience against him. Hence the mirth, the humor, the facetiousness, by which his conduct was marked during the trial; and which, most fortunately, was attended with the happy consequence, he hoped from it, for it is admitted that he kept the bystanders in great good humor, and excited peals of laughter at the expense of the counsel, as the witness very justly concludes, for he says, "the counsel did not appear to join in the laugh." And this, sir, most satisfactorily accounts for the more than usual exertion of his facetious talents on the trial of Callender; and I doubt not was the real cause of that exertion.

Among the different charges made against Judge Chase of rudeness, and unusual language by him used towards the counsel of Callender, we find it stated that, when the judge had repeatedly declared the counsel could not be permitted to argue to the jury the constitutionality of the law, and one of the counsel, who appears to have felt particularly sore on the occasion, still urging that question to the jury, the judge interrupted him, and declared that the counsel of Callender had, from the first, mistaken the law, and that they had persisted in pressing their mistakes on the court. Never was a more proper or correct expression used by a judge. Never, I believe, did the conduct of lawyers more fully justify such a charge! And, if the abilities of the counsel are as great as they are represented to be, it is almost impossible not to believe their errors were intentional, and with the express view to embarrass the court. In the first place, they insisted that the jury, not the court, was, on the indictment of Callender, to assess the fine which should be imposed on him, if found guilty. This was one of their errors; and a most egregious error it was. And yet, my honorable client has been charged with rudeness for calling it, as one witness states, "a wild notion;" or, as Mr. Robertson has it in his short-hand, "a mistaken notion." Either of these expressions was, in my opinion, extremely mild. I, sir, should not have hesitated in calling it a mad notion.

The idea that the array was to be quashed, because there was returned an individual juror who was supposed to be liable to be challenged, was another mistake; a mistake that even a school-boy in law could scarcely be expected to have made. The affidavit, so incorrectly drawn, and their insisting on a continuance of their cause in consequence of that incorrect affidavit, was another mistake.

An additional mistake was, their idea that the court had no right to know what testimony they meant should be given by the witness produced, and that it was improper to require that the questions meant to be propounded to Colonel Taylor, should be reduced to writing. And the attempt to obtain from the jury a decision that the sedition law was unconstitutional, in which they so pertinaciously persisted, was also an error. I ask, then, whether, when the counsel had been guilty of all these mistakes, it did not perfectly justify my honorable client in the expressions he used, that they had been from the first mistaken, and that they had continued throughout pressing their mistakes upon the court? Nay, did it not justify the observation used by him, which has been urged as most exceptionable, "that they must know better; and that their conduct was intended to influence the bystanders?" That the counsel's great object was to give an impression to the people has been acknowledged on oath; and the court must have had a very moderate idea, indeed, of the legal abilities of Callender's counsel, if they could have supposed such a succession of errors to have arisen from ignorance.

But the judge is also charged with great rudeness in the manner in which he replied in one part of the argument to Mr. Wirt, just at a time when that gentleman had finished a syllogism, by replying that it was a non sequitur. I will state the transaction: Mr. Wirt having, as he supposed, established the position, that the jury had a right to decide the law as well as the fact, he proceeded to state that the Constitution was the supreme law of the land, and, therefore, that since the jury had a right to decide the law, and the Constitution was also the law, the jury must certainly have a right to decide the constitutionality of a law made under it; and this conclusion was, as he declared, perfectly syllogistic. As Mr. Wirt had assumed the character of a logician in his argument, nothing could be more natural than for the judge, in his answer, to assume the same character; he therefore replied, like a logician, "a non sequitur, sir"—the correct answer to a syllogism, which is rather lame in its conclusion. But it seems this answer was accompanied by a certain bow. As bows, sir, according to the manner they are made, may, like words, according to the manner they are uttered, convey very different meanings; and as it is as difficult to determine the merit or demerit of a bow without having seen it, as it is the expression of words without having heard them; to discover, therefore, whether there was anything rude or improper in this bow, I could have wished that the witness, who complained so much of its effect, had given us a fac simile of it. Had we been favored not only with the answer, but also with a complete fac simile of the bow, we might have been enabled to have judged of the propriety of my honorable client's conduct in this instance. But it seems this bow, together with the "non sequitur," entirely discomfited poor Mr. Wirt, and down he sat "and never word spake more!" If so, it was a saving of time. But we have no proof that Mr. Wirt meant to have proceeded any further in the argument, even had he not been encountered with this formidable bow and non sequitur. And the presumption is, that having condensed the whole force of his argument into a syllogistic form, and, finding his syllogism did not produce the conviction intended, he took his seat without wishing to spend more of his breath in what, after the failure of his logical talents, he no doubt considered a fruitless attempt. Mr. Nicholas followed Mr. Wirt. He is a gentleman mild and polite in his manners; he was treated by the court with politeness. He did not persist in addressing the jury contrary to the decisions of the court; he, therefore, met with no interruptions.

We have now more particularly to discuss the charges made against Judge Chase, as they relate to Mr. Hay, the other counsel for Callender. Mr. Hay insisted that the indictment could not be supported, because the title of Callender's publication, parts of which were charged to be libellous, was not inserted in the indictment, to wit, because it was not stated in the indictment that the book, which contained the libellous matter was called "The Prospect Before Us." And to support this objection, he went on to prove that, when an indictment states libellous writings in tenor following, the libellous part of the writing set forth, and on which the indictment is found, must be set forth "verbatim et literatim." There was no attempt to shew that any expression in the indictment was not stated correctly both verbally and literally, as published by Callender. The indictment did not charge the title of the book as being libellous. It did not notice the title of the book in any manner. If the title of the book was necessary to have been inserted, which I deny, there could not have been a more absurd or inconclusive argument to support the position, than that upon which Hay relied; and the judge showed great temper in merely exposing it to ridicule in the manner he did, by observing that, as he insisted the libellous matter should be set out verbatim et literatim, he wondered he had not also insisted it should be set forth punctuatim. An observation, by the by, which, perhaps, contained full as much of good sense as of smartness, since we all know the same words written or printed, will be liable to different constructions, and convey very different meanings, as they are punctuated. Mr. Hay, it appears from his own testimony, as well as the testimony of the other witnesses, was guilty of very improper conduct to the court. He insisted that, if the prisoner was convicted upon that indictment, he might again be indicted for the same offence, and could not defend himself by the conviction on the indictment then before the court. When the court assured him he was mistaken in the law, Mr. Hay still persisted, and declared that he should not be more surprised, even if Mr. Callender should again be indicted for the same offence, and should be punished a second time for the same offence, than he was surprised at the indictment then before the court, and the attempt to punish Callender in consequence of that indictment. What language, I pray you, could be used to the court, but in reality addressed to the populace, more derogatory to the then Administration, as being unprincipled and oppressive, or containing a more direct attack upon the integrity of the judges, holding them up as the venal tools of the then Administration, ready to be the instruments of its oppression!

What was also the final conduct of Mr. Hay, when having repeatedly attempted to argue to the jury against the direction of the court, and having as repeatedly been interrupted and stopped by the court? He took up his papers to withdraw; upon which the court told him, if he pleased he might proceed. His answer was, "I will not." When the court further observed, you will not Mr. Hay be captious, go on if you please in any manner you choose, and we will not interrupt you. Even then, when in my opinion the court had, as in Fries's case, made improper concessions, what was his answer? "I am not captious, but I will not proceed." And he folded up his papers and withdrew.

How came he thus to act? As to Callender, he acknowledges he despised the wretch; that his object was to serve the cause, not Callender. How was he to serve the cause? By giving an impression to the public mind. What impression did he wish to give? By holding up the idea of oppression on the part of the Government, and corruption on the part of the court. But finding himself thus foiled in his attempt by the superior abilities of my honorable client, and his superior knowledge of mankind; finding that instead of exciting indignation against my client, my client most fortunately had excited against him the laughter and ridicule of the auditors, he went out in a passion. At the same time, even the manner in which he left the court showed his wish to impress the public mind, as far as possible, with sentiments disadvantageous to the court. And as to the interruptions Mr. Hay received, they are clearly proved to be in consequence of his pertinaciously attempting to act contrary to the direction of the court, and in that case the only question could be, whether the court or Mr. Hay had the control over the other.

But, sir, there is another charge which has been made against my honorable client, to justify that part of the article which accuses him of rudeness. It is said that speaking of Callender's counsel, or addressing himself to them, he called them "young gentlemen." To me it appears astonishing that these expressions, if used by the judge, should be thought reproachful to the counsel, or a proper subject of a criminal charge; and it gave me real pleasure to find that Mr. Nicholas, whose whole conduct marks him as a gentleman, did not consider them as offensive. He has observed that he was young at the time, and whoever has seen him as a witness, must be convinced of the truth of his assertion. But we are told that Mr. Wirt was at that time about thirty years of age, had been a married man, and was then a widower. It doth not appear that Judge Chase knew of these circumstances; but if he had, considering that Mr. Wirt was a widower, he certainly erred on the right side, if it was an error, in calling him a young gentleman. But, sir, let it be considered that my honorable client has been stated by the honorable Managers, to be nearly three score and ten, let also his great legal attainments be considered, and let me ask, if any person can think his addressing gentlemen, so much inferior to himself in age and knowledge, by the epithet of "young gentlemen," offensive to them, much less criminal as to the public? But as another instance of his rudeness we are told, that, addressing himself to Mr. Wirt, who observed that "he was going on," the judge replied, "No, sir, I am going on, therefore sit down, sir." This address was made by the judge to Mr. Wirt, when he (the judge) was about to give a long opinion to him and the counsel employed with him, which opinion, upon Mr. Wirt's sitting down, the court did give: and pray, sir, was there the least impropriety in a situation of that nature, that the court should desire the counsel to be silent and to take their seats?

Before Judge Chase went from Baltimore to hold the circuit court at Richmond, he knew that the sedition law had been violated in Virginia. I had myself put into his hands "The Prospect Before Us." He felt it his duty to enforce the laws of his country. What, sir, is a judge in one part of the United States to permit the breach of our laws to go unpunished because they are there unpopular, and in another part to carry them into execution, because there they may be thought wise and salutary? And would you really wish your judges, instead of acting from principle, to court only the applause of their auditors? Would you wish them to be what Sir Michael Foster has so correctly stated, the most contemptible of all characters, popular judges; judges who look forward, in all their decisions, not for the applause of the wise and good, of their own consciences, of their God, but of the rabble, or any prevailing party? I flatter myself that this honorable Senate will never, by their decision, sanction such principles! Our Government is not, as we say, tyrannical, nor acting on whim or caprice. We boast of it as being a Government of laws. But how can it be such, unless the laws, while they exist, are sacredly and impartially, without regard to popularity, carried into execution? What, sir, shall judges discriminate? Shall they be permitted to say, "this law I will execute, and that I will not; because in the one case I may be benefitted, in the other I might make myself enemies?" And would you really wish to live under a Government where your laws were thus administered? Would you really wish for such unprincipled, such time-serving judges? No, sir, you would not. You will with me say, "Give me the judge who will firmly, boldly, nay, even sternly, perform his duty, equally uninfluenced, equally unintimidated by the "Instantis vultus tyranni, or the "ardor civium prava jubentium!" Such are the judges we ought to have; such I hope we have, and shall have. Our property, our liberty, our lives, can only be protected and secured by such judges. With this honorable Court it remains, whether we shall have such judges!

The remaining part of this charge states that my honorable client "betrayed an indecent solicitude for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, and as highly disgraceful to the character of a judge as it was subversive of justice!" I am not certain, sir, whether I exactly know what is here meant by a public prosecutor. If thereby is meant the public officer who prosecutes those charged with being guilty of crimes against the public, I am indeed sorry to find that those officers, so necessary, are holden by the House of Representatives of the United States in so incorrect a point of view. I deny, sir, the propriety of the remark, and must be permitted to rescue the public prosecutor from a remark so derogatory. He is as much the protector of innocence as the avenger of guilt; his duties are as clearly marked as those of a judge. They have both one common object in view, though acting in different characters. The prosecutor and the judge are equally bound to shield the innocent and to punish the guilty. The prosecutor does the same benefit to his country by saving the innocent from punishment as by preventing the guilty from impunity. Neither the judge nor the prosecutor ought to attempt to injure innocence. It is equally the duty of both to punish guilt. Such, sir, are my ideas; such, sir, I have ever understood the duties of an office, which I have held in the State of Maryland for twenty-seven years or more; and if my conduct had not been during that period consonant to these sentiments, I should indeed feel myself degraded and dishonored.

I have now, Mr. President, gone through the observations which have appeared to me necessary upon the four first articles. If I have been thought tedious, my apology is the respect I feel for the dignified source from which these charges have proceeded; from my inability to decide which of the charges the honorable Managers will most rely upon in their conclusion, and the consequent necessity of dilating upon them all; sensible of the extreme danger that, for want of exertions which indeed require greater abilities than I am able to bring into action, erroneous impressions should remain in any instance upon the minds of this honorable Court, in a case of such public magnitude, and in which my honorable client is so deeply interested, for his sake, for the sake of my country, I have felt it a sacred duty to exert those few talents which Providence hath been pleased to bestow upon me!

[It was now five o'clock, when Mr. Martin informed the Senate that he had not breakfasted that morning, and had not during that day taken any refreshment of any kind, except two glasses of wine and water; that the fifth and sixth articles yet remained to be investigated by him, as being altogether of a legal nature; and that he felt himself too much exhausted to proceed—solicited the indulgence of the Court to permit him to conclude on Monday, which was granted, and the Court accordingly adjourned.]

MONDAY, February 25.

Mr. MARTIN proceeded as follows:

After having returned my very sincere thanks to this honorable Court for their polite attention on Saturday, in giving me time till this morning, I will now proceed to the further investigation of the case in which we are engaged. But before I call your attention to the fifth and sixth articles of impeachment, permit me to notice some few points that I find had been unattended to by me on Saturday.

When a witness (Mr. Rind) who had been in some degree concerned in printing "The Prospect Before Us," appeared at the trial of Callender to give evidence against him, we are told Judge Chase assured him that he might be under no apprehension from giving testimony, for that he should not be prosecuted on account of anything he should disclose on that trial.

What is the fact from the evidence? Mr. Rind, it seems, was summoned as a witness. He came forward, without any objection on his part, to give evidence. It was then that Mr. Hay, in order to throw impediments in the way of the prosecution, undertook to interfere with the witness of the United States, and to tell him that he was not obliged to give testimony, as it might criminate himself. The judge replied, it was very true, but that the court would take care that the witness should not be prosecuted on account of anything he should disclose in his evidence, which might affect himself. By this the court only meant that they would not institute any criminal prosecution against the witness, and if any indictment should be found against him grounded on the testimony thus given by him, they would interfere with Government to procure a nolle prosequi, or pardon; and on these conditions, and under such promises, it is a most usual practice to introduce associates and accomplices to give evidence for the conviction of other and greater criminals. But this is suggested to have been improper in the judge; and one of the witnesses, the present Attorney General of Virginia, has, on his examination, rather hazarded the idea, that any interference of the nature in question ought to have been by the United States Attorney for that district, and not by the court.

The gentleman is mistaken. In Great Britain when an accomplice is produced to be a witness, his production, and the security he hath against prosecution on account of anything which he may disclose having a tendency to criminate himself, is the act of the court, and not of the public prosecutor, except so far as it is done under the direction and with the court's approbation. To support this position I will again turn to M'Nally, page 203:

"The admitting an accomplice as a witness for the Crown, is not a matter granted by the court as of course, but depends upon the question, whether the indictment can be found, and supported without his evidence. As in the King vs. Robert and William Luckhurst, Maidstone, Lent Assizes, 1798. Counsel for the Crown moved that Avery, an accomplice, might be brought before the grand jury to give evidence on a bill of indictment. Justice Buller said it was not a motion of course, and he desired the counsel to read over his brief, and certify that there was not sufficient evidence to convict without the testimony of the accomplice, otherwise he would not allow the motion, because it might be the means of letting off the worst offender, and punishing those to whom otherwise, according to circumstances, mercy might be shown, and he instanced a similar case which happened at York Assizes. The counsel then stated that this offender had been before admitted King's evidence against the others by the committing justice. Buller said that he would not pay any regard to that, because it ought not to be in the power of a justice of the peace to say who ought and who ought not to be admitted King's evidence. The counsel thereupon said, that on reading the indictment and his brief, he thought the accomplice ought to be admitted as evidence, and his motion was granted"—that is, by the court.

This authority clearly shows, that in England it is considered the province of the court to decide when, and on what terms accomplices shall be introduced as witnesses; and such has been the uniform practice in Maryland. And here let me observe before I quit this subject, as to Mr. Hay's conduct, that although this witness came forward voluntarily to give testimony, without making any objection on his part, Mr. Hay, to obstruct the prosecution, officiously interfered as far as he could, to deprive the United States of the testimony necessary to convict the offender, and to dissuade the witness from being sworn. A conduct, I confess, I cannot but view as being at least highly censurable; yet, sir, my honorable client suffered it to pass without even the smallest reprimand! This did not show a disposition on the part of Judge Chase to be captious, even with Mr. Hay.

There was another part of the testimony which I omitted to notice. I will now do it, lest the gentleman who comes after me might make the same omission. It has been suggested by two of the witnesses, that the court, in one instance, used the word "we," in the plural number, as identifying the court with the prosecutor of the United States. Mr. Hay has stated it to have been on the following occasion; when the counsel for Callender reproached the court with being guilty of partiality, in requiring the questions by them propounded to Col. Taylor to be reduced to writing, although the court had not made a similar requisition of the prosecutor; the court, in reply, observed: "The attorney, when he opened his case, stated what he expected to prove; but although he did, we were not obliged to." He was asked if he was satisfied as to the correctness of these expressions; he replied in the affirmative, and being taken down as I have now introduced them, and read to him, he adhered to them. Some mistake there must be, for the words so stated are destitute of sense or meaning. "But though he did we were not obliged to." To do what? I presume to have compelled him to give us his questions in writing.

The sense then must have been, that as the attorney had disclosed what he meant to prove, and as there was no doubt of the propriety of the evidence, therefore they, the court, were not obliged to require of him to put his questions in writing. This construction reduces the answer to common sense and propriety, and frees the answer from obscurity and from censure. Mr.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Nicholas thinks the word "we" was used in one instance by the court, as understood by him, in the same incorrect manner, as identifying the court with the attorney, but not at the time, or on the occasion to which Mr. Hay alludes; he however is incapable to specify at what time, or on what occasion. I ask, sir, upon such evidence, so uncertain, so vague, so unsupported, can any criminality be fixed, as to this part of the charge, upon my honorable client?

Indulge me, sir, with a few remarks on certain private and social conversations, which it seems have taken place between the judge and some others, and which, though perfectly innocent of themselves, have been pressed into the service of this prosecution, and attempted to be distorted into criminality,—and I will then quit this part of the charges. A very worthy and respectable gentleman, with whom I have long been acquainted, (John T. Mason, Esq.) has been called upon to disclose a jocular conversation, which took place between him and my honorable client, a few days before he went on to Richmond, to hold the court at which Callender was tried. On that occasion he tells us, Judge Chase informed him that he was going to hold the court at Richmond, and that he was determined to teach the Virginia bar the difference between the liberty and licentiousness of the press. That as to himself, there was no person a greater friend to its real liberty, nor a more decided enemy to its licentiousness. Judge Chase further observed that he was in possession of a copy of "The Prospect Before Us," which I had given to him, and said either that if the State of Virginia was not totally debased, or, that if there was an honest jury to be found in that State, but Mr. Mason thinks the first, he would bring Callender to punishment. Mr. Mason has declared the conversation was open and public, in the presence of a number of gentlemen, perfectly jocular, and in great good humor, and it is proved the conversation was introduced by Mr. Mason himself, whose facetious talents are so well known. That gentleman has declared that it was painful to him to be obliged now to disclose what then passed. Nor can any person doubt it;—or that nothing but a sense of the obligation he owes to his country, when thus called upon to obey the claims society has upon him, could have induced him thus to disclose the particulars of this sportive and facetious conversation, introduced by himself, to gratify the views of any person, who would wish to turn it to the disadvantage of my honorable client.

But, sir, I will ask, in all this what is there that fixes any criminality on Judge Chase, or which indicated on his part a disposition to oppress? It was a fact notoriously known, that the bar of Virginia, in general did, or at least professed to, consider the sedition law unconstitutional, as unduly restraining the liberty of the press, that great palladium of our rights. On the contrary, my honorable client with many other respectable characters, legal and other, considered it as a wholesome and necessary restraint upon its licentiousness, and believed that such restraint was the best security for the preservation of its liberty. And on this subject let me introduce the authority of Dr. Franklin, himself a printer, and as great an advocate for the liberty of the press, as any reasonable man ought to be. He has declared that unless the slander and calumny of the press is restrained by some other law, it will be restrained by club law. The sentiment, sir, is just. If gentlemen cannot find in the laws of their country a protection from that profligate conduct of printers, which is at this time so common, or cannot obtain from the laws of their governments ample punishment against their base calumniators, they will become their own avengers. And to the bludgeon, the sword or the pistol, they will resort for that purpose. But to return to my client, it was his knowledge of the prevailing ideas of the Virginia bar that induced him to use expressions which amount to no more than his strong sense, that they had erroneous opinions as to what was the true liberty of the press, and did not properly distinguish between its liberty and its licentiousness.

And as to the determination he expressed that he would bring Callender to punishment, Mr. Mason has declared that everything the judge said on that subject was predicated upon the supposition, that Callender was, in reality, the author of The Prospect Before Us.

There was nothing then personal as to Callender, but only an honest indignation expressed against a vile libeller, whomever he might be.

The judge had in his hands one of the most flagitious libels ever published in America,—a case in which there had been the most impudent and daring violation of a law of the United States; he considered it his duty to put the law in force against such an offender. And was it not? Yes, sir, if a judge, either of his own knowledge, or by information derived from a respectable source, has reason to believe the laws of his country have been violated, particularly in cases of magnitude, it is his sacred duty to recommend to the grand jury an examination into such crimes, and to endeavor to bring their perpetrators to due punishment. I, sir, disclaim the idea, that a judge shows a want of impartiality because he is desirous to see guilt punished. I, sir have no idea, that our judges should be, like the gods of Epicurus, lolling upon their beds of down, equally careless whether the laws of their country are obeyed or violated, instead of actively discharging their duties. Judge Chase went to Richmond determined to enforce the laws of his country: it was an honest determination! He might, it is certain, under the frivolous pretences used for that purpose, have continued the cause to another term; he might by so doing have left the odium of enforcing this obnoxious law to be incurred by some other of the judges; by so doing my honorable client might have avoided the obloquy to which he has been exposed on account of this trial, and the impeachment, as far as it is founded thereon. But had he so done, in my opinion, he would be guilty of a cowardly dereliction of his duty.

Mr. Triplet has also been introduced to prove casual conversation in the moments of unsuspecting sociality and levity. He it seems travelled in the public stage with Judge Chase to Richmond. On the second day of their journey, having formed an acquaintance during that time, some conversation being introduced relative to Callender, Mr. Triplet informed the judge that Callender had, when he first came to Virginia, been taken up in Berkley county as a vagrant; and Judge Chase replied "it is a pity that they had not hung the rascal." And this is introduced to prove that the judge left Baltimore with a predetermination to oppress and do injustice to Callender!

I have, sir, heard, I believe, more than one hundred of the most respectable gentlemen of all political parties use similar expressions, not only when speaking of Callender, but also of some other printers; but these expressions I only considered as marking their disapprobation of the conduct of those printers, not as a proof they would be guilty of injustice towards them, or that they would do them any unauthorized injury. Triplet had in the stage informed my client that he had never seen Callender; the judge meeting him at the door of the tavern, where they both lodged, as he came from court, the day on which the bench-warrant issued, observed to Triplet, "that the marshal had gone after Callender, therefore that he probably would have the pleasure of seeing him,"—and a day or two after informed Triplet that the marshal had returned without Callender, and he was afraid they should not catch the damned rascal that court. Triplet has told us he boarded with Judge Chase at the same tavern six days; they were travelling together three days: during this whole time of nine days, such only are the scraps of loose, idle conversation, which have been picked up and brought forward as indicating a hostile and oppressive principle towards Callender.

As to the word "damned," which has been introduced in the conversation, however it may sound elsewhere in the United States, I cannot apprehend it will be considered very offensive, even from the mouth of a judge on this side of the Susquehanna;—to the southward of that river it is in familiar use, generally introduced as a word of comparison,—supplying frequently the place of the word "very,"—not confined to cases where we mean to convey censure, but frequently connected with subjects the most pleasing; thus we say indiscriminately a very good or a damned good bottle of wine; a damned good dinner, or a damned clever fellow.

But, sir, what must at once efface every pretence of a disposition hostile and oppressive towards Callender on the part of Judge Chase is, the mildness of the punishment inflicted.

I now, Mr. President, shall proceed to the fifth and sixth articles of impeachment—these relate to the process issued against Callender, and to the time at which it was made returnable. By the fifth article my client is charged with having "awarded a capias against Callender by which he was arrested and committed to close custody, although it is provided by an act of Congress, passed the 24th day of September, in the year 1789, that for any crime or offence against the United States the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found; and although it is provided by the laws of Virginia, that upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending, to appear and answer at the next court."

The criminality alleged against my honorable client by this article, as well as the sixth, consists in his violation of a law of the State of Virginia, by which it is supposed his conduct ought to have been regulated.

We find, from the evidence in this cause, that the legal character of that State, whether on the bench or at the bar, cannot agree among themselves as to what is the law of that State,—and that the practice has been and continues to be variant in Virginia. Nay, it is proved that two highly respectable legal characters who successively held the office of Attorney General, (Colonel Innes and General Brooke,) were applied to by one of their deputies, and declared themselves incapable to decide what ought to be the practice, or in other words, to decide in which case a summons ought to be issued and in what cases a capias was the proper process. Surely then Judge Chase, who was a stranger in Virginia, cannot be considered criminal nor even subject to reproach for not understanding a law of that State, the true construction of which remains even now a question, upon which the Virginia judges and lawyers find it impossible to agree.

Upon these observations I think I might safely rest my client's defence, as to this charge—and even consent that he shall be convicted and removed from office, whenever they shall agree among themselves upon the construction of their law,—provided it should be against us.

But, sir, I must request to be indulged in an endeavor to investigate this subject which appears so intricate, and to try if I cannot throw such lights upon it as possibly may be serviceable to the gentlemen of the bar of that State, whose law is in question; and in this attempt I feel a confidence, that I shall be at least able to satisfy this honorable Court, Judge Chase, even if bound to conduct himself according to the laws of Virginia, which I utterly deny, and shall endeavor to disprove, acted not only free from criminality, but with the strictest propriety.

I shall lay down as a position, which will not be controverted, that in all personal actions, civil or criminal, instituted against individuals in Virginia as well as in Maryland, the process to bring them into answer to the suits is, and hath always been a capias, or process to arrest the body, except so far as by Legislative acts of the respective States, the law hath in certain cases been altered and other process directed. And I mean to show that every case in Virginia, civil or criminal, and some there are of both, where a summons is the legal process, arises out of the Legislative provisions, that is, the acts of Assembly of that State. And by examining the different acts, which have been passed upon this subject, we shall be able to ascertain what are the cases, and the only cases, wherein a summons ought to be issued. I have, sir, before me the laws of Virginia antecedent to the American Revolution; it is the edition printed at Williamsburg, by Rind, Purdie, and Dixon, in the year 1769. It appears, sir, that until the year seventeen hundred and forty-eight, suits might be brought in the county court for any sum exceeding twenty-five shillings current money, or two hundred pounds of tobacco; and actions of trover or detinue without regard to the value of the article converted or detained; in all such actions a capias ad respondendum was the first process issued, authorizing the sheriff to take the body of the defendant into his custody, and have him before the court at the time when his writ was returnable. In that year a law was passed, chap. 4th, by the 26th sec. of which it is enacted, "that for the more speedy recovery of small debts, it shall be lawful for the justices of any county court to hear and determine all suits brought for any debt or demand, due by judgment, obligation, or account for any sum or sums of money or tobacco of the value of twenty-five shillings current money, or two hundred pounds of tobacco, and not exceeding five pounds of like money, or one thousand pounds of tobacco, by petition, without the solemnity of a jury; and where the demand shall not exceed the above-mentioned sums, the plaintiff shall proceed by petition, and not otherwise." After directing in what manner the claim is to be set forth in the petition, the same section directs that "upon filing such petition in the clerk's office, a summons of course shall be issued returnable to the next court (the courts were then held monthly,) a copy of which, together with the copy of the petition and accounts shall be delivered to the defendant, or left at his or her usual place of abode, ten days at least before the next succeeding court, and the same being returned executed by a sworn officer, or oath made of the due service thereof, if the defendant do not then appear, it shall be lawful for the said justice to hear and examine into the truth of the matter so complained of, and to determine the cause on the evidence produced, or to dismiss the petition, as to them shall seem just. And if the defendant do appear, he shall forthwith put in such answer or plea thereto as will bring the matter of complaint in issue thereupon: Or if he fails to plead, the court shall instantly proceed to hear and determine the cause in a summary way upon such evidence as shall be given, and shall give judgment according as the very right of the cause and matter in law shall appear unto them, without regard to form or want of form." &c.

By the 22d sec. of the same law, it is enacted "that when any person entitled to an action of trover or detinue shall set forth the value of the thing demanded to be under the value of five pounds, in a petition to any county court, a summons shall issue, and the same proceedings shall be had as in cases for the recovery of small debts." But for the recovery of any penalty for the breaches of the penal laws of the then colony, no change was made as to the mode of instituting the action. The process of capias to arrest the offender, the right of trial by jury in such actions, as to these subjects, the law was left as before: and yet actions of this nature were under the consideration of the Legislature; for we find in sec. 23, of the same law, "that for the easier, speedier, and better advancement of justice in obtaining judgments in any such suit or action, where the penalty sued for shall not exceed five pounds, current money, or one thousand pounds of tobacco, if in such suit any demurrer shall be joined and entered therein, in any court of record within said dominion, the judges shall proceed and give judgment according to the very right of the case, and as the matter of the law shall appear to them, without regarding any imperfection, omission, or defect, &c., except those only which the party demurring shall specially and particularly set down and express, together with his demurrer, as causes of the same, notwithstanding, &c. And that if any verdict should be given in any such action or suit, in any court of record in said dominion, the judgment thereupon shall not be staid or reversed for or by reason of any default in the form or want of form, of any writ, &c., any law, statute, or usage, to the contrary notwithstanding."

And here, sir, it may perhaps be proper to observe, that in Virginia, at least before the Revolution, the penalties inflicted for the breach of their penal laws, were commonly by the acts themselves directed in what mode to be recovered, which mode was almost universally directed to be "by information, bill, plaint, or action of debt, in any court of record within said dominion, wherein no essoin, protection, or wager of law, privilege or any more than imparlance shall be allowed." [Mr. Martin turned to a variety of the penal laws to show such were the provisions.] This honorable Court will perceive that under these provisions, the penalties could not be recovered by presentment and indictment, as hath frequently been determined; hence the usual suits or actions resorted to in the courts of Virginia, for the recovery of those penalties from the smallest to the greatest, were informations or actions of debts. And the twenty-third section which I have just read relates to such informations or actions of debt, where the penalty should not exceed five pounds, and to those only applies such regulations as are thereby made, which however do not alter the form of action or nature of the process to be issued, even in those cases, but leaves the law in those respects as it was before.

However, during the same session, in their legislative disquisitions, they thought proper to take away the trial by jury in proceedings by presentment, to recover penalties not exceeding five pounds; to give the courts summary jurisdiction in those cases; and to take away the process of a capias therein. And hence having by the first section of chapter 7, (see page 188, laws of Virginia,) enabled grand juries to present breaches of all penal laws of that then colony: by the second section it is thus enacted, "that when any offence or offences should be presented by a grand jury, and the penalty or forfeiture by law, infringed thereon, shall not exceed five pounds current money, or one thousand pounds of tobacco, be it to the King and informer, or to the party and informer only, or appropriated to any other use whatever, such presentment need not be drawn up in other form than as the same stands presented by the grand jury, and thereupon the court shall order a summons forthwith to issue, to summons any person, so presented, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court, (as I have before observed, the courts were then held monthly,) and shall not admit of any exception or pleading to the form or manner thereof, but shall proceed to trial, without the formality of a jury, and give judgment upon such presentment, according as the very right of the cause and matter in law shall appear to them; and if the party summoned fails to appear, the court may give judgment for the penalty."

Thus, sir, the law of Virginia remained until the Revolution, and from this view it will appear that the only cases, where, in personal civil actions, the process was to be by summons, and not by capias, were where debts were claimed not exceeding five pounds, or one thousand pounds of tobacco, or property converted or detained not exceeding the same value, in all which cases the suit or action was to be instituted by petition, and the court was to decide in a summary manner, without the intervention of a jury.

And that the only case, in criminal proceedings, where a summons was directed to issue, is where a presentment hath been made by a grand jury, for an offence, the penalty whereupon shall not exceed five pounds current money, or one thousand pounds of tobacco, which presentment need not be drawn up in any other form; and on presentment the court was to decide in a summary manner, without the intervention of a jury. This honorable Court will also perceive, that the provision of this act directing summons to issue in the case I have stated can only apply to presentments made under the local, penal laws of Virginia, where the penalty is restrained to a sum not exceeding five pounds current money, or a thousand pounds of tobacco, and cannot extend to presentments for offences at common law, such as assaults, riots, &c. since in all such cases the courts have a discretionary power to fine what sum they think reasonable, and therefore, may fine beyond five pounds current money, or a thousand pounds of tobacco. Nor doth the provision extend to any case even under the penal laws of Virginia, where the court may punish by imprisonment. Upon this examination of the subject, it appears that until the time of the American Revolution, according to the laws of Virginia, a capias remained the proper process in all personal civil actions, except where the claim was for money or debts due not exceeding five pounds current money, or one thousand pounds of tobacco; or where, in detinue or trover, the plaintiff laid the value of the property not exceeding the aforesaid sum, and that in criminal cases a capias remained the proper process in all proceedings for offences at common law; and for all offences against the acts of the State of Virginia where the court may inflict a fine of more than five pounds current money, or which were punishable by imprisonment. Having thus shown what was the law on this subject at the time of the American Revolution, I have, sir, to examine what changes and alterations have been made therein since that period.

The first law made since the Revolution was passed in the year 1792, and is to be found in the edition of the Virginia laws, published by Augustine Davis, in the year 1794, page 96; the thirty-seventh section increases the amount of the debt, which may be recovered by the petition in the county, city, or borough court, to a sum not exceeding twenty dollars, or eight hundred pounds of tobacco, directing process to be by summons and the mode of procedure for recovery of the same as for recovery of small debts before and at the time of the Revolution. The thirty-eighth section also increases the value of the property where in trover and detinue, petition may be filed and proceedings be had as before the Revolution, to the sum of twenty dollars, or eight hundred pounds of tobacco.

In the same year an act was passed, to be found page 106, by the sixth section of which it is enacted, "that in a presentment to the county or corporation courts, if the penalty of the offence exceed not five dollars, or three hundred pounds of tobacco; or to the district court, if the penalty exceed not twenty dollars, or one thousand pounds of tobacco, no information thereupon shall be filed, but a summons shall thereupon be issued against the defendant to answer the said presentment, and such summons having been served upon him, or a copy thereof having been left at his usual place of abode, and if he doth not appear, judgment shall be given by the court against him for the penalty, and if he doth appear, the court shall in a summary way, without the intervention of a jury, hear and determine," &c. And by the thirty-seventh section of chapter 74, page 113, there is a general provision, that where no presentment may be made, yet where the penalty incurred by the breach of any penal law shall not exceed twenty dollars, or eight hundred pounds of tobacco, the same may be sued for and recovered in the manner directed by law for debts of like amount.

This clause was designed to prevent informations or actions of debt to be originally instituted for the recovery of penalties not exceeding that sum, where no presentments should be made, add to direct a procedure by petition in which also the process must be a summons, and the decision by the court in a summary manner.

One other provision, and one only, hath been made for issuing a summons; this is found in the twenty-fourth section of the same act, and runs thus: "No information for a trespass or misdemeanor, shall be filed in any court, but by express order of the court entered on record, nor unless the party supposed to be culpable shall have failed to appear and show good cause to the contrary, having been required to do so by a summons, appointing a convenient time for

Trial of Judge Chase.

'that purpose, served upon him, or left at his usual place of abode."

These are the only acts of the Virginia Legislature I find on this subject—I believe there are no others. If there are any more, the honorable Managers will be so obliging as to point them out; but presuming that they can produce no further provisions, what is the result of this investigation? That even at this time, the only instances in personal civil actions where summons is the proper process, are where the demand for money due, or on account of trover or detinue, doth not exceed twenty dollars, or eight hundred pounds of tobacco, in which case the proceeding is to be by petition and the court determine in a summary manner without the intervention of a jury. And in criminal cases, or for recovery of penalties for the breach of their penal laws, the only cases where a summons is the regular process are where the actions are instituted by presentment of a grand jury, on which presentment no information is to be filed, or without such presentment by petition, for the recovery of penalties not exceeding twenty dollars, or its correspondent value in tobacco; which cases can only arise under the acts of Assembly of Virginia, and not where the offences are at common law—nor in any case even under the laws of Virginia, where punishment may be by imprisonment; that the only additional instance, in which a summons is to be used in a criminal case, is where application is made for an information—and there it is directed in order that the party may have an opportunity to show cause why an information shall not be ordered against him: but even in this case, if the information is ordered, a capias is the process to bring the party to answer the charge contained in such information,—as it remains to be in every other criminal prosecution or suit, except those which I have already particularly designated.

I will now, sir, turn to the law of the State of Virginia, with the violation of which we are charged; but first let me premise it is most erroneously stated in the article of impeachment; how this hath happened is not for me to say, but such is the fact: the article of impeachment sets forth, that "it is provided by the laws of Virginia, that upon presentment by any grand juror of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending to appear," &c.; whereas in truth the words of the law are, "upon presentment made by the grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons or other proper process against the person or persons," &c. (See page 112, section 28, same edition, laws of Virginia.)

Thus then the very law points out that upon such presentments a summons is not in all cases a proper process, but that a summons is to issue, or other proper process, according to the nature of the offences presented. That is, as I have already shown, a summons is to be issued where presentments are made for a violation of the penal laws of their State, punishable by a fine of not more than twenty dollars, or its corresponding quantity of tobacco, nor by imprisonment; but in all present-ments for offences at common law, or for breaches of their penal laws punishable by fine beyond twenty dollars or by imprisonment, in such cases the clerk must issue a capias, that being the proper process. And upon these principles it has been determined in the circuit court of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, acting under the laws of Virginia, that on presentments for assaults and battery, and other common law offences, a capias is the proper process to be issued; and this determination has been made while a gentleman of great legal knowledge, a native of Virginia, and who received his legal education in that State, (John Thompson Mason, Esq.) prosecuted in that court for the United States, upon whose application, I presume, the determination was made.

I will now examine the law of the United States, passed the 24th September, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," section 33; "And be it further enacted, That for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace, or other magistrate of any of the United States, where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against such offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by this act has cognizance of this offence; and copies of this process shall be returned, as speedily as may be, into the clerk's office of such court, together with the recognisances of the witnesses for their appearance to testify in the case, which recognisance the magistrate before whom the examination shall be, may require on pain of imprisonment. And if such commitment of the offender or of the witnesses shall be in a district other than that in which the offence is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of that district where the delinquent is imprisoned, seasonably to issue, and of the marshal of the said district to execute, a warrant for the removal of the offender and the witnesses, or either of them, as the case may be, to the district into which the trial is to be had. And upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted," &c. This is the law of the United States, mentioned in the fifth article as governing the question now before us, the basis on which this article is founded. The least examination will show that it provides only for the manner in which offenders shall be arrested under warrants issued by the judicial officers of the United States or of the different States, upon complaint made to them, in order that such offender may be bailed or committed, and witnesses bound over to the approaching proper courts, that the offences may be inquired of by a grand jury, and hath no relation to the manner in which process shall be issued by a court to bring in offenders to answer to presentments which are depending in the court. And a similar provision for arrests in such cases is made by the acts of Assembly of Virginia, in that State. [See 17th sec. chap. 67, page 93, same edition of Virginia laws.]

Trial of Judge Chase.

But that the aforesaid act of Congress can in no manner relate to, or be regulated by, any law of Virginia, directing a summons to be issued as the proper process, appears clearly from this, that the offender is to be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, according to the nature of the offence; but no person can be arrested on process of summons, or on such process be compelled to give bail, under pain of imprisonment. This can only be done when a capias, or similar process, such as a magistrate's warrant, or the warrant of a court, called a bench warrant, is issued! And here, sir, let me explain what is meant by a bench warrant. When a presentment is made by a grand jury against a person not imprisoned nor recognised, process is issued to arrest the offender and bring him before the court then in session; as when an application is made to a judge or a justice out of court, and oath made of an offence committed, it becomes the duty of such judge or justice to issue his warrant to take the offender into custody, and thereby secure his appearance at court to answer to any presentment which may be made against him; so, when a presentment is made by a grand jury of any offence, that presentment being made by the oath of not less than twelve of the grand jurors, founded also on the oath of witnesses, it authorizes the court upon this proof that an offence has been committed, to issue process commanding the sheriff to arrest the offender presented, and bring him before them, to be bailed or committed, according to the nature of the crime with which he is charged. This process is what in Maryland is called a bench warrant. It differs from the warrant issued by a judge or justice, inasmuch as this last is directed to a constable, the other to a sheriff. It differs from the common capias only in this, that the bench warrant is made returnable immediately, that is, during the session of the court, whereas, what is commonly called a capias, is returnable to the succeeding term. And in Maryland, it is the constant practice of our courts, whenever presentments are made against persons not in confinement nor under recognisance, to issue such process in all cases, from the highest to the lowest offences, in order to secure the persons presented.

I have said, sir, that the law relied on by the House of Representatives in support of this article doth not relate to process issued on presentments made in the courts of the United States; and as a further proof of this, I now refer this honorable Court to the fourteenth section of the same law, where it is enacted "That all the before-mentioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." By this provision, a power is given to the courts of the United States to issue such process as in their discretion they shall think best, so that it be consistent with the general principles and usages of law. And the act of the United States, entitled "An act in addition to an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, passed on the 2d March, 1793," in its seventh section has the following provision, to wit: "That it shall be lawful for the several courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts, directing the return of their writs and processes, the filing of declarations and other pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering and making up judgment or default, and other matters in the vacation and otherwise, in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States, to regulate the practice of the said courts, respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings." This act gives the courts of the United States full power to regulate the return of process as to time and everything else; the former law gave them the power of issuing such process as in their judgment and discretion they should think most proper. On these subjects, then, they are uncontrolled, unrestrained by the laws or the practice of any State or State courts. The courts of the United States having this power, can only exercise it as the case comes before them; they then determine what is right and proper, and that becomes a precedent in similar cases, and thus it was the court acted in the case of Callender, as to the process issued and the time of its return, and was perfectly justified by the laws of the United States in so acting.

The sixth article alleges that by the laws of Virginia it is provided, that in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall be made, and yet that my honorable client, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of Callender, did, at the said court at which he was presented, rule and adjudge him to trial during the term at which he, Callender, was presented and indicted, and this, notwithstanding the provisions of the thirty-fourth section of the aforesaid law of the United States, mentioned in the fifth article, which provides "that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States where they apply."

In answer to this charge, sir, permit me to state there is no law in Virginia that declares the offender, presented for an offence not capital, shall not be tried until the succeeding term; it is only an inference, which that honorable body, who formed the articles of impeachment, have made from the supposition that in all such cases a summons only could be issued, returnable to the succeeding term, and in consequence that the offender could not be compelled to go to trial before the succeeding term.

But, sir, I have already shown that summons was not the proper process in Callender's case; that the laws of Virginia were not in the least degree operative on either the process to be issued

nor the time or the manner of its return, but that the one and the other was solely in the power of the court, vested in them by the laws of the United States, unrestrained by any law of the State of Virginia. Thus, then, the premises failing from which the inference was drawn, the inference, of course, must be rejected. Thus, then, the court, unrestrained by any law of Virginia, or by any inference drawn therefrom, not only had a right to try Callender the same term he was indicted, but were bound in duty so to do, unless there was some good cause to justify the delay. When a presentment is made, there is such evidence that a crime has been committed, as to authorize the court, nay, to make it their duty, (as I have before observed,) to issue process to arrest the criminal to prevent his escape from justice. Our laws are not founded on the principle that the offender may have an opportunity to escape and elude justice; and hence it is that a grand jury is sworn to secrecy as to their deliberations, lest those offenders against whom inquiries are making, getting information of that fact, may run off before they can be secured. And, when the criminal is arrested and brought into court, it is the duty of the court, both as to the criminal and the public, to have the cause decided as soon as can be, consistent with justice. And now let me turn to the 34th section of the judiciary law of the United States, which is introduced in this article, and on which reliance is placed by that honorable House which hath prepared these articles. It is as follows: "That the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." I shall not, sir, enter here into a discussion whether a prosecution for the violation of a penal law of the United States, can be with propriety, within the meaning of this act, called a proceeding at common law. Nor shall I, sir, rely, as I might do, upon the observation, that they are only to be regarded "in cases where they apply," and that it is the court, and the court only, who are to determine in what cases they do apply; in doing which they are only required to exercise impartially their legal discretion; but I shall ask whether this law in any manner relates to the process to be issued to bring into court the party to the suit, antecedent to the trial, to compel him to appear in order that a trial may be had? I presume not. The provisions for that purpose are to be found in the 14th section of the law of September 24th, 1789, and in the 7th section of the law of March 2d, 1793, which I have already cited, and which regulate not only the issuing but the returning of process to bring the party into court, to answer to the charge, whether civil or criminal. According to my judgment, sir, the law in question means only to declare that the rules and decisions of the State courts, in any questions as to the right of the parties, shall be respected and attended to in similar questions, which may come into controversy in the courts of the United States, in their respective districts or circuits, as far as they shall be thought to apply in cases at common law; that is, if two cases exactly similar are in litigation, as to civil rights, the one in the State court, the other in the district or circuit court held in the same State, there ought to be in each case the same decision; and that where the law in the case had been settled by antecedent State decisions, the judges of the United States should respect those decisions. And also, that when the courts of the United States try a cause in any district or any circuit, the rights of the parties are to be decided according to the laws of the States under which rights were acquired, as settled by the legal decisions of the State courts, where decisions have been had. To exemplify my ideas, if the courts of the United States have on any occasion to determine, either immediately or incidentally, a right arising under a devise of lands in Maryland, they must determine the devise void, unless the will was attested by three witnesses. But if the devise was of lands in Virginia, the courts would be obliged to determine the devise good, although attested in a different manner. So, also, the obligation contracted by the execution of a promissory note is different if executed in Virginia, from what it is if executed in Maryland. Upon actions therefore which may be instituted in the courts of the United States in such cases, these courts ought to consider what are the rights of the parties according to the laws of the States where the transactions took place, and where there have been decisions of the State courts upon the subject-matter, or any decisions which may be considered as having a bearing on the question, the United States courts are to regard such decisions as far as they think they are applicable.

Thus, sir, I flatter myself, that I have upon the fifth and sixth articles shown that there was no law of Virginia by which the conduct of the judge was to be regulated, and that, even if the laws of that State had been operative, they have not been, according to their true construction, in any degree violated.

But surely it can never be seriously contended, that where a gentleman is appointed a judge of the United States, he is thereby expected to become perfectly acquainted with all the local laws, usages, and decisions of every separate State in the Union; no such judge by any possibility can be had. However great the legal knowledge of any gentleman, it has been generally confined to the laws, to the practice, the judicial proceedings of his own State, and to the common law as there used and introduced. From the perfect conviction of this truth, the district judge is appointed an inhabitant of the State which composes the district; he is supposed to know the particular laws, usages, and decisions of his State. It is to him, or the District Attorney in his absence, the judge of the Supreme Court, when he goes to hold the circuit court, is expected to apply for information as to what relates to these subjects; and thus we find Judge Chase correctly acting; for the district judge being absent when Callender was presented, we find my honorable client consulting with the

Trial of Judge Chase.

District Attorney, whose political principles certainly did not lead him to wish to oppress Callender, and also with the clerk of the district court, who is himself a gentleman of legal knowledge, and a prosecutor in one of the State courts in Virginia; and it was under their advice and with their approbation that the process was issued, of the nature used, and returnable in the manner we have seen. In fine, sir, it is impossible for the Judges of the Supreme Court to have even a general knowledge of the particular State laws and practices, and if, in consequence of that want of knowledge, they were to be subject to impeachment, you would not be able to prevail upon any respectable character to accept the appointment. But, I do not apprehend, sir, that the honorable Managers place much reliance at this time on these two articles. Nor do I believe the honorable House of Representatives would have either adopted them or any of the articles which have been brought forward against Judge Chase, had the same evidence been before them which hath been produced before this honorable Court.

In saying this, I do not mean in the slightest degree to censure that honorable body, they were acting as a grand inquest of the nation; they only had, and they only could have, before them ex parte evidence. On the evidence which they had before them, I shall not suggest but what there was sufficient foundation for bringing forward the charges. But these charges have been patiently discussed; a mass of evidence hath been produced here, which they had not, and, after this full investigation, the honorable members who impeached him, and who have regularly attended his trial, I doubt not, are perfectly satisfied that he ought to be acquitted, and will rejoice at that acquittal.

Before I conclude, let me add one other proof that the framers of the Constitution never intended that juries should have any power to decide the law contrary to the instructions of the court, much less to decide upon the constitutionality of a law. By the 2d section of the 3d article of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided, that in all cases to which the judicial power applies, except cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State is a party, "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make."

Thus, therefore, it is in the power of Congress to authorize, in all such cases, an appeal to the Supreme Court, even as to the fact, from the verdict of a jury, and empower the Supreme Court to control the jury if they appear to have erred. And such was the intention of the framers of the Constitution!

They assumed as a principle, that the interests of the State governments and of the General Government would often be at variance; that laws passed by the United States, the most wise and salutary, might be very obnoxious to and unpopular in, some of the States; judges holding their commissions under the respective States, that is, the State judges, the framers of the Constitution would not, therefore, entrust with the execution of the laws of the United States. They also considered that, as far as juries were introduced, the jurors would be citizens of the respective States wherein the trials should be had, that they would, in consequence, probably partake of the interests, the prejudices, and the passions prevailing in the State, and therefore might decide contrary to the direction of the judges appointed by the United States, and thereby prevent the due execution of their laws. To obviate this, the Constitution has a provision for an appeal to the Supreme Court, even from the verdict of such a jury. Judge then whether the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated giving power to counsel to argue to jurors against the opinions of their judges, or juries to decide against such opinions.

I have now only to return to this honorable Court my sincere thanks for the patient attention with which they have indulged me on this occasion, and to express to you, Mr. President, the high sense I have of the impartiality, politeness, and dignity with which you have presided during this trial.

MR. HARPER.—It was greatly to be desired, Mr. President, and might have been confidently expected, that in a case every way so important, where it so greatly concerns the public happiness that the decision should command the public confidence, nothing would be presented to the view of this honorable Court in aid of the prosecution, except the law which ought to govern the decision, and the proofs relied on for supporting the allegations.

But it has not so seemed good to the honorable Managers. They have thought proper to introduce into the discussion, the political opinions and party connexions of the respondent, for the purpose of throwing a shade of doubt over his motives and of establishing inferences unfavorable to his character. How far this conduct ought to be commended, it is not for me to decide. My confidence in the justice and discernment of this honorable Court forbids me to apprehend that it can be successful.

But since these opinions and connexions have been introduced, permit me to use them for a different purpose.

The duty imposed on judges is at all times delicate, and in criminal cases, where life or liberty may be affected, where reputation, dearer than both, depends on the issue, this duty becomes peculiarly arduous and painful to an honorable and generous mind. But if there be a situation more delicate, more embarrassing than every other to such a mind, it is that of a judge sitting on the trial of a person who, from political opposition, or any other cause, may have excited hostile or angry feelings in his mind. It is then that he most fears to trust himself. It is then that he most dreads the influence of his passions in misleading his judgment. It is then that he feels the strongest alarm for his reputation, lest he should possibly afford ground for the suspicion that he had gratified his resentments under the semblance of executing the law. Hence he constantly leans towards the side of the accused, and requires the clearest conviction before he condemns. Hence he rejects all doubtful or contradictory testimony, lays out of the case all little indiscretions and slight shades of suspicion; and is rigid in requiring from the prosecutors the unequivocal proof of unequivocal offences. That his enemy is in his power, is always a reason for the utmost forbearance. The fear that he may possibly be misled by his passions, is always a reason for acquittal, where doubt can exist.

Need I invoke these noble and generous sentiments in the breasts of this honorable Court? No! my heart tells me I need not. I see on those benches distinguished soldiers and eminent statesmen, who have triumphed alike in the fields of politics and war, and who always disdained to tarnish their laurels by the blood or humiliation of a vanquished foe.

If then, the person now arraigned at your bar, be connected with a political party in opposition to any of those who sit as his judges; if it were possible that, in promoting the views of that party, he may have excited feelings of anger or resentment in the mind of any member of this honorable tribunal; if it were possible that any portion of the angry passions engendered by the conflicts of party could find a place within these hallowed walls, and could attach itself to him who stands upon his trial at this bar, the existence of such a possibility would furnish every member of this honorable Court with the strongest motives that can operate on a generous and noble mind, for leaning constantly to the side of the accused, and for pronouncing in favor of an acquittal, wherever there remains a doubt of guilt.

Attempts have also been made to enlist the sympathy of this honorable Court on the side of the prosecution, and for this purpose, a criminal twice convicted, who did not hesitate to risk civil bloodshed in support of political theories, and is now indebted for his life to the clemency of that Government against whose laws he armed his ignorant and misguided neighbors, is presented to view, decked out in all the ornaments which rhetoric can bestow. We, Mr. President, disclaim the aids, and protest against the interference of rhetoric and sympathy. However proper in other situations, they ought to be excluded from courts of justice, whose decisions should be governed by truth and not by feeling.

But if sympathy could find a place in this tribunal, what object more fit to awake it than that now presented at your bar? An aged patriot and statesman, bearing on his head the frost of seventy winters, and broken by the infirmities brought upon him by the labors and exertions of half a century, is arraigned as an offender, and compelled to employ, in defending himself against a criminal prosecution, the few and short intervals of ease allowed to him by sickness. Placed at the bar of a court, after having sat with honor for sixteen years on the bench, he is doomed to hear the most opprobrious epithets applied to his name by those whose predecessors were accustomed to look up to him with admiration and respect, and whose fathers would have been proud to have been numbered among his pupils. His footsteps are hunted from place to place, to find indiscretions which may be exaggerated into crimes. The jests which, flowing from the gayety and openness of his temper, were uttered in the confidence of private conversation; the expressions of warmth produced by the natural impetuosity of his character, are detailed by companions converted into spies and informers, and are adduced as proofs of criminal intention.

This cup, so full of bitterness for one who has been accustomed for forty years to fill the most honorable stations in his country, he drinks to the dregs without complaining. In this sad reverse, he supports himself with a calmness, a fortitude, and a resigned dignity which melt the hearts of those who are not his enemies, and extort the respect of those who are.

If sympathy must be excited, here let it find a nobler object. If from generous breasts it cannot be excluded, let it be turned towards and greatly supporting himself under a pressure of evils the most afflicting that an elevated mind can know.

Not content with endeavoring to blow up a flame of party spirit against the respondent, and to engage sympathy in the ungracious, and to her unnatural, task of aiding a criminal prosecution, the honorable Managers have resorted to a principle as novel in our laws and jurisprudence as it is subversive of the Constitutional independence of the judicial department, and dangerous to the personal rights and safety of every man holding an office under this Government. They have contended "that an impeachment is not a criminal prosecution, but an inquiry in the nature of 'an inquest of office, to ascertain whether a person holding an office be properly qualified for his situation; or, whether it may not be expedient 'to remove him.' But if this principle be correct—if an impeachment be not indeed a criminal prosecution, but a mere inquest of office—if a conviction and removal on impeachment be indeed not a punishment, but the mere withdrawal of a favor of office granted—I ask why this formality of proceeding, this solemn apparatus of justice, this laborious investigation of facts? If the conviction of a judge on impeachment is not to depend on his guilt or innocence of some crime alleged against him, but on some reason of State policy or expediency, which may be thought by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senate, to require his removal, I ask why the solemn mockery of articles alleging high crimes and misdemeanors, of a court regularly formed, of a judicial oath administered to the members, of the public examination of witnesses, and of a trial conducted in all the usual forms? Why not settle this question of expediency, as all other questions of expediency are settled, by a reference to general political considerations, and in the usual mode of political discussion? No! Mr. President! This principle of the honorable Managers, so novel and so alarming; this desperate expedient, resorted to as the last and only prop of a case, which the honorable gentlemen feel to be unsupported by law or evidence; this forlorn hope of the prosecution, pressed into its service, after it was found that no offence against any law of the land could be proved, will not, cannot avail. Everything by which we are surrounded informs us that we are in a court of law. Everything that we have been three weeks employed in doing reminds us that we are engaged not in a mere inquiry into the fitness of an officer for the place which he holds, but in the trial of a criminal case on legal principles. And this great truth, so important to the liberties and happiness of this country, is fully established by the decisions of this honorable Court, in this case, on questions of evidence—decisions by which this court has solemnly declared, that it holds itself bound by those principles of law which govern our tribunals in ordinary cases. These decisions we accepted as a pledge, and now rely on as an assurance that this cause will be determined on no newly discovered notions of political expediency, or State policy, but on the well settled and well known principles of law and the Constitution.

The honorable Managers, indeed, are as much at war with themselves on this point, as with the Constitution and the laws. For when they have told us in one breath, that this is merely a question of policy and expediency, they resort in the next to legal authorities, both English and American, for the purpose of explaining the doctrine of impeachment, and of proving that the acts alleged against the respondent amount to impeachable offences; thus paying an involuntary homage to truth, and furnishing an instance of the irresistible power with which she forces herself on the mind, even when most obstinately determined to resist her. Let us also, Mr. President, be permitted to adduce the authority of an elementary writer, of very high authority, on the laws of England, in support of the principle for which we contend. Woodeson, in his Lectures, vol. 2, p. 611, treating on the law of impeachment, speaks thus: "As to the trial itself, it must of course vary in external ceremony, but differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments, prevail. For impeachments are not formed to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution, where it might be obstructed by the influence of two powerful delinquents, or not easily discerned in the ordinary course of jurisdiction, by reason of the peculiar quality of alleged crimes. The judgment therefore is to be such as is warranted by legal principles or precedents. In capital cases the mere stated sentence is to be specifically pronounced." Thus far this learned professor and commentator of the laws of England; and he cites as authorities for this doctrine Selden and the State Trials; the latter of which, this honorable Court need not be informed, is a collection of adjudged cases in the highest courts of England; and the former, a writer of great learning and very high authority, peculiarly tenacious of every principle tending to the security of public liberty, and not likely to mistake on a point so essential as the law of impeachment.

Thus we find that even in England, where the power of impeachment is subject to no express constitutional restrictions, and where abuses of that power, for the purpose of party persecution and State policy, have sometimes been committed, and more frequently attempted, an impeachment has never been considered as a mere inquest of office, but always as a criminal prosecution, differing not in essentials from those which are carried on before the ordinary tribunals of justice, and subject to the same rules of evidence, and the same legal maxims concerning crimes and punishments, as a proceeding contrived not to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution. These authorities, sanctioned by the practice of one hundred and fifty years, prove the principle for which we contend. Instances may, no doubt, be found in the history of that country where these salutary principles have been disregarded, and impeachments have been converted into engines of oppression. But this abuse does not destroy or impair the principle. That remains as eternal as the laws of reason and justice on which it is founded; while the abuse passes into oblivion, with the temporary interests and fleeting projects which it was made to subserve; or remains in our recollection as a sad monument of the excesses into which frail man is hurried by his passions.

And has not this great principle of English jurisprudence, which in that country has weathered so many storms of faction, revolution, and civil war, received the sanction also of this honorable Court? Has not testimony been rejected, because it was judged illegal, according to the ordinary rules of evidence? And how could those rules apply to this case, unless it were considered as a criminal prosecution?

The Constitution of the United States will as little bear out the Managers in their position as the laws of England. That Constitution gives the power of impeachment to the House of Representatives, and to the Senate the power of trying impeachments. Had the authors of that instrument, and those who adopted it, intended to leave this power at large, or to erect it into a general inquest, for inquiring into the qualifications of judges, and the expediency of removing them, nothing more would have been done than merely to give the power. But it will be found that various restrictions are imposed in the subsequent parts of the instrument, which prove that no person can be impeached except for an offence.

Thus, for instance, in speaking of the power of pardoning, the Constitution provides (Art. 2, Sec. 2) that "the President may grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." Is not this the same thing as saying, that cases of impeachment are cases of offences? What, Mr. President, are offences, in the language of the Constitution and the laws? For a definition of the term "offence," in a Constitutional sense, we must consult our law books, and not the caprice or the varying opinions of popular leaders or popular assemblies. Those books tell us, that the word "offence" means some violation of law. Whence it evidently follows, that no officer of Government can be impeached, unless he have committed some violation of the law, either statute or common. It is not necessary for me to contend, that this offence must be an indictable offence. I might safely admit the contrary, though I do not admit it; and there are reasons which appear to be unanswerable in favor of the opinion, that no offence is impeachable, unless it be also the proper subject of an indictment. But it is not necessary to go so far; and I can suppose cases where a judge ought to be impeached, for acts which I am not prepared to declare indictable. Suppose, for instance, that a judge should constantly omit to hold court; or should habitually attend so short a time each day as to render it impossible to despatch the business. It might be doubted whether an indictment would lie for those acts of omission, although I am inclined to think that it would. But I have no hesitation in saying, that a judge in such a case ought to be impeached. And this comes within the principle for which I contend; for these acts of culpable omission are a plain and direct violation of the law, which commands him to hold courts a reasonable time for the despatch of business; and of his oath, which binds him to discharge faithfully and diligently the duties of his office.

The honorable gentleman, who opened the case on the part of the prosecution, cited the case of habitual drunkenness and profane swearing on the part of a judge, as an instance of an offence not indictable, and yet punishable by impeachment. But I deny his position. Habitual drunkenness in a judge, and profane swearing in any person, are indictable offences. And if they were not, still they are violations of the law. I do not mean to say that there is a statute against drunkenness and profane swearing. But they are offences against good morals, and as such are forbidden by the common law. They are offences in the sight of God and man, definitive in their nature, capable of precise proof and of a clear defence.

The honorable Managers have cited a case decided in this court, as an authority to prove that a man may be convicted on impeachment, without having committed an offence. I mean the case of Judge Pickering. But that case does not support the position. The defendant there was charged with habitual drunkenness, and gross misbehaviour in court, arising from this drunkenness. The defence set up was that the defendant was insane; and that the instances adduced of intoxication and improper behaviour proceeded from his insanity. On this point there was a contrariety of evidence. It is not for me to inquire on which side the truth lay. But the court, by finding the defendant guilty, gave their sanction to the charge, that his insanity proceeded from habitual drunkenness. This case therefore proves nothing further, than that habitual drunkenness is an impeachable offence.

As little aid can the honorable gentlemen derive from the case of Judge Addison, on which also they have relied. The articles of impeachment will show, that Judge Addison was not impeached, as the honorable gentlemen suppose, for rude and ungentleman-like behaviour in court to one of his colleagues; but for a supposed usurpation of power, in preventing his colleague, by an exertion of authority, from exercising the right which he was supposed to possess, to charge a grand jury; and in exerting his official influence and power, to prevent the jury from paying attention to the legal opinions expressed by his colleague, in a civil case. The report of that trial, now in my hand, will attest the correctness of this statement; and will show also that Judge Addison was so far from being charged with rude and ungentleman-like behaviour to his colleague, that the honorable gentleman himself towards whom that behaviour is supposed to have been used, and who gave evidence on the trial, bore testimony to the mildness and politeness of Judge Addison's manner, on the occasions which furnished the grounds of impeachment. Whether the acts done by that learned and distinguished judge did amount to an usurpation of unconstitutional power; or whether his colleague did possess those rights, in the exercise of which he was supposed to have been improperly restricted; are questions foreign from the present inquiry. But I am free to declare, that if Judge Addison's colleague did possess those rights, and if he did arbitrarily prevent and impede the exercise of them, by an unconstitutional exertion of the powers of his office, he was guilty of an offence for which he might properly be impeached; because he must in that case have acted in express violation of the Constitution and laws.

The great principle for which we contend, and which is so strongly supported by the clause of the Constitution already cited, that an impeachment is a criminal prosecution, and cannot be maintained without the proof of some offence against the laws, pervades all the other provisions of the Constitution, on the subject of impeachment. The fourth section of the second article declares, "that the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." This provision, I know, has been considered by some as a mere direction of what shall be done, in those specified cases; and not as a prohibition, confining impeachment to those cases. But it must be recollected, Mr. President, that the Constitution is a limited grant of power; and that it is of the essence of such a grant to be construed strictly, and to leave in the grantors all the powers, not expressly, or by necessary implication granted away. In this manner has the Constitution always been construed and understood: and although an amendment was made, for the purpose of expressly declaring and asserting this principle, yet that amendment was always understood by those who adopted it, and was represented by the eminent character who brought it forward, as a mere declaration of a principle inherent in the Constitution, which it was proper to make, for the purpose of removing doubts and quieting apprehensions. When, therefore, the Constitution declares for what acts an officer shall be impeached, it gives power to impeach him for those acts, and all power to impeach him for any other cause is withheld. The enumeration in the affirmative grant implies clearly a negative restriction, as to all cases not enumerated. This provision of the Constitution, therefore, must be considered, upon every sound principle of construction, as a declaration that no impeachment shall lie except for a crime or misdemeanor; in other words, for a criminal violation of some law.

The same idea is found in the second section of the third article, third clause; where it is declared that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury;" plainly implying that cases of impeachment, are cases of "trials for crimes."

It is material, also, Mr. President, to advert to the peculiar force of the term "conviction," which is employed in several parts of the Constitution, in application to cases of impeachment. The third section of the first article, sixth clause, speaking of the trial of impeachments, says, "and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present." The seventh clause of the same section, treating on the extent and operation of a judgment in impeachment, says, "but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject," &c. And the fourth section of the second article declares, that certain officers "shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery," &c. This term "conviction" has in our law a fixed and appropriate meaning. There is indeed no word in our legal vocabulary, of more technical force. It always imports: the decision of a competent tribunal, pronouncing a person guilty of some specific offence, for which he has been legally brought to trial. In an instrument so remarkable as the Constitution of the United States, for technical accuracy in the use of terms, the frequent and indeed constant use of this word is decisive to prove, that in the intention of the framers of that instrument, no man could be impeached, except for some offence against law, of which he might in legal language be said to be "convicted."

In fixing the construction of this instrument, no safer guide can be followed than contemporaneous expositions, furnished by those who made or ratified it; and among those expositions, the most authoritative are to be found in the constitutions of the several States, formed about the same time, and drawn up in many instances by the same persons. Whenever it appears clearly from the context of these constitutions, that they affix a certain meaning to particular terms, we may safely infer that those or similar terms, in the Constitution of the United States, were intended to have the same meaning. And we shall find, by inspecting the constitutions of the several States, that impeachment has been considered by all of them as a criminal prosecution, for the punishment of defined offences against the laws.

Let us begin with that of Pennsylvania. In treating of impeachments, article the fourth, it speaks of conviction on impeachment; and declares that all civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office. The term "misdemeanor" is of as accurate meaning, and of as much technical force, as any term in the law. It describes a class of offences against law, as well defined as any in the criminal code. A still stronger argument is furnished by the second section of the fifth article, which provides that, for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the Governor may remove any of the judges, on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature. It is most manifest that this provision would have been wholly unnecessary had the people of Pennsylvania, in framing their constitution, considered impeachments, like the honorable Managers, merely as inquests of office, by which a judge might be removed for any cause, which two-thirds of each branch might think reasonable. And the arguments derived from the constitution of Pennsylvania have more force, inasmuch as the terms "misdemeanor in office," used by it for describing impeachable acts, are much less strong, than "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," employed by the Constitution of the United States for the same purpose.

The constitution of Delaware, section 22, directs that impeachments shall lie against all persons "offending against the State, either by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered." This is a very broad description of impeachable offences against the laws, liable to punishment in the regular course of justice. It is declared that all impeachments shall be commenced "within eighteen months after the offence committed," and shall be prosecuted by the Attorney General, or such other persons as the House of Assembly shall appoint, according to the laws of the land." Persons found guilty on impeachment are to be disqualified, or removed, "or subjected to such pains and penalties as the laws shall direct." And the term "conviction," whose peculiar technical force has been already remarked, is applied by this constitution to cases of impeachment.

The people of Maryland did not think fit to invest the Legislature with the power of impeachment; but have directed by their Bill of Rights, section 30, and by their constitution, section 40, that misbehaviour in office shall be proceeded against by indictment, in a court of law only; and that removal, and, in some cases, disqualification, shall be the consequence of conviction. It will not be denied, that "misdemeanor" and "misbehaviour in office" are convertible terms. If there be any difference, the latter is the less strong; and yet the people of Maryland have declared that the term "misbehaviour in office" means an indictable offence, of which a person may be convicted in a court of law.

The constitution of Virginia provides, that persons offending against the State by mal-administration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered, "shall be impeachable by the House of Delegates," in the General Court, according to the laws of the land: "and that if all or any of the judges of the General Court, should, on grounds (to be judged by the House of Delegates) be accused of any of the crimes or offences above-mentioned, such House of Delegates may, in like manner, impeach the judge or judges so accused, to be tried in the court of appeals." Hence it appears most clearly that these general words "offending against the State by mal-administration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered," words far more general and indefinite in themselves than those employed by the Federal Constitution, were considered by the people of Virginia as meaning specific crimes or offences, which might be proceeded against in a court of law, according to the usual course of criminal justice. The words "any other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered," are certainly broad enough to embrace those reasons of political expediency and State policy for which the honorable Managers contend that a judge may be removed by impeachment; but we find that the people of Virginia had no idea of giving them a construction so contrary to the notions entertained in this country respecting legal rights, personal safety, and Constitutional liberty.

The provisions made on this subject by the constitution of North Carolina breathe the same spirit. That instrument declares, section 23, "that the Governor and other officers offending against the State, by violating any part of this constitution, mal-administration, or corruption, may be prosecuted on the impeachment of the General Assembly, or presentment of the grand jury, of any court of supreme jurisdiction in this State." This plainly implies that impeachable acts, though described in terms the most indefinite, were neither more nor less than offences indictable in the ordinary course of law.

In the constitution of South Carolina, article 5, we find the same idea necessarily implied. The words "misdemeanor in office" are used as the description of impeachable offences; the term "conviction" is applied to impeachments; and it is provided that persons so convicted, "shall, nevertheless, be liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." It is plain, therefore, that the words "misdemeanor in office," were understood and intended by the people of South Carolina to mean offences against the laws, for which the offender might be indicted and "convicted."

The constitution of Georgia contains no words, which can operate in any manner to define or describe impeachable offences. It merely directs who shall have the power of impeaching, who shall try impeachments, and what description of persons may be impeached. But, in that of Vermont, there is a provision on this subject, which, though very concise, is very strong to our present purpose. Among the powers given by it, section 9, to the House of Representatives, is that to "impeach State criminals." This term "criminals," which in our laws is never applied except to persons charged with offences of the highest nature, sufficiently declares that the people of Vermont considered impeachments as applicable to cases of crimes only, and not to removals for reasons of State expediency: not even to cases of smaller offences, much less of indiscretion or impropriety of behaviour, such as is alleged against the respondent in this case. For, surely, it would be an abuse of language to apply the term "criminal" to improper interruptions of counsel; to rude, hasty, or intemperate expressions; to ridicule employed by a judge against counsel, who, in his opinion, conducted themselves incorrectly; or to the precipitate and ill-timed expression of a correct legal opinion. No, sir. This word imports the intentional violation of some known law; the perpetration of some specific defined crime, which may admit of precise proof, which every citizen may be able to avoid, against which, when accused of it, he may know how to make his defence.

Such, Mr. President, is the solemn exposition of impeachable offences, given by the people of the United States, through the medium of their constitutions. Though not accustomed to talk about the will of the people, there is no man that bows with more reverence to that will, when constitutionally declared. And shall we, Mr. President, let go this sheet-anchor of personal rights and political privileges, to commit ourselves to the storms of party rage, personal animosity, and popular caprice? Shall we throw down this great landmark, fixed by the wisdom and patriotism of our fellow-citizens and fathers? Instead of having our best and dearest rights secured, by fixed and known principles of law, shall we leave them to be governed and disposed by the ever-varying whims and passions of the moment? No, sir, I trust not. When I look at these benches and recollect how deep a stake the members of this honorable Court have in those rights which form the palladium of our safety, and are now entrusted to their care and keeping, I cannot but confidently expect that they will feel the whole importance of the great trust reposed in them by their country; that they will regard themselves as acting for future generations, as well as for the present age; and will elevate themselves above the sphere of little views and momentary feelings. They will recollect, sir, that unjust principles, adopted to answer particular purposes, are two-edged swords, which often rebound on the head of him who strikes with them; and that justice, though it may be an inconvenient restraint on our power, while we are strong, is the only rampart behind which we can find protection when we become weak. They will remember that power which depends on popular favor, is of all sublunary things the most fleeting and transient; that it must, from time to time, change hands; and that when the change which, sooner or later, must arrive, shall have taken place; when those who now direct the thunder of impeachment, shall be placed, as ere long they must, in a situation to be smitten by its bolts, they will be glad to invoke, and unless they now set a great example of correct decision, will invoke in vain those Constitutional privileges to which we now cry for safety.

Need I, Mr. President, urge the necessity of adhering to those principles, as it respects the independence of the judiciary department? Need I enlarge on the essential importance of that independence to the security of personal rights, and to the well-being, nay, to the existence of a free Government? These considerations of themselves strike the mind with a force not to be increased by any efforts of mine. It is sufficient merely to bring them into the view of this honorable Court.

But it is not to the party accused, to the nation, to posterity, and to the interests of free Governments that the observance of settled Constitutional principles in cases of impeachment, is alone important. It is equally so to the character and feelings of those appointed to judge. Is there any member of this honorable Court, who would wish, nay, who would consent, in deciding this cause, to be set free from the restraints of the law, or, more properly speaking, to be deprived of its guidance, and left to the influence of his own passions, feelings, or prepossessions? Were causes like this to be determined on expediency, and not on fixed principles of law, to what suspicions might not the judges be liable, of having sought the indulgence of some animosity, or the attainment of some selfish end, instead of consulting for the public good? But when they are known to be governed by the settled rules of law, and are considered as merely its organs, their motives will be more respected, and their conduct less liable to suspicion or reproach? Is any member of this honorable body prepared to relinquish the high and venerable station of the organ and expounder of the law, in order to assume the doubtful and dangerous character of a judge, subject to no rule but his own arbitrary will?

To a judge, too, it is the sweetest consolation in the discharge of his painful duties, that when he has doomed a fellow-citizen to dishonor and misery, he has merely pronounced the decision of the law, and not the dictates of his own will; that he is not the author of the sentence by which so much calamity is brought on others, but merely its official organ. This reflection soothes his mind under the anguish which it must feel from another's woe. And is there any member of this honorable Court who would consent to relinquish this consolation? I boldly say, no. I feel that every heart will respond to the assertion. And if any who hear me be capable of entertaining a contrary opinion, or would wish, in the same situation, to hold a different conduct, I envy not their feelings, however highly I may estimate their intellectual powers.

In every light, therefore, in which this great principle can be viewed, whether as a well-established doctrine of the Constitution; as the bulwark of personal safety and judicial independence; as a shield for the characters of those whose lot it may be to sit under the trial of impeachments; or as a solace to them under the necessity of pronouncing a fellow-citizen guilty; it will equally claim, and I cannot doubt that it will receive the sanction of this honorable Court, by whose decision it will, I trust, be established so as never hereafter to be brought into question, that an impeachment is not a mere inquiry, in the nature of an inquest of office, whether an officer be qualified for his place, or whether some reason of policy or expediency may not demand his removal, but a criminal prosecution, for the support of which the proof of some wilful violation of a known law of the land is known to be indispensably required.

Before I proceed, Mr. President, to apply this principle to the case now under consideration, permit me to notice briefly another proposition advanced by the honorable Managers, which I perfectly concur in, and shall take the liberty of using against them. They have laid it down, that the testimony of witnesses equally credible in themselves, is entitled to different degrees of credit, according to the means which they respectively enjoyed of correctly discerning the truth, in the matter about which they testify. To this proposition I fully assent. Let the principle be applied to the case now under consideration. Look at the witnesses on each side. With some few exceptions perhaps, about which I do not feel it necessary to make any particular remarks, they are equally credible in themselves, equally disposed to state correctly the facts. But who are the witnesses on the part of the prosecution? It must be answered, that almost all of them are persons who have supposed themselves to be ill-treated by the respondent; whose resentment the lapse of four years has not been able to assuage; and who come here under the manifest influence of those angry feelings, to complain of their imaginary wrongs. It is plain that such persons, however correct in their intentions, however desirous of speaking the truth, are liable to be misled by the irritation which these events excited in their minds, and to state as facts the recollection of their erroneous impressions. It is perfectly manifest that those gentlemen were very much irritated by the transactions of which they complain, and in which they were or supposed themselves to be parties. It is equally clear their anger has not yet cooled. And I will ask whether men in such circumstances, giving them the utmost credit for correct intentions, are equally entitled to belief with persons who, like the witnesses on the part of the respondent, were calm, and disinterested spectators of the events which they relate? Equally respectable with the witnesses for the prosecution; much more cool; free from that irritation which the parties in contention can hardly ever avoid; and testifying their impartiality by expressing without reserve their disapprobation of some things in the respondent's conduct; it must be admitted that in every collision of testimony, they possess the highest title to belief.

Having taken this view of these preliminary points, I now proceed, Mr. President, to consider the various charges against our honorable client, in the order in which they have been stated by the prosecutors. It is not my design to go over the same ground, which has been so recently trodden by my able colleagues. The task assigned to me, is to range rapidly over the first six articles; to present some views of the subject, which the multiplicity of the matter induced my learned colleagues to omit; and then to discuss at large the law and the facts, under the seventh and eighth articles, which have not yet been touched.

On the case of John Fries, the subject of the first charge, permit me, Mr. President, to avail myself of a distinction, laid down by the honorable gentleman who opened the case on the part of the prosecution (Mr. Randolph.) That honorable gentleman, in his opening address, made a distinction between a general maxim or principle of law, such as the definition of a crime, and a particular opinion on the law, as applicable to a particular case. The former he admits to be proper in a judge at any stage of a trial. The latter he denies to be so. He has chosen the definition of one offence to illustrate his position; I will take that of another. Suppose a man to be indicted, and put on his trial, for burglary. The crime of burglary consists in "breaking and entering a dwelling-house, in the night time, with intent to commit felony." This is the established definition of this offence. According to the distinction of the honorable gentleman, the judge might at the commencement of the trial, or at any stage of it, declare this general principle respecting the nature of the offence, even before counsel were heard. Nay, more, he would be justified in preventing counsel from attempting, before the jury, to controvert this principle. This latter point is not expressly admitted by the honorable gentleman; but it flows from his admission, as a necessary consequence. So far the judge might safely go. But should he advance a step further, and declare, before counsel had been heard, that the acts done by the person on trial did amount to burglary, then he would be culpable, and even criminal; and this, the honorable gentleman contends, was done by the respondent in the case of Fries.

I consent to be judged by the rule which the honorable gentleman has himself established; and I undertake to show that nothing more was done by the respondent in the case of Fries than the honorable gentleman admits may be properly done by a judge; that he merely stated the general definition of the crime of treason by levying war against the United States, but expressed no opinion whether the prisoner was guilty or innocent, whether the acts which he had done amounted to treason. For the correctness of this position I appeal to the opinion itself, as in evidence before the court. It is contained in exhibit No.

2, filed with the answer. In this paper the court, after some preliminary observations to show that the questions relative to the Constitutional definition of treason were questions of law and not of fact, proceed to state as their opinion, "that any insurrection, or rising of any body of people within the United States, to effect by force or violence any object of a great public nature, or of public and general (or national) concern, is a levying of war against the United States, within the contemplation and construction of the Constitution of the United States." "That on this general position any such insurrection or rising to resist or prevent by violence the execution of any statute of the United States for levying or collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, or for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, or for any other purpose; under any pretence, as that the statute was unequal, burdensome, oppressive, or unconstitutional, is a levying war against the United States, within the Constitution." "That military weapons, as guns and swords, mentioned in the indictment, are not necessary to make such insurrection or rising amount to levying war, because numbers may supply the want of military weapons, or military array." "That the assembling bodies of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for purposes only of a private nature, is not treason, although the judges and peace officers should be insulted or resisted, or even great outrage committed on the persons and property of our citizens." "That the true criterion to determine whether acts committed are a treason, or a less offence (as a riot) is the quo animo the people did assemble. That, if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection to resist or oppose the execution of any statute of the United States by force, they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor; but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, they are guilty of the treason of levying war, and the quantum of the force employed neither lessens nor increases the crime." "That a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution," and that "some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war; but it is perfectly immaterial whether the force used is sufficient to effectuate the object."

This no doubt is a long definition. Perhaps it might have been expressed in much fewer words, but still is a general definition of the crime of treason by levying war, without application or reference to any particular case, much less to the case of John Fries. It amounts nearly to this, "that for any number of people, however small or inadequate, to rise, with intent to resist or prevent by force the execution of any general law of the United States, and to employ actual force for that purpose, amounts to levying war against the United States, although neither military weapons nor military array be used." This is the substance of the opinion. All the rest is merely illustration, and in this shape it is as much a general definition as that of burglary.

How wide a field of defence do these definitions leave open! In the case of an indictment for burglary, would any counsel peevishly or insolently retire from the prisoner's defence, because the court might, in the commencement of the trial, have stated this to be the legal definition of the crime? Would he insist on the absurd and mischievous privilege of controverting so plain and well-settled a principle of law? No. Far different would be his conduct. He would inquire whether any acts had been done, amounting in law to the breaking open of a house? Whether the prisoner was the perpetrator of those acts, or a party in them? Whether the house was broken open in the night time? Whether it was entered by the prisoner as well as broken? Whether it was a dwelling-house? And whether it was broken open and entered with intent to commit any crime amounting to felony? All these questions would be perfectly open, under the general definition which has been stated; and on the result of these inquiries would the guilt or innocence of the prisoner depend.

So in the case of Fries, it was perfectly competent to his learned counsel, under the general definition of treason given by the court, to contend that the acts proved did not amount to a rising of any number of people; that John Fries was not implicated in those acts; that they were not done with intent to resist or prevent, by force or violence, the execution of any general law of the United States; or that no force or violence was actually employed in pursuance of such intention. All these questions were perfectly open to them, notwithstanding the general definition of treason given by the court. Not one of these questions did the court in any manner decide. These questions involved the application of the general definition to the particular case; an application in which the true, proper, and only defence of the prisoner consisted, and which the court neither made, nor intended to make.

Surely these questions offered full scope to the learned gentlemen for the exertion of those argumentative powers, and the display of that legal learning, of which they have given, in the shape of testimony, so handsome a specimen at this bar. Even that eager fondness for legal disputation, which has carried them on this occasion so far beyond the limits prescribed by the law of evidence, might have been gratified in this ample field. There was room enough for the learned and ingenious distinction, which one of the gentlemen (Mr. Dallas) has told us that he intended to make between the case of Fries and that of the Western insurgents. It was his intention, he says, had he not been prevented by this unfortunate definition, to dwell on several circumstances which, in his apprehension, distinguished the former of these cases from the latter. He tells us that his mind turned itself towards these distinctions, and was occupied upon them from the moment when the court granted a new trial after the first conviction of Fries. His mind was led into this course of reflection by the stress which he had observed the court to lay, in the first trial of Fries, on the decisions in the cases of the Western insurgents. It would surely have been very unkind in the respondent to prevent the learned gentleman from exhibiting the results of these long and profound reflections. But happily the respondent did not prevent him. His disappointment must be attributed solely to himself. The circumstances on which he informs us that he intended to rely for distinguishing the case of Fries from those of the Western insurgents, were the martial array at Braddock's field; the march to Pittsburg, for the avowed purpose of attacking the garrison; and, I think, the attack on Nevil's house. The first of these circumstances applied to the nature of the assemblage, whether it amounted to a rising or insurrection; the second to the intent with which the rising was made, and the third to the degree and nature of the force or violence committed. They were all open to the learned gentleman under the opinion, which did not declare what sort of an assemblage would constitute an insurrection or rising; what circumstances would be sufficient evidence of the improper intent; or what kind or degree of force or violence must be employed; but merely stated that a rising or insurrection, proceeding from such an intent, and accompanied by actual force or violence, would amount to levying war. Whether the assemblage in Bucks and Northampton had the necessary ingredients to constitute a rising or insurrection; whether the acts done afforded sufficient evidence of an intent to resist or prevent by violence or force the execution of the act of Congress; whether the force or violence committed were sufficient in nature or degree; and whether, in all or any of these points of view, the case of Fries in Bucks and Northampton was weaker than that of the Western insurgents, or materially different from it, were questions not at all affected by the opinion, but left entirely open to the learned gentleman, who might, notwithstanding this opinion, have discussed them before the court and jury, at all the length into which the exuberance of his genius so much delights to shoot.

These learned gentlemen possessed, therefore, under the opinion communicated to them by the respondent, even if it had not been withdrawn, all the latitude which moderate counsel could have desired. All the questions of fact; all the questions of intention, which are questions of fact; the whole business of deciding, whether the case proved came within the general principle of law; of applying the general rule to the particular case; remained within the province of the jury, and furnished the only proper means of defence. Even if the facts had been admitted, as the honorable Managers contend, still the intent remained to be ascertained, and was a question of fact solely cognizable by the jury. But it is utterly incorrect to say that the facts were admitted. It was indeed admitted, or rather it was not doubted, that certain acts had been done by John Fries and others; but whether those acts were of such a nature, and proceeded from such an intention, as to bring the case within the general rule of law laid down by the court, was a point unsettled, which formed the proper and sole ground of inquiry. And this point was not affected by the opinion communicated by the respondent to the prisoner's counsel.

And here, Mr. President, let me be permitted to notice what I deem a most dangerous error, respecting the Constitutional power of juries in criminal cases. It is constantly asserted that the jury are to decide the law and the fact in criminal cases; and this is correct, when properly explained; but taken in its literal and unqualified sense, it is contrary to every principle of law, and every dictate of common sense. It is the province of the court to expound and declare the law generally, in all cases, criminal as well as civil. To apply the law to each particular case; to decide whether the facts proved in any case bring it within the general rule of law, is the province of the jury, and their only province. They have no dispensing power over the laws of the land. Will any man in the least acquainted with our system of jurisprudence declare that a jury has a right to decide, that breaking open a dwelling-house in the night time with intent to steal is not burglary, unless an actual theft be committed? I presume that no one will hazard such an opinion. The jury, in such a case, may decide that the house was not broken open, that is, was not a dwelling-house, that the fact was not committed by the person accused, that it was not committed in the night time, or that it was not committed with an intent to commit a felony. But if they believe the affirmative on all these points, they must find the prisoner guilty, or commit a direct violation of their oaths. They are bound by the general principle of law as declared by the court. Their duty, and their sole duty, consists in applying it to the particular case. In this sense, and in this alone, are they judges of the law as well as of the fact.

It is well known that a new trial may be granted in a criminal case, where the verdict is against the party accused, and is supposed by the court to be contrary to law. This proves that the jury are not the judges of the law, in the unqualified sense contended for by some persons; for if they were the judges of the law in that sense, it would necessarily follow that a new trial could no more be granted in favor of the prisoner in a criminal case than against him. The rule that it cannot be granted against him has been established by the courts in favor of life, through a laudable motive of tenderness and humanity, and not because they had not power to grant new trials in this case, as well as in others, where the verdict is contrary to law.

So in case of an offence created by statute, a jury may declare that the case proved on an indictment, under the statute, does not come within it, for want of the improper intent, or some other necessary ingredient. But it has never entered into the head of any man to suppose that the jury in such a case has a right to declare that the statute itself is not a law of the land—has been repealed, has expired, or does not create any offence. All these are questions of law, which come within the exclusive province of the court.

This consideration, by the way, furnishes the true answer to the famous Richmond syllogism, of which we have heard so much in this case, and proves the correctness of that decision, by which the counsel of Callender were prevented, most properly, from contesting before the jury the constitutionality of an act of Congress—a decision which the honorable Managers have had the good sense not to call in question. This decision, undeniably correct as it is, and as strange as the absurdities are to which a contrary principle would lead, can be defended on no other ground than that for which I contend.

And I will ask, how the case of treason can be distinguished, in this respect, from that of burglary? If a jury be bound, by the general rule of law which defines the crime of burglary, and be confined solely to the inquiry, whether the case proved comes within that rule; upon what principle can it be contended that they are not equally bound by the general definition of treason?

Will it be contended that the latter definition is not as well settled as the former? This position I deny. How was the definition of burglary settled? It was not by any Legislative act remaining on record or known by tradition, but by judicial determinations declaratory of the law. In the same manner has the definition of treason by levying war been settled. Three solemn adjudications in the same court, and one of them in the same case, had declared it to be the law; and it was the law of the land as much as the law defining burglary or any other offence. If gentlemen deny that three solemn decisions on the same point, by a court of the highest jurisdiction, are sufficient to settle the law, will they inform us how many decisions are necessary for that purpose? Or are we never to have fixed principles, or settled definitions of crimes? Is the law of treason never to be established on a certain basis? Are the nature and definition of this high offence to be left forever floating on the uncertain and varying opinions of courts and juries? Is that which was not treason to-day to be treason to-morrow, according to the caprice, the interests, or the prejudices of those who may be appointed to determine, or to the power, influence, or intrigues of the accuser or accused? If succeeding courts and juries are not to be bound by precedents established by their predecessors, then will everything be treason when a man is tried by his foes, and nothing when he is tried by his friends. There will no longer be any security, in times of party contention, for life, liberty, or property; and we are destined to see acted over in this land, vainly boasting of its freedom and happiness, the scenes of judicial murder and pillage which disgraced our mother country during the struggles between the houses of York and Lancaster. Sooner than live under such a system, I would take refuge in Turkey, where, by bribing the Cadi, I might escape from judicial tyranny, and might be safe from the oppressions of the Government, provided I avoided the offence of growing rich. Not for one moment would I live in a country where I should be tantalized with the semblance of liberty, and in fact liable to the penalties of treason, whenever I might by any act of opposition, or any assertion of my rights or those of my fellow-citizens, become obnoxious to a party in power. This must be the consequence should the principles contended for by the Managers finally prevail. When the rules of law defining offences are fixed and certain, then is every man safe, because he may know the law, and may avoid offending against it. But if no respect is to be paid to former decisions; if counsel are to be allowed to controvert points, which have been solemnly and repeatedly adjudged; if our courts and juries, without regard to former decisions, are to declare that to be law in each particular case, which the passions, the prejudices, or the political views of the moment may dictate; then indeed have we grasped a shadow, while the substance has escaped from us; and the blood of our fathers has in vain bedewed their native soil. But no. So monstrous a principle cannot be endured, and will not receive the sanction of this honorable Court. Rules of law, once established, must be adhered to. Courts must regard them as sacred, and must not allow them to be called in question. In this case the opinion communicated had been solemnly settled, and was a part and a most important part of the law of the land. There was no superior tribunal to review it; and if there be one, the argument is still stronger: for then the acquiescence of the parties, who took no measures to have these decisions reversed, is added to the authority of the court which made them. The court, therefore, where the respondent presided, was bound to consider these decisions as the law of the land; to declare them as such, and to prevent them from being called into question, for the purpose of misleading the jury.

Another charge urged against our honorable client, under the first article of impeachment, is, that he prevented the prisoner's counsel, in the case of Fries, from citing to the jury certain English adjudications on the law of treason, and some statutes of the United States. So far as this charge relates to the statutes, I shall leave it most cheerfully where it has been placed by my learned and ingenious colleague who commenced the defence. Nothing can be added to the striking and satisfactory view which he has given of that point. As to the English authorities, I will make one observation, which did not fall within the scope of his argument.

The respondent did say that English adjudications, at common law, on the doctrine of treason, ought not to be read to the jury; that English decisions before the Revolution of 1688, under the statute of treasons, were deserving of very little attention, and ought to be received with great caution; and that such decisions since that Revolution, though proper to be cited, were not to be considered as absolute authorities, but merely as strong arguments. Into the legal correctness of this opinion, it is not now my purpose to inquire. That point has been sufficiently discussed. But I beg this honorable Court to remark, that this opinion of which the learned counsel for Fries so loudly complain, was an opinion precisely in their favor, and gave them all the advantage on this subject that they expected to derive from citing these English cases. It was, they tell us, to convince the jury of the very thing which the court thus declared to them, namely, that these English decisions before the Revolution of 1688, were entitled to little or no attention; and that even those since the Revolution, being in some degree founded on the former, ought to be received with caution, and not to be considered in the light of absolute and binding authorities. These were the points which they wished to establish, by citing the English adjudications; and these were precisely the points which the court established. The decision was completely in their favor, and yet they complain of it as a grievous injury. They complain of it, though in their favor, because it was made without giving them an opportunity of speaking. Whence this causeless discontent, this most unreasonable complaint? Did it proceed from the disappointment of a childish and little vanity, which made them wish to exhibit their talents before the public? Surely we cannot suspect those learned gentlemen of so contemptible a motive. Why then, I repeat, do they complain of a decision made in their favor? They have been compelled by the force of truth, to explain the reason. The truth is, as it appears on their own testimony, that they complained, not because they thought themselves or their client injured, by this decision, but because it suited their purpose to represent themselves as injured, their client as oppressed, the case as prejudged, and the conduct of the court as arbitrary and precipitate; in order to excite odium and resentment against the court, and commiseration towards their client, and to induce the President, by erroneous impressions thus made on his mind, to extend his mercy to a person, who could not have been thought a fit object for compassion, had the truth been known. The whole of this pretended displeasure, all this affected outcry about the privileges of counsel, the rights of jurors, and prejudged opinions, was a mere finesse, an artful contrivance, to procure the pardon of a criminal twice convicted of treason, and to procure it by holding up a falsehood to the view of the President, and of the public; by calumniating the court, deceiving the Executive, weakening the confidence of the people in the administration of the laws, and sacrificing truth and justice to the attainment of a momentary purpose.

The learned gentlemen thought themselves justified in all this, by their duty to their client. It is not for me to condemn them. I am here to inquire into the propriety of their conduct. But I may be permitted to ask, whether such a contrivance ought to receive the countenance of this high court? And whether gentlemen who have thought it right thus to act, ought not to be listened to with caution, when they come here, after their finesse has completely succeeded, to complain of injuries, which in the same breath they tell us are entirely fictitious? I will ask whether this honorable Court ought not to discountenance such proceedings in future, by vindicating the conduct of the respondent in this particular? Counsel, Mr. President, have duties to themselves and to the public, as well as to their clients. They are at all times bound by the obligations of candor and of truth. They are at all times bound to respect the courts of justice and themselves. They owe to their clients every honorable exertion of their talents and industry, and the zealous use of every fair means of defence. In criminal cases, and especially when life is in jeopardy, we expect more zeal, and are willing to allow greater latitude. In favor of this zeal, we are disposed to excuse some departure from the strict line, which propriety would in other cases prescribe. But to be countenanced, upheld, and commended, for attempting to excite odium unjustly against a court; and to induce the President to believe, that the prisoner was deprived by the court of a fair trial, when they know the fact to be directly otherwise; is more than modest men would ask, or any man has a right to expect.

But let it be admitted for a moment, Mr. President, that on the first day of the trial of Fries, the respondent committed an error. I ask if it was not atoned for by his full and honorable retraction on the second? By the pains which he took to do away all the proceedings of the first day; to induce the prisoner's counsel to go on with the defence, and to secure to him, in the utmost latitude, every advantage for making that defence? One of the honorable Managers has told us that the respondent's conduct on the first day was an unpardonable sin; that repentance, if it came at all, came too late. But this, sir, is not the rule by which we hope one day to be judged. We live in the comforting hope, that repentance, if sincere, can never come too late. We hope, by a short or death-bed repentance, we may obtain pardon for a life of errors and sins. Our holy religion permits us to believe, that there is but one unpardonable sin, and that is hardness of heart, or refusal to repent. And shall we, frail and sinful mortals, mete to each other a measure, which an all just and all powerful God does not mete to us? Shall we refuse to each other the effects of that repentance, by which alone we can ourselves hope for happiness hereafter? If for one error, thus atoned for, the respondent must be punished, let the first stone be cast by him who has always retracted and corrected his errors, as soon as he was made sensible that they had been committed.

I do not, Mr. President, with my learned colleague who commenced the defence, disclaim the term "repentance" for my honorable client. Repentance is a term that suits creatures so frail and liable to error as men, even the best of men. We all have need of it, and I trust that we shall be ashamed of our errors, but not of our repentance. I have often had occasion to repent myself. I fear that I have not done it often enough. And however slight the error which the respondent may have committed, I am willing, in his behalf, to rely on the plea of repentance and amendment.

But this amendment, we are told by the honorable Managers, was a mere pretence, a cloak beneath which the respondent sought to hide the supposed deformity of his conduct, when he found that it began to attract attention. But I ask was it a pretence to entreat, to supplicate the prisoner's counsel to proceed with the defence, till the cup of humiliation was drained to the dregs? Was it a cloak to be anxiously solicitous, after the prisoner was abandoned by his counsel, to protect him from the dangers into which his ignorance of the law might betray him; to urge his acceptance of other counsel; to inform him carefully of his right of challenge; to assist him in cross examining the witnesses; suggesting such questions as might be to his advantage, and guarding him against such as might draw forth unfavorable answers; to prevent the witnesses in the submitted cases from being examined before his trial, lest the jury might hear testimony unfavorable to him, which he could have no opportunity of cross examining? Was this the conduct of a designing hypocrite, seeking to gloss over his wicked purposes, by a fair outside of humanity and justice?—of an artful and ruthless oppressor, thirsting for the blood of an innocent victim? If this be oppression, God grant that I and mine may never be otherwise oppressed!

I come now, Mr. President, to the case of Calender. But before I enter into those views which remain to be taken of the charges arising out of that case, let me be indulged in some preliminary remarks, on that part of the evidence adduced in their support, which was supposed by the honorable Managers to furnish direct proof of corrupt intentions, on the part of the respondent.

This evidence was given by Mr. Mason, Mr. Triplet, and Mr. Heath. As to the first gentleman, his testimony relates to a private and jocular conversation, no part of which he recollects perfectly, and the most material part of which, the part that furnishes the true explanation of the whole affair, he has entirely forgotten. It cannot be doubted that this honorable gentleman was dragged with extreme reluctance to detail, at the bar of a court of justice, a private and of course a confidential conversation, the most material parts of which a lapse of five years has effaced from his memory. It must have been to him a most painful necessity, a most cruel violence, which obliged him to do an act that, if done voluntarily, would have amounted to a violation of that confidence which in the intercourse of society men of honor place in each other. Ought a species of examination to be countenanced, which must place honorable men in so painful a situation, and subject them to so cruel a necessity? Which must compel them, after having been considered as companions, and perhaps as friends, to assume the odious character of spies, and to fulfil the detestable functions of informers? Which must destroy all the confidence, and of course all the pleasure of social intercourse, that great sweetener of the ills of life; must spread the gloom of mistrust over all our moments of hilarity and relaxation; and must convert our parlors, our breakfast tables, and even our friendly suppers, where the bosom is wont to expand, and the heart is laid on the table, into scenes of watchful jealousy, of dark and cautious silence? Ought a practice to be tolerated, which thus strikes at the root of social harmony, private honor, and public morality?

How dangerous too is this species of testimony, to the interest of truth and the safety of innocence! In this very case, the honorable witness, with all his accuracy of recollection, and all his desire to represent the transaction in a light as favorable to the party accused as the truth would permit, has forgotten the most material part of the conversation; that part in which he himself was immediately concerned, which drew forth the rest, and which furnishes the true explanation of the respondent's meaning. The part which he has thus forgotten, has been happily supplied by another witness, Judge Winchester, who was also present at the conversation. But what might have been the situation of the respondent, had Judge Winchester's memory been equally frail, or had he died before this trial? That most satisfactory explanation which he has given, and which has removed every shadow of doubt from this part of the case, would then have been wanting; and the respondent might have been convicted, on a recollection which would in that case have appeared complete, though we know it to be utterly imperfect.

This explanation proves the whole conversation to have been a mere jest, and a jest provoked and drawn out by Mr. Mason himself. Without the explanation, it might have borne an improper, though not a criminal aspect. With the explanation, it amounts to nothing more than an expression of the respondent's intention, made in jest, by way of reply to a jest of Mr. Mason, to have the affair of "The Prospect Before Us" investigated, when he should arrive at Richmond, and to bring the author and publisher to punishment. Will it be said that in this there is anything criminal, or even improper? Is it not the duty of a judge, presiding in a court of criminal jurisdiction, to cause inquiry to be made into offences which he knows to have been committed, and to take steps for bringing the offenders to justice? Suppose that instead of a libel, a piracy had been committed; and that the respondent, being informed that the parties were lurking in the district of Virginia, had declared that he would have them brought to trial, if they could be caught, and punished if guilty? Would this have been improper? And does the difference between offences make any difference in the duties of a judge? Is he not equally bound to execute all the laws? If gentlemen say no, will they be pleased to draw for us the proper line of discrimination, between those laws which a judge must execute, and those which he ought to neglect? Or is this line to be drawn by his own caprice? Was not the sedition act a law of the land, and was not "The Prospect Before Us" a violation of that law? If there were any circumstances which rendered it proper to dispense with the penalties of this law, or to pardon the offences committed against it, there was a power in the Constitution to do so; but that power resided in the Executive department, and not in the Judicial; whose duty it was to execute all the laws, without respect to circumstances, persons, or cases.

As to the testimony of Mr. Triplett, I cannot conceive what proof it can furnish of criminal intentions. It amounts to this, and nothing more, that the respondent, in the course of some very loose and thoughtless conversation, from which it would have been much more prudent to abstain, applied some harsh epithets to "The Prospect Before Us," and its reputed author; and expressed an apprehension that he would escape punishment. But does it follow, that because a judge remarkable for hasty and strong expressions, has applied some harsh and angry epithets to a person believed to be an atrocious offender, he will not do him justice, when he comes on trial? It must also be remarked, that Mr. Triplett is manifestly in a mistake, respecting the last conversation which he has attempted to detail. He represents the respondent as saying, that the marshal had returned without Callender. But we know that the marshal did not return without Callender. This mistake on the part of Mr. Triplett, may induce us to doubt, whether with the most sincere desire to represent nothing but the truth, which I have no doubt that he felt, he may not have viewed the other circumstances also in too strong a light. We well know that facts of this nature derive their complexion, almost entirely, from small circumstances of time, manner, and connexion; and when we find so candid a witness mistaken in so material a circumstance, we may fairly conclude that he has omitted on one hand, or too much heightened on the other, some of those finer shades, on which the character of the piece always depends.

With respect to the facts related by John Heath, I have no difficulty in admitting that, if true, it fixes the stain of corruption on the character and conduct of the respondent, and ought to produce his conviction. Juries in every case, and especially in criminal cases, ought to be selected without respect to any circumstance but their impartiality and legal qualifications. Of all circumstances, that of political opinion and party connexion is the most improper to govern, and ought the most carefully to be avoided. For a judge to interfere with the marshal, and direct him to strike off from a jury list, in a criminal case, all those persons who were supposed to agree in political opinion with the party accused; or, in other words, to combine with the marshal in packing a jury, for the purpose of insuring the conviction of the party accused, would be an offence for which he ought to be punished. But this testimony of John Heath is deeply shaken by one witness, and flatly contradicted by another. I will not inquire into the character of John Heath; which I have no means of knowing or of making known; but I will say that it cannot stand on higher ground than that of David Mead Randolph, who has flatly contradicted Mr. Heath; or of

Trial of Judge Chase.

William Marshall, who has gone as near to a positive contradiction, as it is possible to go without making one. There must be a mistake somewhere. But we cannot believe the fact stated by John Heath, without believing that David Mead Randolph has been guilty of a flat and wilful perjury, and that William Marshall has gone as near it as possible. These gentlemen are known to all Virginia. The evidences of their character are to be found in the breast of every man in that State. But as to Mr. Randolph, there is direct evidence in this case to support his veracity. Mr. Hay has declared at this bar, that he did not recollect having used certain expressions which were attributed to him, but had no doubt that he used them, after Mr. Randolph said so. Such was his reliance on Mr. Randolph's veracity and recollection! It is not possible to have stronger testimony in favor of a witness. If stronger could exist, it would be found in another circumstance which has appeared in evidence. When one juror whom he had summoned for the trial of Callender, told him that he had made up his mind to convict the traverser, and urged that circumstance as an excuse, the excuse was admitted by Mr. Randolph, and the juror was discharged. But when Colonel Harvey applied, through the Chief Justice, to be excused in a similar situation, and alleged as a reason that he was predetermined to acquit Callender, let the evidence against him be what it might, because he believed the sedition law under which he was indicted to be unconstitutional, Mr. Randolph would not excuse him. This fact appears by the testimony of the Chief Justice. Can it be for a moment believed, that a marshal acting in this manner would enter into a corrupt and profligate combination with a judge to pack a jury for the conviction of Callender; and would come to this bar and complete his turpitude by a flat and wilful perjury? His conduct in office; the universal respect which he enjoys in his county, among men of all parties and opinions; his manner of giving testimony at this bar; and the evidence which his political enemies have here borne in his favor, all preclude the idea.

This witness, so honorably supported by the principal witness on the part of the prosecution, so high in his character, so scrupulously delicate in his conduct, so ready to discharge a juror who had made up his mind to convict the traverser, while he refused to discharge one who was predetermined to acquit him, is said by John Heath to have presented the panel of jurors to the respondent, who told him that if he had any "of those creatures called democrats on it," they must be immediately struck off. He positively declares that no such conversation as that stated by Heath ever took place; that the respondent never saw the panel; and that it was not completed till after the meeting of the court, when the respondent was on the bench, and therefore could not have been shown to him.

In this positive contradiction of Heath, he is strongly supported by William Marshall; the irresistible effect of whose testimony, derived from the peculiar candor, solemnity, and precision with which it was delivered, as well as from his high character, all who have heard him, have felt and acknowledged.

Heath has declared that the incident which he relates took place at the lodgings of the judge; that he was there but once, which was in the morning a little before the time when the court usually met; that he remained about half an hour; and that no person was present except the judge, the marshal, and himself.

William Marshall declares, that in the morning he called on the judge, according to his custom, a little before the meeting of the court; that when he entered the room, Heath had left it, or was in the act of leaving it, and immediately went away; and that the judge did not say one word in his hearing which it was possible for Heath to hear. Thus far he speaks positively. He adds that he firmly believes, but cannot positively assert, that the marshal, David M. Randolph, went with him to the judge's lodgings, and left them with him; and that they both together attended the judge to the court-house. His reasons for this belief are, that he has a strong impression of the facts on his mind, though not a perfect recollection; that it was his daily custom to call on the judge in the morning, on his way to the court-house; that in going from his own house to the lodgings of the judge, he passed by or near to the office of the marshal, who usually accompanied him, in order to attend the judge to court; and that he perfectly recollects a conversation between himself and the marshal, on the way from the judge's lodgings to the court-house, in which he remarked to the marshal the circumstance of having seen Heath with the judge. This conversation with Mr. Randolph Mr. Marshall perfectly recollects, and that it took place on the way from the judge's lodgings to the court-house; and he very naturally infers from it, that they left the judge's lodgings at the same time; as the circumstances which he has stated induced him to believe with equal probability that they went there together.

If they went together, then is Mr. Marshall also in positive contradiction with Mr. Heath. The only way in which they can be reconciled, is to suppose that Mr. Randolph went there without Mr. Marshall, and had, before that gentleman's arrival, the conversation which is related by Mr. Heath. It could not have been afterwards; for Heath went away as Marshall entered, and did not return. He has said that he was there but once; and that when he left the judge he went immediately on the hill, and related the conversation. That Marshall and Randolph went together, is in the highest degree probable; not only from Marshall's belief of the fact, and the strong impression of it remaining on his mind, but also from the circumstances which he has stated. If they went together, then it is clear, if Marshall tells the truth, that Heath left the room as they entered it; that no conversation could have taken place between Randolph and the judge, in the hearing of Heath, without being heard by Marshall also; and that none in fact did take place. Consequently it is manifest, that unless we believe, contrary to all probability, and to the belief and strong impressions of Marshall himself, that Randolph went to the judge's lodgings before him, we must admit that his testimony, as well as that of Randolph, is in flat contradiction to the testimony of Heath.

To this double contradiction we must add, the extreme improbability of the fact itself. A judge having a design to pack a jury for the purpose of procuring the conviction of a person, whose supposed offence was intimately connected with the political struggle, in which the country was then so warmly engaged; about to execute this design, at the place where the prosecution had excited the greatest irritation; surrounded on all sides, and watched at every moment, by those whom he knew to have most zealously espoused the cause of the supposed offender; and entering into a corrupt combination with the marshal, for the purpose of carrying this criminal design into effect; a judge in these circumstances and with these views, develops his plan to a perfect stranger, whom, if he had known anything of him, he must have known to be perfectly devoted to the political friends and supporters of the party accused! Sir, the thing is incredible. The judge must have been a fool as well as a knave to act in this manner. Conspiracy, sir, seeks darkness and not light. Its plots are formed in secret corners. Its communications are wrapt up in cyphers, or conveyed in cautious whispers. Had the respondent intended to hold such a conversation with the marshal, he would have waited till Heath was gone; would then have drawn his accomplice into one of those dark hiding places which conspirators love, and there would have muttered his corrupt orders. If the words which Heath relates had been spoken, the single circumstance that they were spoken openly in his presence, would be sufficient to prove that they were nothing more than a foolish jest, devoid alike of criminal intent and serious meaning. It is indeed possible that Heath may have heard the respondent utter some inconsiderate jest about democrats on the jury, which his zeal led him to mistake for a direction to the marshal to strike them off. I am desirous of supposing that something of this sort may have happened, for I can see no other way of rescuing this man from the imputation of wilful false swearing; which it would be most painful to see fixed on any person, and especially on one who has filled an honorable station under the Government of his country.

Before I quit the subject of Heath's testimony, let me be permitted, Mr. President, to ask why, if it was believed, it was not taken a year ago when witnesses were convened from all parts of the continent, and the testimony was collected on which these articles of impeachment were founded? It must have been well known at that time, for he has declared that he mentioned the fact to Hugh Holmes, Meriwether Jones, and some others, as soon as it happened, and to a great many persons afterwards. Had this testimony then been taken and presented to the public, with the rest of the evidence, we might have been prepared to contradict or explain it. I will ask why the honorable Managers have not summoned some of those persons to whom this story was related by Heath, and who might have corroborated or refuted his testimony? Those persons were fully within their reach. Nay, the minutes of this Court show that Mr. Hugh Holmes has actually been summoned; and, if I am rightly informed, he has attended for three days past. Why is he not produced? I will not undertake to account for this omission, but I will say, that if Heath's testimony was believed, it ought to have been taken at first, so as to give us an opportunity of investigating it fully; and that it appears probable that the Managers would have adduced the witnesses who were certainly in their reach, to corroborate Heath, did they not apprehend a contradiction instead of a corroboration.

So much for the proofs adduced of a previous corrupt intention in the respondent, to procure the conviction of Callender! Weak as they are in themselves, and broken by the opposing testimony, let us complete their overthrow by bringing against them the proofs which the evidence exhibits of a disposition full of justice and humanity. It is written that "by their fruits ye shall know them." Let us then look to the fruits. Let us examine the conduct of the respondent towards Callender throughout the trial, and inquire whether it bears the marks of a disposition to oppress. And first, let us oppose conversation to conversation; the conversation with William Marshall about the jury to those with Mr. Mason and Mr. Triplet. William Marshall has informed us that the judge, having heard the name of Mr. Giles mentioned in court, inquired if that was the celebrated Mr. Giles, member of Congress; that he afterwards asked the witness whether it was probable that Mr. Giles would remain in Richmond till the trial of Callender, and afterwards added, that he should wish Mr. Giles to be on that jury; and indeed, if it were proper for him to give any intimation to the marshal respecting the jury, would request him to compose it entirely of persons who agreed with Callender in political opinions. What is to be inferred from this conversation? That he wished to convict Callender? No. But that, as he knew the case to have excited strong party feelings, he wished the person accused to have a trial which would silence clamor, and preclude all suspicion of improper bias; so that a conviction, should one take place, being free from the imputation of party vengeance, might operate more strongly as an example to check the licentiousness of the press. Surely this motive was humane towards the party accused, and highly patriotic as it respected the public.

When Callender was taken, the respondent, instead of committing him to prison, as he might have done, there to wait till bail should be offered, manifested the utmost readiness to let him go out and seek for bail, and an anxious solicitude that he should find it. Instead of demanding bail in a large sum, one, two, or three thousand dollars, for instance, which it was in his power to do, he demand only what Callender himself declared that he could give; and bail was actually taken in the very moderate sum of two hundred dollars. After the counsel of Callender had been most properly overruled, on legal grounds, in their attempts to obtain a continuance; the respondent, being obliged to refuse the continuance for which no sufficient ground was laid, humanely offered to postpone the trial for weeks and months, for the accommodation of the traverser and his counsel. When this was refused, he postponed it from day to day, as long as they desired, to give the witnesses who were within reach an opportunity of coming in, and offered to issue attachments for those who did not appear, which would have induced necessarily a further delay.

And, lastly, when Callender was convicted and thus placed completely within the power of the court, the respondent, instead of going to the utmost verge of the law in the severity of punishment, fined him only one tenth of the sum, and imprisoned him only for but little more than a third of the time which the law allowed. The sum limited by law was two thousand dollars, and the fine imposed was two hundred. The term of imprisonment which the law allowed was two years, and the time fixed by the court was nine months.

Are these, Mr. President, the fruits of a disposition, oppressive and corrupt? Again I say, if this be oppression, God grant that I and mine may never be otherwise oppressed.

It is urged against the respondent, under the second charge, that he refused to let the indictment be read to the jury, when it was requested by Callender's counsel. Why did they wish the indictment to be read? It was, they tell us, for the purpose of making known to John Basset and the other jurors, before they were sworn, the nature of the charges, and thereby enabling them to declare whether they stood indifferent, or had made up and expressed an opinion as to the matter in issue. But John Basset has informed us, that when the question whether he had formed and expressed an opinion was put to him, he was perfectly apprized of the nature of the charges, and knew that Callender was indicted under the sedition law, for printing and publishing "The Prospect Before Us." As to the other jurors, it is in evidence that before the question was propounded to them, the respondent explained to them fully the subject and object of the prosecution, and the nature of the issues which they were called upon to try. Where then was the necessity, where would have been the use of reading the indictment? It could have informed John Basset of that only which he knew before; and the other jurors, of that which the respondent explained to them much better than they could have understood it, by merely hearing a long indictment read in court. The object of the counsel, they say, and certainly the only proper object, was to inform the jury. The judge took a shorter and much more effectual method of attaining the object. He clearly and fully stated to the jury the matter in issue, the points in dispute, and the legal principles which ought to govern their determination. He told them that Callender was indicted for printing or publishing certain libellous matter, extracted from "The Prospect Before Us;" that he must be proved to be the author or publisher of that book; that the passages stated in the indictment must appear to be contained verbatim in the book, and to be false, scandalous, and malicious; and that the book must appear to have been published with intent to defame the President of the United States, and to bring him into disrepute and contempt. All this he fully explained to the jurors before the question was propounded to them. Will any one say that all this could have been as clearly understood by the jury from simply hearing the indictment read? And is a judge to be censured because, instead of consuming the time of the court in reading a long indictment, he took a shorter and more effectual method of attaining the only proper object that could be attained by the reading?

As to the main point of the second charge, the overruling of Mr. Basset's supposed objection to serving on the jury, I leave the legal correctness of that decision where it has been placed by the testimony of Mr. Basset himself, and by the very learned arguments of my two colleagues, who took up this part of the case. But admitting it for a moment to be incorrect, it is not impeachable, unless it proceeded from an improper motive. And what evidence of an intention to oppress, or other improper motives does it furnish? The respondent did not know, and had no means of knowing the political opinions of Basset. And if he had known them, they could have furnished no reason for a particular wish to retain that gentleman on the jury. It would have been very easy to find another juror of the same opinions, who would have answered the purpose equally well. It is in evidence that the city of Richmond, where the court sat, and from whence a new juror must have been summoned had Basset been excused, abounded with persons of the same politics. Why then commit a crime, from which it was manifest that no advantage could have been derived?

Stress has also been laid on the question propounded to the jurors in this case; "whether they had formed and delivered an opinion on the charges in the indictment?" But this question, it will be recollected, was the same which had been settled in the case of Fries, after much deliberation. This appears by the testimony of Mr. Rawle. If, therefore, it were an improper question, it would furnish no proof of improper intentions against Callender; since it merely followed a precedent, which was established without the least reference to his case; a precedent too, in which Judge Peters concurred; and although Judge Peters was, I presume, included in the general charge of imbecility of character, advanced against the district judges by the honorable Manager who opened the prosecution, he has never been charged with a deficiency in legal knowledge.

It has moreover been proved undeniably, by my two learned colleagues who discussed this charge, that this question, as propounded to the jurors in the case of Callender, was a great relaxation of the law, in favor of the traverser. It was therefore an indulgence instead of an act of oppression; and adds one more to the numerous proofs displayed by the respondent in this case, of a disposition full of humanity and kindness towards the party accused.

Under the third charge, which is founded on the rejection of Colonel Taylor's testimony, it has been contended by the honorable Managers, that the respondent rejected this testimony without knowing what it was. But this, sir, is an utter mistake. No part of Colonel Taylor's testimony was rejected except what related to the three questions stated by the counsel for Callender. From anything that appears we cannot conclude, that any other testimony which Colonel Taylor might have been able to give, would have been rejected. It was not suggested that he could give any other, and there was no question about any other. Into the legal correctness of rejecting those questions, it is not necessary for me to inquire. That point I must cheerfully leave to be decided on the very learned and conclusive arguments of my two colleagues. But I will request the indulgence of this honorable Court, while I advert, as briefly as possible, to some of those considerations which show conclusively to my mind, that admitting the decision on this doubtful and difficult point of law to have been incorrect, it could not have proceeded from improper intention.

And here let me remark, that the respondent could not have been ignorant of Colonel Taylor's high standing and character in the State of Virginia, of the influence attached to his name and his opinions, or the resentment which must in all probability be excited by any act of oppression or impropriety, whereof he might in any degree be considered as the object. The respondent could not be ignorant of the state of irritation which then existed, in that part of the nation, on the subject of the sedition law; nor of the extreme offence which must be given by any conduct of the court having or capable of receiving the appearance of oppression, under that law. He could not be ignorant that to reject Colonel Taylor's testimony was extremely capable of receiving that appearance, and could hardly fail to assume it in the state of personal and political feeling which then existed. He is admitted on all hands to be a man of sense: and would a man of sense, without some strong motive, commit deliberately a crime, so likely to blow up a flame of resentment against himself, and those with whom he was connected?

What motive could the respondent have for rejecting improperly this testimony? To secure the conviction of Callender? No: for he was equally sure of that without the rejection; Colonel Taylor's testimony applied to but one charge, and there were nineteen others undefended. If then he rejected this testimony, knowing it to be proper, he committed, without motive or object, the crime the most like to heap odium on himself, and to bring disgrace and ruin on the party with which he was connected.

Had he been actuated by a criminal intention to oppress Callender, it is far more probable that he would have received this testimony, believing it to be improper, than that he would have rejected it, believing it to be proper. A judge capable of acting deliberately under the influence of such a design, must be as regardless of the law as of his oath. His considering the testimony as illegal would not prevent him from receiving it, if receiving it could serve his purpose better than its rejection. In this case it would have served his purpose better. To reject it gave him no additional hold on Callender, who was placed completely in his power by the nineteen undefended charges; but to receive it would throw a cloak of fairness and humanity over his conduct, under cover of which he might more safely and more fully glut his vengeance. The more he had saved appearances in this respect, the more safely might he have indulged his vindictive temper afterwards.

But it is clearly proved, by his requesting the District Attorney to consent to this evidence, that he was actuated not by a wish to exclude it, but by a conscientious belief that it was illegal and inadmissible. This request may perhaps be represented, and I think already has been, as a mere cloak; as an artful subterfuge, to escape from the indignation which he saw rising. But how does this agree with the character of open and high-handed violence, which the honorable gentlemen attribute to the respondent? How does it agree with that incautious openness in his conversation, that indiscreet promptness in his conduct, almost amounting to precipitation, which appear throughout to enter essentially into his character? And had he been thus artificial, thus capable of throwing an hypocritical cloak of candor over his wickedness, must he not have perceived that his true policy consisted in receiving the testimony without regard to its illegality.

If there could remain any doubt as to the correctness of his motives in rejecting this testimony, it would be removed by his offer to submit the question to the judges of the Supreme Court, and to respite the sentence until their opinion could be known; the traverser, in the mean time, remaining at large on bail. It is distinctly stated by Mr. Robertson and Mr. William Marshall, that this offer was made in reference to the decision of this point. We have had, indeed, some cavilling about bills of exceptions in criminal cases; perhaps the judge may have expressed himself inaccurately. He may have spoken of a bill of exceptions instead of a case stated; or he may have been misunderstood by the witnesses in this particular. But it is unquestionably proved, that in substance he offered to submit the question, whether this testimony was properly rejected or not, to the revision of all the judges of the Supreme Court; to let the sentence await the result of their deliberations; and to grant a new trial if they should think the decision erroneous. It is well known to every lawyer, that although no writ of error or bill of exceptions lies in criminal cases, yet it is the usual practice, in England as well as in America, when any new and difficult point arises in a criminal trial, to state it for the consideration of a superior court, and to respite the judgment till the decision of that court can be had. The point in such cases is regularly argued by counsel before the superior court, to whose decision the judgment of the inferior court is made to conform. It is also known that a new trial may be granted in a criminal case where there is a conviction, though not where there is an acquittal. What the respondent offered in this case might have been done; and he went further. He offered to assist Callender's counsel in doing it. He offered them the assistance of his legal knowledge and experience in framing the case to be stated on the record, for the consideration of the Supreme Court. This appears from the testimony of Mr. William Marshall. It is not for me to decide or inquire why these offers, and all the others made by the respondent in this trial of Callender, were contemptuously rejected by his counsel. It is enough for me that the offers were made, and that the conduct of my honorable client in making them, taken in connexion with the other circumstances which have been noted, proves beyond all possibility of doubt, that however erroneous in point of law, his rejection of Colonel Taylor's testimony may have been, it proceeded from his honest judgment, and not from a corrupt intention to oppress.

I come now, Mr. President, to notice some of the charges embraced by the fourth article; and first the refusal to continue the case of Callender till the next term. To prove the correctness of this refusal in point of law, I desire no better authority than that produced by the honorable Managers themselves, from 6 Bacon's Abridgment, new edition, page 652. It is there laid down on the authority of Tidd's Practice, 500; 3 Burrows, 1514, and 1 Black. Rep. 436, that, "where there is no cause of suspicion, the affidavit to put off the trial on account of the absence of a material witness, is sufficient in the common form, namely: that the person absent is a material witness, without whose testimony the defendant cannot safely proceed to trial; that he has endeavored without effect to get him subpoenaed, but that he is in hopes of procuring his future attendance. But if there be any cause of suspicion, the court should be satisfied from circumstances—first, that the person absent is a material witness; secondly, that the party applying has not been guilty of any laches; and thirdly, that he is in reasonable expectation of procuring his attendance at some future time." Here it appears that even where there is no cause of suspicion, that is, no cause for suspecting that the application for a continuance is made merely for the purpose of delay, still the affidavit must state, that the party applying for the continuance "is in hopes of procuring the future attendance of the witness." The affidavit in Callender's case is contained in the exhibit, No. 5, filed with the answer. Let it be examined, and contrasted with this authority. It will be found to contain no such statement, and is therefore clearly insufficient, even had the case been free from suspicion of affected delay. But is it possible for any man to say that it was free from such suspicion, after having heard the testimony delivered at the bar? Has not the leading counsel for Callender, who filed the affidavit and made the motion for a continuance, impliedly acknowledged that his sole object was delay? Has he not acknowledged that he knew Callender to be incapable of defence on any other ground than the unconstitutionality of the sedition law, and consequently, that he knew the absent witnesses to be unnecessary, and was as well prepared for trial without them as he could be with them, since nothing that they could prove could have any effect on that question? Has he not expressly declared, that one great object which he had in wishing for the continuance was, to get the trial before a different judge? And when this is admitted by the learned gentleman himself to have been the truth, was it very unnatural that the respondent should suspect it? If he had grounds for suspecting it, of which he was to judge, the authority informs us that there ought to have been circumstances stated by the affidavit, sufficient to satisfy him that the absent witnesses were material, and that the party applying was in reasonable expectation of being able to procure their attendance at some other time. No such expectation is stated in the affidavit, which was clearly insufficient on that ground, and a comparison of it with the indictment plainly shows that the absent witnesses were not material. The learned Managers are therefore entitled to our thanks, for furnishing us with an authority which conclusively establishes our case.

But admitting the respondent to have decided incorrectly in refusing this continuance, where is the evidence of improper intention? If it were an honest error in judgment, he is free from blame. And how can we doubt the uprightness of his intentions, when we recollect that although he considered himself unauthorized to grant a continuance till the next term, because it was not a matter of mere discretion, and no legal ground for it was in his opinion shown, he yet offered a postponement for six weeks, which it was in his power to grant without legal cause? This offer to postpone for six weeks, which throws so strong a light of upright intention and humane indulgence on the whole conduct of the respondent, has been forgotten by Mr. Hay, but fortunately for us it is remembered distinctly by three or four most respectable witnesses, and especially by Mr. Edmund Lee and Mr. William Marshall. There can be no doubt of the fact. It is even manifest that three or four months would have been allowed, had they been asked for. To give six weeks would have made it necessary for the judge to return home, in order to hold the court in Delaware; and when he had returned, it would have been more agreeable and convenient to remain some time at home, than to hurry immediately back to Richmond, in order to hold the court at the end of six weeks. How is this humane and accommodating offer to postpone, at a great inconvenience to himself, to be reconciled with a corrupt disposition to oppress Callender? And why should the respondent refuse to continue the case till the next term, which would have exposed him to no inconvenience or trouble, and yet offer to postpone it for six weeks at the expense of a new journey to Richmond? It could have been for no other reason, than a belief that he was obliged by the law to refuse the continuance, and a desire to indulge the traverser and his counsel as far as the rules of law would permit.

Here again I forbear to inquire into the motives of Callender's counsel for refusing this indulgence, by which they would have completely obtained all the legal and proper objects of a continuance. With their motives we have nothing to do. It is into the motives of the judge alone that we are bound to inquire, and of the purity of them, this offer so indulgent and humane, and so unaccountably rejected, leaves no doubt.

As to the rude, unusual, and contemptuous expressions, which are charged under the fourth article, and have been detailed by one of the witnesses for the prosecution, it is material to remark, how different an impression these expressions made on different persons, according to the various states of mind in which they were heard. Mr. Hay was so highly irritated, as to construe a bow into an affront. There had been much mirth at his expense, in which Colonel Taylor tells us that he did not at all partake; and he thought these expressions rude and contemptuous. To Colonel Taylor, who, though perhaps not inclined to view the respondent's conduct with very favorable eyes, had not the same causes of irritation with Mr. Hay, and was far more cool, they appeared in the less exceptionable light of "imperative, sarcastic, and witty." Mr. Gooch may be considered, perhaps, as favorably inclined toward the respondent, but has shown no disposition to extenuate his conduct; and he regarded these expressions, as mere efforts on the part of the respondent to show his wit. Wit, I allow, has nothing to do on the bench. If a judge should happen to possess it, attempts to display it in the discharge of his official functions, would, perhaps, be unbecoming, or even improper; but certainly not criminal. To Mr. Basset, who appears to be of a warmer temperament, and whose feelings seem to lean toward the respondent, those expressions appeared to be firm without being imperative, and facetious; but not sarcastic. And is criminality to be inferred from acts which thus receive their hue, not from anything in themselves perceptible to this honorable Court, but from the characters, the feelings, and the modes of thinking of those who relate them? If so, then innocence and guilt must depend not on the conduct of the accused, but on the temper and discernment of the witnesses. The Chief Justice of the United States, who was present during all these transactions, saw nothing improper or unusual in the conduct of Judge Chase. These expressions, which so forcibly struck the heated and angry mind of Mr. Hay, conveyed no idea of impropriety to the mind of the Chief Justice; a gentleman as remarkable for the delicacy of his manners, as for quick discernment and sound understanding. Mr. Edmund Randolph was in court during a great part of Callender's trial, and he perceived in the conduct of the court, nothing rude, unusual, or indicative of a disposition to oppress. I appeal to all who have the pleasure of knowing that gentleman, whether such conduct could have taken place without arresting his attention. So remarkable himself for urbanity of manners, and correctness of personal deportment, he must have been shocked by so glaring a departure from them in a judge seated on the bench. That lively and instinctive sense of propriety, which forms the basis of refined good breeding, would have made him feelingly alive to such a departure, in such a place, from that line of conduct which decorum no less than duty prescribes to a judge. On those finely attuned nerves, which render him the delight of every social circle where he appears, expressions rude and contemptuous would have grated most harshly, and would have made an impression not to be forgotten. Yet Mr. Randolph remembers no such expressions.

And we find no less difference between the different witnesses, respecting the specific terms of those expressions, than respecting their general character. Of this, one instance may suffice. Mr. Hay has stated that the respondent interrupted Mr. Wirt, and rudely and peremptorily ordered him to sit down. The expressions which this witness attributes to the respondent, on this occasion, are, "sit down, sir;" than which the language furnishes none more harsh or indecorous. But from the testimony of Mr. Robertson, a disinterested spectator, who took down in short-hand all that passed at the trial, it appears that the expressions addressed to Mr. Wirt, were, "please, sir, to be seated." And Mr. Gooch, who attended the trial for the express purpose of observing all that passed, states that the respondent, being about to deliver an opinion while Mr. Wirt was up, said to that gentleman, "please, sir, to take your seat." Thus it is that passion distorts every object to the view, magnifies mole-hills into mountains, and converts the most complaisant phrases into "rude, unusual, and contemptuous expressions." To the heated imagination of Mr. Hay, the expressions which he has detailed, no doubt, appeared in that light; but this honorable Court will be guided, not by the exaggerated and distorted views presented to his irritated mind, but by the testimony of those calm and dispassionate witnesses, who were able to view the subject through an unclouded medium.

Let me now, Mr. President, be indulged in one or two remarks respecting the interruptions of counsel, which form one of the charges under this article. Mr. William Marshall has told us that he remembers a case, in which counsel were more frequently interrupted by Judge Iredell, than they were, on this occasion, by the respondent. We all know the character of that eminent and excellent judge, whose just eulogium the honorable Managers have pronounced at this bar, and whose example they have set up as a standard, whereby to measure the conduct of the respondent. Will they not, in this instance, consent to be judged by their own rule? Will they still insist on condemning, in the respondent that which has been practised to a greater extent by Judge Iredell?

But we know the cause which produced the greater part of these interruptions, and which rendered them proper and necessary. Mr. Basset has informed us that Callender's counsel appeared to rest their case wholly on the unconstitutionality of the sedition law; that they wished to argue this point before the jury, and had flattered themselves with the hope of success; that after the court had formally declared this attempt to be improper, and that the jury could not take cognizance of the question, they continually renewed the attempt, and as often as they did they were stopped by the court. This statement is supported by Mr. Gooch and Colonel Gamble. And will any man say that, under such circumstances, it was not proper to interrupt the counsel? Will any man say, that counsel ought to be suffered to fly in the face of the court's authority, and to set at naught its orders and decisions?

These interruptions, moreover, as the Chief Justice has informed us, were made in the ordinary manner of the judge, and were not more frequent than was usual with him in civil cases. Therefore, they afford no proof of an oppressive disposition toward Callender, or of an improper disposition toward any person. They afford proofs of that promptness, sometimes bordering on precipitation, which is well known to make part of his character. It is in proof by the testimony of Mr. Purviance, who has long practised in courts where the respondent presided, that he is much in the habit of interrupting counsel, even those to whom he is known to be most strongly attached; that in his interruptions there is no discrimination between his friends and those who are not so; and that if counsel, when thus interrupted, keep their temper, and coolly and respectfully insist on their right to be heard, they never fail to obtain a hearing, and frequently succeed in removing impressions which the judge had too hastily taken up against their cause. If here be weakness, there is magnanimity which atones for it; and if, in this case, Mr. Hay, instead of contemptuously leaving the court, when he thought himself improperly interrupted, had maintained his ground with firmness, but with that respectful manner, also, which was due to the age and station of the judge, and which would have been highly becoming in himself, there is no doubt that he would have obtained as full a hearing as he could have desired.

On the "indecent solicitude" charged by this article to have been manifested by the respondent for the conviction of Callender, I will remark that, if its existence had been proved, still it broke out into no overt act of oppression or injustice, and, therefore, is not the object of punishment, or of judicial cognizance. Intentions, unless accompanied by acts, solicitude, and wishes, unless carried into effect, are offences unknown to our criminal code, and inconsistent with the principles of our Constitution.

The fifth and sixth charges, relative to the operation of the Virginia laws on the case of Callender, and their supposed violation by the respondent, have been so ably and clearly refuted by my two learned colleagues, who immediately preceded me, that nothing remains to be said on those points. I will merely remark that, had an error been committed, in awarding a capias against Callender on the presentment, and making it returnable to the court then sitting, it would have been the error of the District Attorney and the clerk, for which the respondent could have been in no manner answerable. It is in evidence by the testimony of the clerk himself, Mr. William Marshall, that when the presentment against Callender was returned into court, the respondent, then sitting alone, asked Mr. Nelson, the District Attorney, what was the proper process in such a case? who answered, a capias; and that the capias, actually issued, was immediately drawn up at the bar by the clerk, was inspected and approved by Mr. Nelson, and was then ordered by the judge. In a case of this nature, relating to the local laws and practice of the State, the respondent being then unassisted by the district judge, could apply to no better guides than the clerk and the District Attorney, both at that time practitioners in the State courts; and had they led him into an error, which they certainly did not, it would be the height of absurdity as well as of injustice, to impute it to him as an offence.

I have now, Mr. President, concluded my remarks on those charges which arise out of the trial of Callender.

[Mr. Harper was proceeding to the next article, when, it being three o'clock, a motion was made to adjourn till the next day. When the question was about to be taken, Mr. H. observed to the Court that, although an adjournment would be a personal convenience and gratification to him, yet if his wishes could be at all consulted, he would prefer to conclude his argument on that day; that the time had become very short, which afforded some ground to apprehend that a postponement of the decision till next session might be thought necessary; and that it was, therefore, extremely desirable, and very much desired by his client and himself, to close the argument as soon as possible.]

An adjournment for half an hour was then moved and carried.]

When the Court met again,

Mr. RANDOLPH said that, with the leave of the counsel for the respondent, he would offer one or two observations, which might save that gentleman and the Court some trouble. We know, said he, we cannot lay much stress on the testimony of a single man, rebutted by that of another respectable witness. Among the persons summoned to appear, who are able to give evidence of the declaration of Mr. Heath respecting the conversation between Judge Chase and Mr. Randolph, are Messrs. Meriwether Jones and Hugh Holmes. Mr. Jones, we are advised, is, from extreme indisposition, unable to attend. Mr. Holmes, the Speaker of the House of Delegates, did not attend until since the evidence on the part of the prosecution was closed. That honorable and respectable man is, however, now in the lobby. I only state this circumstance in tenderness to the character of the witness, and that Mr. Holmes is ready to prove that, pending the trial of Callender, Mr. Heath did declare to him as having passed in his presence such a conversation as the witness has stated. It is not our wish to press his evidence, because we know that the evidence of a witness thus rebutted can establish nothing material to the prosecution. But we are ready, if the Court and counsel for the respondent agree, to receive his testimony.

Mr. HARPER.—It is not for us to say how the honorable Managers shall proceed in conducting this prosecution. We have no objection to Mr. Holmes being examined; and we feel perfectly indifferent whether Mr. Heath be abandoned or not. Should Mr. Holmes not be examined, I presume it will be understood that he was offered to support the declaration of Mr. Heath.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was not intended to abandon Mr. Heath.

Mr. HARPER inquired how long Mr. Holmes had been in the city. If correctly informed he had been here three days, and if so, his testimony might have been adduced before the defence on the part of the respondent was made.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the not previously offering Mr. Holmes to the Court arose solely from an indisposition to interrupt the counsel for the defendant. The character of Mr. Holmes stood too high to be impeached. It was only when they heard the correctness of Mr. Heath's testimony questioned, that the Managers deemed it necessary to do that, for the not doing of which they had received the censure of the counsel for the respondent. Mr. Randolph then moved that Hugh Holmes should be sworn.

The PRESIDENT said, the reasons assigned for the admission of Mr. Holmes's testimony, so far as they arose from tenderness to the character of Mr. Heath, could have no weight with the Court. The only question for them to decide was, whether his testimony was or was not material.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he held it to be the right of either party, at any stage of the trial, when the evidence of a witness was impeached, to justify it by the testimony of another witness. He asked the receiving, therefore, of Mr. Holmes's testimony as a matter of right, not of favor.

The yeas and nays were taken on examining Mr. Holmes, and were—yeas 21, nays 11.

In answer to an interrogatory put by Mr. Randolph,

Mr. Holmes replied: I was at Richmond when the circuit court sat there. I am told they sat on the 22d of May, 1800. On the Sunday following I left Richmond. My impression is, that Mr. Heath, between Wednesday and Sunday, told me in substance what I understand has been related to this honorable Court. It has been detailed to me, and I cannot trace any difference between it and my recollection.

Mr. Harper. Please to state it.

Mr. Holmes. It was this: That he (Mr. Heath) had business with Judge Chase of a judicial nature, and waited upon him; that while he was there Mr. Randolph came in; that he held a paper in his hand; the judge asked him what it contained; he replied, the panel of the jury for the trial of Callender. The judge asked if there were any persons of a particular description, I think democrats, on it. Mr. Randolph said there was. The judge then said no such persons must be on the panel.

Mr. Harper. Are you confident that you left Richmond the Sunday following?

Mr. Holmes. I think so. It is possible that I may be mistaken. As to the substance of the conversation I cannot be mistaken, though I may as to the time. Mr. Heath may have given me the account in the following September, when I was at Richmond.

Mr. Nicholson. Were there any persons present when Mr. Heath gave you this information?

Mr. Holmes. I think Judge Brookes and General Minor were.

Mr. Martin. Did you leave town on the Sunday before or after Callender was tried?

Mr. Holmes. I left town before he was tried.

Mr. Randolph. I understand you as stating that you are positive as to the substance of the conversation, but not as to time?

Mr. Holmes. I think it was during the first time I was in Richmond, but it may have been during the second time. But I think I may speak positively of the substance of the conversation.

Mr. HARPER. This testimony of Mr. Holmes, Mr. President, completes the overthrow of John Heath, whom it was adduced to support. It adds the last clench to the nail, by which his testimony is fixed on high. This honorable Court will recollect that John Heath declared that, as soon as the conversation between Judge Chase and the marshal about striking those "creatures called democrats," from the jury summoned to try Callender took place, which was in the morning before the court met, he went immediately on the hill and related that conversation to Hugh Holmes. This, consequently, must have happened before Mr. Holmes left Richmond. He tells us that he left Richmond on Sunday, the 25th of May. We know from the record evidenced in the cause, as well as from the testimony of Mr. William Marshall, and some other witnesses, that Callender was not brought to Richmond until the 27th of May. And it is well known that, by the practice of Virginia, a jury is never summoned to try an offender till he is before the court, and puts himself upon trial. Consequently, at the time when John Heath informed Mr. Holmes that he had seen the marshal present to the respondent the panel of jurors summoned for the trial of Callender, and heard the respondent tell the marshal to strike off all the "creatures called democrats," it is perfectly certain that no jury had been summoned; that the marshal had not taken Callender; that it was perfectly uncertain whether he would be taken; and that no such circumstance as Heath related to Mr. Holmes, could possibly have taken place. For this flat contradiction of their witness, we are indebted to the honorable Managers, and we tender them our thanks. They have furnished us, by the same respectable testimony, with another contradiction of minor importance, but not undeserving of notice. Heath says that he made this communication to Mr. Holmes in the morning. Mr. Holmes states, as his strong belief, that it was made in the evening. So much for the testimony of Mr. John Heath; which I leave, without further remark, where it has been placed by Mr. David M. Randolph, Mr. William Marshall, and Mr. Holmes; and proceed to consider the transactions at New-castle, in Delaware, which form the matter of the seventh charge.

And here three questions present themselves for examination: What was the respondent's conduct on that occasion? How far was that conduct conformable to duty and propriety? What were the motives from which it proceeded? On all the previous articles the same division of the matter presented itself to the mind; but the two first grounds were fully occupied by my learned colleagues. What remained for me belonged almost entirely to the third division. Here, on the eighth charge, being deprived of their able assistance, it is incumbent on me to consider the subject under each of these three points of view.

As to the conduct of the respondent, he admits, in substance, that he did, on the first day of the court, decline to discharge the grand jury on their request; did state to them some information which he had received respecting a seditious printer in the town of Wilmington, who was said to be in the habit of violating the act of Congress called the seditious law, and did inform them that it was their duty to inquire into that affair. He also admits that he requested the District Attorney to assist them with his advice in making this inquiry. But he denies that he did utter those expressions relative to a seditious temper in the State of Delaware, or any part of it, with which he is charged.

That he uttered those expressions is sworn by Mr. George Read, the District Attorney of Delaware, and Mr. Lee, one of the grand jurors. Four witnesses, on the contrary, equally respectable and equally intelligent with Mr. Read and Mr. Lee, have deposed that they were present, that they attended particularly to what passed, and that they heard no such expressions. First, Judge Bedford, who sat by the side of the respondent at the time, who must have heard all that was said, and who appears to have remarked particularly what the respondent said on the subject of seditious publications; for he afterwards told him that he had used expressions which would give offence; yet Judge Bedford did not hear any such expressions as are stated by Mr. Read and Mr. Lee. Next, Mr. Vandyke, the Attorney General of the State of Delaware; a gentleman of high character, whose manner of delivering his testimony, proves him to be very capable of accurate observation. He attended in court at this time, and was attentive to the proceedings, but he heard nothing of these remarkable expressions. Then, Mr. Hamilton, who attended the court as an assistant to his father, the marshal, sat near the judges, listened to the conversation between the respondent and the jury, but heard nothing of those remarkable expressions. And fourthly, Mr. Hall, was in court during the whole time, paid particular attention to what passed, but heard nothing of this seditious temper in the State of Delaware, and particularly in the county of New-castle, and, more especially in the town of Wilmington. On Mr. Moore, so much stress cannot be laid as on the former witnesses, because he was not particularly attentive to what passed on the first day. Laying him, however, out of the case, we have four witnesses against two; and these four witnesses were so situated that they must have heard those expressions had they been uttered, and must have remarked them. Judge Bedford did remark expressions far less strong, which he was apprehensive might give offence. Is it possible then to believe that those very offensive expressions, had they fallen from the respondent, could have escaped his notice?

But there is another piece of evidence still stronger than the testimony of these witnesses. We know that within a day or two after these transactions took place, an account of them was published by the printer, and in the gazette which had been the object of the respondent's animadversions. The publication is in evidence before the court. It is sufficiently exaggerated, but it makes no mention of those remarkable and offensive expressions. The printer, it is evident, was extremely well disposed to represent the respondent's conduct in the most unfavorable light that truth would justify. He no doubt received his information of what passed from persons who felt the same disposition. Those persons must have heard these expressions, had they been uttered, must have been struck by them, and surely would not have suppressed them.

When this mass of evidence stands opposed to Mr. Read and Mr. Lee, can we hesitate to pronounce that they have stated what never took place? I am far from intending to charge them with intentional departure from truth. No doubt they understood, in this manner, something that was said. But it is plain that there must be a mistake somewhere. Their testimony cannot be reconciled with that of the four witnesses for the respondent, or with that of the printer, which, under the circumstances of this case, is stronger than all the rest. And it is much more probable that two men should be mistaken than four; and that all the six should have been mistaken, than that this printer should have been uninformed of, or should have omitted to notice, those expressions, if they had been used by the respondent.

These expressions, indeed, contain nothing criminal. To have used them would not have been an impeachable offence; but it would have been an act of great indecorum and impropriety. It was the duty of the judge to charge the grand jury, and to point their attention to any specific offences against the laws of the United States, which had come within his knowledge or information; but, to utter indiscriminate abuse against a whole State or county, to charge the people of it, generally, with a seditious temper, would have been equally extrajudicial and unbecoming. This consideration, we hope, will be admitted as an apology for occupying so much time in the refutation of a charge, which, in every other point of view, is manifestly frivolous and futile. We wish to rescue the conduct of our honorable client from the imputation of impropriety as well as of guilt.

It may, perhaps, be replied, that we rely on merely negative testimony to disprove these expressions, while positive testimony is adduced to prove them. But whether testimony ought to be regarded as positive or merely negative, depends on the situation of the witnesses and the circumstances of the case. When a man swears he did not see a transaction which might have taken place without his seeing it, his testimony is merely negative, and can have no weight against that of a witness who swears that he did see the transaction. But when it is of such a nature that it could not possibly, or within the bounds of reasonable probability, have taken place without being seen by the person who swears that he did not see it, the testimony of such person then assumes the character, and possesses the weight, of positive testimony. It is the same as if he had sworn positively that no such transaction did take place. If, for instance, a witness were to swear that he saw a man standing with his hat on during the whole of the trial, in the open space on the floor, between the President and me; and every other person present were to swear, as they no doubt would, that they had seen no such person—surely no man in his senses would put this on the footing of merely negative testimony, and contend that the first witness was to be believed against all the others! And where is the difference between the two cases? It consists, I answer, solely in the number of witnesses; for it is as impossible that these expressions should have been uttered by the respondent, without being heard by Judge Bedford, Mr. Vandyke, Mr. Hamilton, and the persons who gave information to the printer, as that a man should stand for an hour with his hat on, in the middle of this floor, without being observed by the audience.

We are therefore warranted in laying these expressions out of the case; and then to what does it amount? There was a law of the United States for the punishment of seditious libels, which the respondent, as judge of the circuit court of Delaware, was bound to enforce within that district. On his way to the court he receives information that certain habitual violations of this law are committed within the district. This information is given to him, as appears from the testimony of Mr. Hall, by a justice of the peace for that district, whose duty it was to attend to such offences, and to take all legal steps for bringing the offenders to justice. This information, derived from this official and authentic source, the respondent communicates to the grand jury, observing to them that it was their duty to inquire into the matter, and that they must remain in session one day more for that purpose. He goes further. He requests, or, if the honorable Managers will have it so, he orders the District Attorney to assist them with his advice in making this inquiry, and directs a file of the newspapers supposed to contain these libellous publications, to be procured and laid before them. This is "the head and front of his offending." And will the honorable Managers be pleased to point out the rule or principle of law that was violated by these acts? Will they be so good as to inform us whether it was not the duty of the grand jury to inquire concerning offences within the district; and of the judge to give in charge to them all such offences as had come to his knowledge? Suppose that, instead of a breach of the sedition law, a piracy had taken place on the high seas, and information had been given to the judge that the pirates were lurking in the district of Delaware; would it not have been his duty to state this information to the grand jury, and to direct them to inquire concerning the offence? And I again call on the honorable gentlemen, as I had occasion to do in a former part of the case, to inform us by what authority, and what criterion, a judge is to distinguish some offences from others—to prosecute some and let others, as far as depends on him, escape with impunity.

The honorable gentleman who opened the case on the part of the prosecution, admitted distinctly, in his opening speech, that a judge may properly be zealous and active, in the execution of the criminal law generally; and he bestowed very high, and probably very just encomiums on a judge of Virginia, whom he represents as thus vigilant, zealous and active. But it is zeal and activity in the execution of this particular law, that he imputes as a crime to the respondent.

But if this zeal and activity of the respondent be not confined to this particular law, of which there is not the least proof or pretence, how, I ask, can it be an offence, according to the principle of the honorable gentleman? Surely each particular law is a part of the whole body of the law. Will the honorable gentleman be pleased to inform us how it is possible to be zealous and active as to the whole, without being so as to each of the parts? Will he inform us how the laws can be executed, except by parts; and whether it ever did or could happen that they were all violated at once?

There is, however, a more serious objection to this principle; which, if it be correct, goes to invest the Judiciary with a power infinitely more formidable and alarming than has ever yet been contended for in this, or, as far as I know, in any country.

In what part of our Constitution, or of our system of jurisprudence, have the honorable gentlemen found this dispensing power of the judges, over a part of the laws? Was not the sedition act, while in force, a law of the land? Were the courts of justice to neglect its execution, because it had been opposed by a political party in the Legislature, or was disagreeable to a portion of the people? Are the honorable gentlemen willing to be tried by this their principle? Let them, before they answer in the affirmative, examine how far it will carry them. We now have circuit courts, and associate justices to hold them. We now have, and probably always shall have, parties in Congress and in the country. It is very possible that laws may be passed, which will be highly disagreeable to one of those parties. Are gentlemen prepared to say, that judges may dispense with the execution of all laws, which they may suppose to be of this description? If gentlemen find this principle intolerable and absurd, when applied to laws passed by themselves, will they still insist on its application to such as were heretofore passed against their opinion? Or will they contend that the question, whether a person shall be punished for the violation of a law, shall depend on the popularity or unpopularity of the law, in the particular district where the offence is committed? Is a judge appointed to hold a criminal court, to inquire from the people of the district, or from popular leaders, what laws he shall execute? Ought he to take his information on this subject from political parties, or from the statute book? Would this be living under equal laws equally, impartially, and steadily administered? And do not such laws, so administered, constitute the very essence and definition of free government?

On principle then—even the principle admitted by the honorable gentleman himself who opened the prosecution—the conduct of the respondent in directing the attention of the grand jury to this offence, is strictly justifiable. But it does not rest on principle alone. It is strongly supported by precedent, both in England and this country. In the Lawyer's Magazine, an authentic collection of legal proceedings and adjudications, vol. 3, page 333, we find a charge delivered to a grand jury by Chief Baron Peryn, in which he calls their attention to certain particular offences. In page 384, of the same book, we find Lord Loughborough calling the attention of the grand jury to particular offences. In the fifth volume of the same work, page 199, there appears a charge of Judge Ashurst, in which he directs the attention of the grand jury to certain seditious societies. And in the report of Hardy's trial, we see the celebrated Chief Justice Eyre, as illustrious for his justice, humanity, and love of liberty, as for his profound knowledge of the law and his great talents as a judge, directing the attention of the grand jury to a particular offence.

Passing from England to this country, we see Judge Iredell, whose example has so often been held up for imitation, directing the attention of the grand jury, in a very particular and emphatic manner, to the particular case of the Northampton insurgents. This took place at the circuit court at which those insurgents were to be tried; and the charge was delivered to the same grand jury which found the first indictment against John Fries. And we have another authority more directly in point, because it occurred in the case of a supposed libellous publication. It is also furnished by a judge of great legal reputation and talents, whom I trust the honorable gentlemen will not consider as inimical to liberty, or disposed to judicial oppression—I mean Mr. McKean, formerly Chief Justice, and now Governor of Pennsylvania. In a charge delivered to a grand jury of the city and county of Philadelphia, on the 27th of November, 1797, after a very elaborate and luminous exposition of the law relative to libels, he informs them that a certain printer in that city, meaning Cobbett, the publisher of Porcupine's Gazette, was, and long had been, in the habit of offending against this law, by the publication of scandalous and malicious libels; that he had interfered and endeavored to arrest the progress of this offender, by binding him over to good behaviour; that the printer, in contempt of his recognisance, and in defiance of the authority of the law, persisted in his mischievous course; and that the duty of arresting him devolved on the grand jury, by whom alone the strong correctives appearing to be necessary could be applied. The expressions used by this learned and able judge are strong and remarkable. I will take the liberty of presenting them to the court in his own dress. [Here Mr. Harper read the charge from Claypole's Gazette, of November 28th or 29th, 1797.] It will be remarked that the printer in this case had not been bound over to appear at the court and answer for a libel, but had been bound in a recognisance to be of good behaviour, which he was supposed to have violated by publishing further libels. On this recognisance a civil action had been brought; and the grand jury, who had nothing to do with the recognisance, nor any information before them, were thus called upon to apply a further corrective, by presenting the offender. It is impossible that a case should be more exactly in point. Indeed it goes much farther than the conduct of the respondent at New-castle.

I am far from condemning or calling in question the conduct of the late Chief Justice of Pennsylvania, in this instance. But I contend that the same act which has been considered proper in him, ought not to be imputed as a crime to my honorable client.

Thus we see that the conduct of the respondent, in this instance, was strictly correct, whether it be tested by principle or precedent. If this could be doubted, if it were even admitted that he acted incorrectly, it would still be clear that he acted from proper motives; that his error was a mere error of his judgment, and consequently cannot be the ground of a conviction on impeachment.

Had he been conscious of improper intentions, how easy was it for him to accomplish his object, without appearing in the business? When Dr. McMechin, from whom, as Mr. Hall tells us, he received the information, mentioned these publications to him, it would have been easy for him to request that gentleman to give the information to the grand jury. Dr. McMechin no doubt would have complied with this request; the grand jury would have obtained the information ; the printer, had it appeared proper to them, would have been presented ; and the respondent would have attained his end without in the least exposing himself to view. Would he not have acted thus had he been conscious of improper designs ? With criminal plans of oppression in his mind, would he not have sought concealment, where it was so easily practised, and could in no degree have impeded his projects ? Undoubtedly he would. Nothing but a consciousness of upright views could have induced him in such circumstances to act this frank and open part.

In judging of men's motives, it is material also to listen to their private conversations, addressed at the time to those in whom they have confidence. In such conversations the hearts of the most cautious are apt to expand, and the most hidden plans are sometimes disclosed. What was the respondent's reply to Judge Bedford, when that gentleman censured him for acting imprudently in recommending in that part of the country an inquiry into the offences against the sedition law ? " My dear Bedford," to use the beautiful language of the respondent as repeated by the witness, " no matter where we are, nor among whom we are, we must do our duty." This, sir, is the language of the heart ; not of a corrupt heart, filled with plans of oppression and violence, but of a heart manly, upright, and honorable. It bears the intrinsic character, the genuine stamp, of sincerity and truth. It is a frank and unstudied avowal of motives, made to a confidential friend in an unsuspecting moment ; and it is of more avail than volumes of testimony, to show the real impressions under which he acted.

Remember, too, how readily, and in what good humor the respondent gave up this point, and acquiesced in the opinion of the grand jury and the District Attorney, when they declared they had found nothing libellous in the papers. Having acted from a sense of duty in calling the attention of the grand jury to the subject, he was content with having discharged his duty, and pressed the matter no further. But had he acted from a vindictive spirit of oppression, or any other improper motive, inducing him to wish for the prosecution of the printer, would he so readily have desisted ? The file of papers was within his reach. We, who have examined it, know that he might have found in it libellous matter enough. And would he not have examined it ? Would he not have pointed out the libellous passages to the grand jury ? Would he not have sent them out again with stronger injunctions to do their duty ? Do oppressors so readily abandon their projects when the accomplishment is so much in their power ? No, sir. This conduct in the respondent is utterly inconsistent with any other motive than that sense of duty under which it is manifest that he acted throughout.

We come now, Mr. President, to the eighth charge, under which I find myself again obliged to perform the disagreeable task of contrasting evidence, and controverting the testimony of a witness for the prosecution. This witness, Mr.

Montgomery, has attributed to the respondent expressions relative to the character, motives, and views, of the present Administration, which, had he uttered them from the bench, ought to draw on him the censure of the public and the severe animadversion of this tribunal. These expressions I am authorized by him expressly to deny and disclaim. He contends that, according to the custom of this country, subsisting for almost thirty years, without any mark of public disapprobation, he had a right to warn his fellow-citizens, in a charge from the bench, against the political dangers by which he believed them to be threatened ; to assist in this manner in averting impending ruin ; in snatching the people of his native State from the abyss in which he thought them about to plunge. He contends that, for this purpose, and according to this custom, he had a right to point out what he considered as the pernicious tendency of certain measures of the Federal Government, in order to show in a stronger light the danger of adopting similar measures in the State. This is what he did, and what he supposed himself authorized to do. But he neither claims, nor has exercised, the privilege of abusing those who have been appointed to administer the Government of his country ; nor of passing strictures in his official capacity on their character, motives, or general conduct. However he may differ from them in political opinion ; however he may disapprove their principles ; whatever apprehensions he may entertain about the tendency of their measures, he has always inculcated obedience to them, in the exercise of their Constitutional powers, and has carefully avoided any remarks, in his judicial character, on their system, views, or conduct. When he could not approve their measures he was silent, except in this single instance, where, in order to dissuade the people of Maryland from the adoption of a Constitutional amendment then under consideration, which he conceived to be fraught with so many evils, he adverted to the consequences likely, in his judgment, to flow from one of those measures. These very reprehensible expressions, " that the present Administration was weak, incapable, and unequal to the proper discharge of their duties ; and that the object of their measures was not to promote the public good, but to preserve unfairly acquired power," are attributed to the respondent by one witness alone, Mr. Montgomery, of Maryland. How far that witness is entitled to credit, in this particular, it is my duty to inquire.

Let us advert, Mr. President, to the state of mind in which this witness was at the time when these expressions are supposed to have been uttered.

He informs us that he was the author and chief supporter of those measures of the Maryland Legislature, against which the respondent levelled his artillery ; that he considered himself as particularly pointed at ; and supposed the eyes of the audience to be turned upon him. So greatly was he irritated by this imaginary attack on himself that as he left the room, after the charge was finished, he declared that the respondent should be impeached for that charge. This we learn from the testimony of Mr. McMechin, who heard the declaration. After he went home, he wrote an inflammatory piece for the press, purporting to be the substance of the charge. This piece was avowedly written for the purpose of promoting an impeachment. It recommends that measure; abounds with the most opprobrious and abusive language against the respondent; and, what is still worse, it varies very materially from the testimony which the author of it has delivered at this bar.

Is it surprising that a man in this state of mind should misconceive the truth? Is it to be wondered at that he should convert his own inferences, the misconceptions and distortions of his own brain, into facts? Have any members of this honorable Court heard a person give an account in a court of justice, of a quarrel in which he himself had been a party?—of a brawl or riot in which he had been himself engaged, in which he had perhaps been beaten, and of his wrongs of which he came to complain? Have they observed how the truth, in such situations, is distorted by the blindness of passion, the partiality of self-love, and thirst of revenge? I presume that they have; and they will then know how to appreciate the testimony of a witness, in the state of mind in which Mr. Montgomery viewed these transactions, and in which he has given evidence at this bar.

I have said that his publication, purporting to be the substance of this charge, varies materially from his testimony in this case. For the truth of this statement I refer to the publication itself, which is in evidence before the court, and to his testimony, which is in the recollection of the honorable members. But I will point out one of the most remarkable variances.

In the publication he represents the respondent as saying, "that in a country where were equal rights and equal laws, that is, laws equally administered, and that operate equally upon the rich and poor, there was freedom, but that country was not ours; we had no equal rights or equal laws." In his testimony, as taken down by the short-hand writer, he represents the respondent as saying, "that where there were equal laws and equal rights, there was freedom, but where the administration of the laws was partial and not certain, the people were not free: and that we were approaching to that state of things." In his publication he accuses the respondent of saying, that we actually were in this condition: in his testimony, that we were approaching to that state of things. Is it possible to give credit to a witness who thus contradicts himself? And what assurance have we that he whose memory is so treacherous, and who is proved by his publication to have been so angry, has not stated his own impressions and inferences as facts?

This witness has indeed made an attempt to support himself, by an explanation of this part of his testimony. In his explanation he tells us, that although he attributed the word "administration" to the respondent, the term used might perhaps have been "government." In this way he endeavors to get rid of the contradiction between himself and the numerous other witnesses. But this cannot avail him. The expressions, whether applied to the Administration or the Government, must, in this instance, have meant the same thing. The charges of weakness, relaxation, incapacity, and a view to the continuance of their unfairly acquired power, instead of the public good, could have had no application to the Government in its general abstract nature. They could have applied to it only as administered by the persons or the party now in power. So that whether the term "government" or "administration" was used, the meaning was precisely the same. The expressions were equally remarkable, in one case as in the other. They must have struck the bystanders as much in one case as in the other. They were in fact the same, with the variance of a single word, which did not in the least vary the sense. The witnesses have all sworn that they heard no such expressions, and the contradiction is as strong after the explanation, as it was before.

Who are these witnesses thus standing opposed to Mr. Montgomery? These witnesses that were present, and attentive, and yet did not hear these remarkable expressions which he heard so distinctly, and which he tells us made so strong an impression on his mind? If, when he stood on his own merits, and on the comparison between his publication and his testimony, he was so weak, how must he appear when opposed by this host of witnesses?

First, Mr. Mason. That gentleman, indeed, was so much occupied by the salutations of his friends, that he did not attend accurately to the whole charge; although he had leisure enough to remark, what nobody else saw, that the respondent, in the intervals of reading his charge, sometimes seemed to introduce extemporaneous observations, by way of comment on what he read. Still he has given us with great confidence, and no less accuracy, the principal points of the charge. He recollects nothing of these expressions. Can it be believed that they would not have struck him, had they been used? Mr. Mason is one of the strongest adherents, one of the warmest and most zealous friends of those who now administer the Government. Indeed he is one of the chief props of the present Administration, united with it in interest, principle, and affection. He is, moreover, so accurate in his observation, and so correct in his recollection, about what relates to the respondent, as to be able, after a lapse of five years, to repeat a casual, and jocular conversation; which is usually forgotten as soon as it passes. Can it be believed that so outrageous an attack upon his friends, by this judge, and in such a place, could have escaped his notice, or been effaced from his memory?

Next Mr. Smith, editor of the National Intelligencer, than whom the present Administration certainly has not a more zealous friend. He is, indeed, remarkable for the devotedness of his attachment to this Administration; his lively and keen sensibility to all its wrongs, real and imaginary; and his vigilant and unwearied zeal in its defence. He is, moreover, remarkable for his talent for stating in writing, whatever he has heard spoken or read; a talent into the careful cultivation and constant exercise of which he is led by his profession. He listened attentively to this charge. After hearing it he sat down in his chamber, the same evening, and committed the substance of it to writing, for the express purpose of publishing it in his paper. This publication he has produced and attested, and it contains no such expressions about the present Administration, or the present Government, as were heard by Mr. Montgomery. Is it possible to believe that had such expressions been used, they would not have been heard by Mr. Smith; or that, if he had heard them, he would have omitted them in his publication?

Mr. Stephen, too, who is known to be strongly attached to the present Administration, was present at the delivery of this charge, attended to it, but heard no such expressions as those related by Mr. Montgomery. A multitude of other witnesses who stood round the respondent while he delivered the charge, who were all for various reasons very attentive to it, have with one voice declared they had heard no such expressions. Among them is the district judge, who sat by the side of the respondent; the clerk of the court, who sat next to him but one, and who moreover is an adherent of the present Administration; the foreman of the grand jury, who stood close to the respondent, and to whom the charge was particularly addressed; and one of the judges of this district, who attended that court as a witness, and stood very near to the respondent, while he delivered the charge. The others are gentlemen of the bar, men of high character, who have delivered their testimony with great accuracy, and assigned with candor and precision the reasons of their belief. And all these persons declare most positively, that they heard no such expressions as have been related by Mr. Montgomery, about the conduct, character, and views, of the present Administration.

Nay more. The charge was read from a written paper, and that paper is produced in court, and proved by the person who wrote it, from a rough copy furnished by the respondent. Mr. Mason, it is true, states that some extemporaneous comments appeared to him to be made by the respondent, while reading from the written paper; and the inference to be drawn from this, I presume, is that these expressions might have formed one of those extemporaneous comments, and therefore might have been used, though they do not appear in the paper. But Mr. Mason, it will be remembered, though very correct and positive in stating the substance, does not pretend to accuracy in the particulars. He was too much interrupted by the salutations of his friends, who pressed through the crowd to speak to him. And it may very well have happened that when, after these interruptions, he turned his attention again to the respondent, he sometimes found him with his eyes raised from the paper, as those of every man will be who reads his own composition, or any writing with which he is familiar. This might have led him to conclude that the respondent sometimes spoke extempore. But Mr. Montgomery himself has stated that the whole charge was read from a paper; and the same fact has been established by the testimony of nine or ten witnesses, among whom are the district judge and the clerk of the court. Those gentlemen sat near to the respondent while he delivered the charge. One of them sat next to him, and the other next but one. They were both attentive to the manner in which the charge was delivered, and they both say that it appeared to them to be entirely read. They both say that the respondent, in reading it, occasionally raised his eyes from the paper at the close of a sentence, and turned them on the audience; but not longer at any one time than is usual with a person reading. In this the other witnesses fully concur. They all stood round the respondent, had their eyes upon him during the whole time, and were particularly attentive to the manner as well as to the matter of the charge.

Mr. Montgomery, indeed, after he had heard the testimony of Mr. Mason, explained himself on this subject. He said at first that the whole charge appeared to him to be read from a written paper. But after he had heard Mr. Mason state that the respondent, in delivering the charge, sometimes appeared to leave the paper and introduce extemporaneous matter, he was called again, and he then informed us that his eyes were not constantly directed towards the respondent, but were occasionally turned on the bystanders, whose eyes he observed to be directed to him as the known author of the measures reprobated in the charge. From this he inferred, very properly, that the respondent might have spoken extempore from time to time without his observing the fact. This explanation certainly removes the contradiction which at first appeared between Mr. Mason and Mr. Montgomery; and weakens materially the testimony of the latter gentleman as to the fact now in question. But it has no such effect on the testimony of the other witnesses, whose attention was not called off like that of Mr. Montgomery; who had their eyes upon this respondent during the whole time; and who firmly believe that every word which he delivered was read from the paper. This fact, then, I consider as completely established. The paper has been proved, and is in evidence before the court. A true copy of it will be found among the exhibits filed with the answer, No. 8. On examination, it will be found to contain no such expressions as are attributed to the respondent by Mr. Montgomery.

The testimony of Mr. Montgomery on this point, thus liable to suspicion in itself, on account of the state of irritation in which he saw the transaction; thus contradicted by his own written statement, by the testimony of so many witnesses, and by the written charge; is not entitled to belief, but must be laid wholly out of the case. I do not charge him with wilfully misstating the fact, but that he has utterly mistaken it cannot be doubted.

There is another point on which some contrariety appears in the testimony. Some of the witnesses have supposed that the respondent concluded this charge with a direct recommendation to the jury to use their endeavors on their return home towards preventing the final passage of the act of Assembly of Maryland for abolishing the Supreme Courts, by procuring in their several counties the election of such persons as would vote against that measure. Others are under the impression that no such recommendation was expressly made, but was merely to be inferred from the general tenor of the charge. That such a difference of opinion should take place is by no means surprising; but the difference is immaterial. The object of the charge undoubtedly was to dissuade the people of Maryland from adopting the measure in question; and to impress on the grand jury and the audience the necessity of exerting themselves against it, at the election which was then approaching, and was to decide its fate.

If this recommendation was not expressly given, it was plainly implied. Such was the intention of the respondent; and his defence rests on the correctness of this intention; on his right, according to the long established custom of this country, to pursue the object in this way.

Let the charge, Mr. President, be carefully examined, and it will be found to have no object in view but to convince the people of Maryland, by arguments drawn from reason and experience, of the danger of adopting a change in their State constitution, which had been submitted to their consideration, and the object of which was to abolish all their supreme courts of law; to introduce a system entirely new and untried; and above all to destroy the independent tenure of judicial office, secured to them by their existing constitution; and to leave the judges dependent on the Executive for their continuance in office, and on the Legislature for their support. The respondent, who had contributed largely to the formation and establishment of the State constitution, was greatly alarmed at these changes. He considered them as of the most destructive tendency to the liberty and happiness of the State to which he belonged, and he resolved to take this opportunity of warning his fellow-citizens against them. This is the whole scope of his address to the grand jury, to show the importance of an independent judiciary, the dangerous tendency of changes already made, and the mischiefs which would result from taking this additional step in the career of innovation. He did, indeed, advert to the act of Congress for repealing the circuit court law, and remarked that it had shaken to its foundation the independence of the Federal judiciary; but the manifest and sole object of this was, to show that the spirit of innovation had gone forth, and ought to be carefully watched; that the public respect for great Constitutional principles had begun to be weakened; and that by how much the security which might have been derived from an independent Federal judiciary had been diminished, by so much the more vigilantly it behooved us to guard our State institutions. No other object can be discovered in the charge, or inferred from its general tenor, or from the language in which it is expressed; neither is there any evidence which has the most remote tendency to show that he had any other object in view. And was not this an object which a citizen of this country might lawfully pursue? Is it not lawful for an aged patriot of the Revolution to warn his fellow-citizens of dangers, by which he supposes their liberties and happiness to be threatened? Or will it be contended that a citizen is deprived of these rights because he is a judge? That his office takes from him the liberty of speech which belongs to every citizen, and is justly considered as one of our most invaluable privileges? I trust not. And if there could be any doubt on this point, I would remove it by referring to a recent instance of two judges of the supreme court of Maryland, who, in a late political contest, entered the lists as champions for the rival candidates, and travelled over a whole county, making political speeches in opposition to each other. Yet these gentlemen justly possess the confidence and respect of the public; their conduct in this instance has never been considered as a violation of duty; and he who espoused the interest of the successful candidate has been far from receiving any marks of displeasure from the Government of this country.

If, therefore, a judge retain this right, notwithstanding his official character; if it still be lawful for him to express his opinions of public measures, to oppose by argument such as are still pending, and to exert himself for obtaining the repeal, by Constitutional means, of such as have been adopted, I ask what law forbids him to exercise these rights by a charge from the bench? In what part of our laws or Constitution is it written that a judge shall not speak on politics to a grand jury?—shall not advance, in a charge from the bench, those arguments against a public measure which it must be admitted he might properly employ on any other occasion? Such conduct may perhaps be ill-judged, indiscreet, or ill-timed. I am ready to admit that it is so; for I am one of those who have always thought that political subjects ought never to be mentioned in courts of justice. But is it contrary to law? Admitting it to be indecorous and improper, which I do not admit, is every breach of decorum and propriety a crime? The rules of decorum and propriety forbid us to sing a song on the floor of Congress, or to whistle in a church. These would be acts of very great indecorum, but I know of no law by which they could be punished as crimes. Will they who contend that it is contrary to law for a judge to speak of politics to a grand jury, be pleased to point out the law of the land which forbids it? They cannot do so. There is no such law. Neither is there any Constitutional provision or principle, or any custom of this country, which condemns this practice.

Trial of Judge Chase.

And will this honorable body, sitting not in a legislative but a judicial capacity, be called on to make a law, and to make it for a particular case which has already occurred? What, sir, is the great distinction between legislative and judicial functions? Is it not that the former is to make the law for future cases; and that the latter is to declare it as to cases which have already occurred? Is it not one of the fundamental principles of our Constitution, and an essential ingredient of free government, that the legislative and judicial powers shall be kept distinct and separate? That the power of making the general law for future cases shall never be blended in the same hands, with that of declaring and applying it to particular and present cases? Does not the union of these two powers in the same hands constitute the worst of despotisms? What, sir, is the peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of despotism? It consists in this, sir, that a man may be punished for an act which, when he did it, was not forbidden by law. While, on the other hand, it is the essence of freedom, that no act can be treated as a crime, unless there be a precise law forbidding it at the time when it was done.

It is this line which separates liberty from slavery; and if the respondent be condemned to punishment for an act, which far from being forbidden by any law of the land, is sanctioned by the custom of this country for more than twenty years past, then have we the form of free government, but the substance of despotism.

Let gentlemen, before they establish this principle, recollect that it is a two-edged sword. Let them remember that power must often change hands in popular Governments; and that after every struggle, the victorious party come into power, with resentments to gratify by the destruction of their vanquished opponents, with a thirst of vengeance to be slaked in their blood. Let them remember that principles and precedents, by which actions innocent when they were done, may be converted into crimes, are the most convenient and effectual instruments of revenge and destruction with which a victorious party can be furnished. Let them beware how they give their sanction to principles which may soon be turned against themselves; how they forge bolts which may soon be hurled on their own heads. In a popular government, where power is so fluctuating, where constitutional principles are therefore so important for the protection of the weaker party against the violence of the stronger, it above all things behooves the party actually in power to adhere to the principles of justice and law, lest by departing from them they furnish at once the provocation and the weapons for their own destruction.

I have stated, Mr. President, that the practice of introducing political matter into charges to grand juries has been sanctioned by the custom of this country from the beginning of the Revolution to this day. Need I adduce any other proof of the fact than its general notoriety? Need I refer to the charge delivered in South Carolina, in 1776, by William Henry Drayton, for which he has been so much admired and applauded? Need I refer to the recommendation of the Executive Council in Pennsylvania, at a period something later, in which that body, with John Dickinson at its head, enjoins it on the judges to avail themselves of their charges to the grand juries on their circuits for disseminating correct political information and principles among the people? Shall I refer to the case of Judge Addison, in Pennsylvania, who has delivered many political charges, and against whom, when he was lately impeached, those charges made no part of the accusation? Shall I refer again to the charge of Judge Iredell, delivered to the grand jury, which found the first indictment against John Fries, and containing a variety of political matter? It is unnecessary to dilate on these instances. They have been given in evidence, and are fresh in the memory of this honorable Court. The recollection of the honorable members must furnish them with many others equally striking.

And yet have the authors of none of these political charges been censured. No mark of public or private disapprobation has been fixed on their conduct. No legislative act has forbidden this practice. From the time of Judge Drayton to the time of Judge Chase, it has been considered as innocent. It remained for the year 1803, after a lapse of twenty-seven years, to discover its criminality. But this honorable body will not so determine. It will not forget the distinction between its judicial and its legislative character. In its judicial character it will declare, that an act, however improper in itself or dangerous in its tendency, shall not, if forbidden by no law, be punished as a crime; that the prevalence of this custom for twenty years, the countenance which it received from some governmental authorities, and the acquiescence of all, are sufficient evidence of its legality; and that the criminal intent which constitutes an essential ingredient of the offence, in this as well as in every other case, and of which no direct proof is now adduced, can never be inferred from the act itself, when done in compliance with a custom so long established, and so highly sanctioned. But if the members of this tribunal should be individually of opinion, that this custom is dangerous or improper, they will, after pronouncing a sentence of acquittal in this case, resume their legislative character, and pass a law to restrain the practice in future. Thus will the mischief be prevented on one hand, and the principles of liberty and justice respected on the other.

This charge, therefore, fails like the rest; and what remains of the accusation? It has dwindled into nothing. It has been scattered by the rays of truth, like the mists of the morning, before the effulgence of the rising sun. Touched by the spear of investigation, it has lost its gigantic and terrifying form, and has shrunk into a toad. Every part of our honorable client's conduct has been surveyed; all his motives have been severely scrutinized; all his actions have brought to the test of law and the Constitution; his words and even his jocular conversations, have been passed in strict review; and the ingenuity and industry of the honorable Managers have proved unable to detect one illegal act, one proof, or one fair presumption of improper motive.

Perceiving, by anticipation, this desperate situation of his case, the honorable gentleman who opened the prosecution, has devised another expedient to escape from anticipated defeat, and to secure that conviction on which he seems to have set his heart. He has told us, and no doubt will hereafter insist, that in order to form a true judgment on the respondent's conduct, the whole of it must be embraced in one view; and all the particulars regarded as parts of one whole. This means, if it means anything, that although no single act alleged in the articles should be considered as an impeachable offence, and a sufficient ground of conviction, yet all the acts taken together may constitute such an offence. That is, in other words, that many nothings may make something; that many noughts may make an unit: that many innocent acts may make a crime. What is this but recurring, in another form, to the absurd and monstrous doctrine, that judges may be removed on impeachment for reasons of expediency, without the proof of any specific offence? No sir! This last subterfuge will not avail the prosecutors. This honorable Court, adhering to the principles of the Constitution, the positive rules of law, and the plain dictates of justice and common sense, will require, before it convicts, the clear proof of a criminal intent, manifested and carried into effect, by some act done in violation of the laws. Under the shield of this great principle, our honorable client stands secure. In full confidence that you, Mr. President, and the members of this honorable Court will be guided by it, I cheerfully submit the case to you; and when you retire to deliberate on it, remember that posterity will sit in judgment on your conduct; that her decision will be pronounced on the testimony of impartial history; and that from her awful sentence there lies no appeal.

TUESDAY, February 26.

The Court opened at about half past ten o'clock, A. M.; the Managers, the House of Representatives, and the counsel of the respondent having taken their seats,

Mr. NICHOLSON, as one of the managers, addressed the Court in reply to the counsel of the accused. He said the House of Representatives having impeached Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; the evidence on their part having been adduced, and that on behalf of the accused, and the arguments of his counsel having been fully and patiently heard, it now became his duty to reply in support of the impeachment. To me, Mr. President, said he, this duty is an unpleasant one. Upon all occasions and under all circumstances, the office of a public accuser is the most painful that can be imposed on us; but it is more peculiarly so when the object of accusation appears before us covered with age and infirmities. I think I speak the sentiment of my brother Managers of the House of Representatives, when I say, that this impeachment never would have been instituted, that it never would have arrived at its present crisis, if we had not believed that the best interests of our common country required, that the conduct complained of should not go unpunished. There is no nation on earth, sir, in which the freedom of man and the consequent happiness of society are not inseparably interwoven with the full, free and impartial administration of justice.

"Una salus ambobus erit commune periculum."

It was to preserve this unity of safety, to avert this common danger, that we thought ourselves bound by the most solemn obligation, to bring these charges before the highest tribunal of the nation. We may in vain make laws to secure our property, to protect our liberty, and to guard our lives, if those to whom we appeal, and to whose decrees we are bound to submit, shall prove unfaithful in the discharge of their duty. If our laws are not faithfully administered; if the holy sanctuary of our courts is to be invaded by party feeling; if justice shall suffer her pure garment to be stained by the foul venom of political bigotry, we may indeed boast that we live in a land of freedom, but the boast will be vain and illusory.

In this point of view, therefore, this cause may justly be called an important one. I need not however urge its importance to the Court, for the feelings of every honorable member will speak its importance more forcibly than anything that I can utter. But I do trust that those frequent appeals which you have heard, those frequent instances in which you have been reminded that posterity will pass between the accused, his accusers and his judges, will have no influence on your minds. A desire to secure the approbation of posterity is an honorable feeling, pervading every human breast, and is most inseparable from our nature: but to secure the approbation of posterity, we must take care to pursue the dictates of our own consciences, and, by doing justice here, trust to posterity to do us justice too.

Our country, it is true, are now looking on with anxious solicitude for the event of this cause; but the sentence which they shall pass will not depend upon the judgment given here. To the world and to posterity the conviction of the accused, by this Court, will not establish his guilt; and I thank God, as the case has been put in issue between us, his acquittal will not prove his innocence. The facts in the cause, sir, those facts which we have proved by the most undeniable evidence, and upon which your judgment must be given; those facts will be presented to the eyes of the world and of posterity, and upon those only will they decide. If it should ever be the fortune of my humble name to descend to posterity, by the vote which I gave for instituting this impeachment, and by my conduct in discharging the great duty now committed to me, I cheerfully consent to be tried. To this awful tribunal I willingly submit. If the judge is guilty, posterity will heap on him all that odium which his guilt deserves; if he is innocent, let that odium be turned upon his accusers.

Because Sidney and Russell bled upon a scaffold, have their names been less the objects of veneration with posterity? and because Scroggs and Jeffries escaped the punishment due to their crimes, have they therefore been less the objects of universal execration? No, sir; and the honorable counsel (Mr. Hopkinson) who first addressed you on behalf of the accused, gave us himself a memorable example of the poor respect which posterity will feel for the decisions of those who have gone before them. That honorable gentleman told you that Warren Hastings was impeached for the murder of princes and the plunder of empires, and yet he was acquitted. But, is there any who hears me, that believes he was innocent? If we read the history of that trial; if we look to the facts charged, and listen to the unexampled eloquence by which they were supported, our only wonder will be, that he was not condemned. Sir, it has been said that those plundered millions were the best witnesses to prove his innocence; and I greatly fear that the day will come when the crying blood of those murdered princes will be the best witnesses to prove his guilt. The most splendid action in Edmund Burke's life was his accusation of Warren Hastings; the foulest stain upon the national justice of England was his acquittal.

We have been charged, sir, by one of the honorable counsel (Mr. Harper) with having endeavored to enlist on our side the sympathies of the Court. Permit me to ask, what sympathy have we endeavored to excite? What feelings have we endeavored to engage? To what passion have we addressed ourselves? None, sir. We came here to demand justice. The Constitution has placed in your hands the power of punishing guilt; we have proved the guilt of the person accused, and at your hands we demand his punishment. To your consciences and your understandings we appeal, and not to your feelings. These have been assailed by our adversaries. They have exhibited their client to you, covered, as they say, with the frost of seventy winters, and have endeavored to hide the magnitude of his crimes, in the length of his years, and the infirmity of his health. In attempting to excite your compassion, they have wished to drown the voice of justice, and have addressed you not as judges but as men. I do trust, however, that if any sympathy is to be excited, it will be neither for the accused, nor his accusers. Let your feelings be turned toward the nation! Let your sympathy be awakened for those who are to come after you, for by the sentence which you pronounce in this case, it must ultimately be determined whether justice shall hereafter be impartially administered, or whether the rights of the citizen are to be prostrated at the feet of overbearing and tyrannical judges. We, who are engaged in this prosecution, feel that our fathers handed down to us a glorious birthright, and we appear at this bar to demand that it be transmitted to our children unimpaired and unpoluted. Do the nation justice, and you will do justice to us, to yourselves, and to posterity.— We were also told by the honorable counsel for the accused, that when we found the accusation shrunk from the testimony, and that the case could no longer be supported, we resorted to the forlorn hope of contending that an impeachment was not a criminal prosecution, but a mere inquest of office. For myself I am free to declare, that I heard no such position taken. If declarations of this kind have been made, in the name of the Managers, I here disclaim them. We do contend that this is a criminal prosecution, for offences committed in the discharge of high official duties, and we now support it, not merely for the purpose of removing an individual from office, but in order that the punishment inflicted on him may deter others from pursuing the baneful example which has been set them.

Nor do we mean to take another ground which the counsel for the accused have thought proper to assign us, for we never entertained the most distant idea that any citizen might be impeached. It was with no little surprise that I heard such doctrines ascribed to us, and I was astonished to hear the Attorney General of Maryland combatting positions which we had not laid down, and searching for argument to prove that which we should not have hesitated to admit.

But, sir, there is one principle upon which all the counsel for the accused have relied, upon which they have all dwelt with great force, and to the maintenance of which they have directed all their powers, that we cannot assent to; we mean to contend against it, because we believe it to be totally untenable, and because it is of the first importance in the decision of the question now under discussion. We do not contend that, to sustain an impeachment, it is not necessary to show that the offences charged are of such a nature as to subject the party to an indictment, for the learned counsel have said that the person now accused is not guilty, because the misdemeanors charged against him are not of a nature for which he might be indicted in a court of law.

To show how entirely groundless this position is, I need only pursue that course which has been pointed out to us by the respondent himself, and his counsel. I might refer to English authorities of the highest respectability, to show that officers of the British Government have been impeached for offences not indictable under any law whatever. But I feel no disposition to resort to foreign precedents. In my judgment, the Constitution of the United States ought to be expounded upon its own principles, and that foreign aid ought never to be called in. Our Constitution was fashioned after none other in the known world, and if we understand the language in which it is written, we require no assistance in giving it a true exposition. As we speak the English language, we may, indeed refer to English authorities for definitions, as we should refer to English dictionaries for the meaning of English words; but upon this, as upon all occasions, where the principles of our Government are to be developed, I trust that the Constitution of the United States will stand upon its own foundation, unsupported by foreign aid, and that the construction given to it will be, not an English construction, but one purely and entirely American.

The Constitution declares, that "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their commissions during good behaviour." The plain and correct inference to be drawn from this language is, that a judge is to hold his office so long as he demeans himself well in it; and whenever he shall not demean himself well, he shall be removed. I therefore contend that a judge would be liable to impeachment under the Constitution, even without the insertion of that clause which declares, that "all civil officers of the United States shall be removed for the commission of 'treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.'" The nature of the tenure by which a judge holds his office is such that, for any act of misbehaviour in office, he is liable to removal. These acts of misbehaviour may be of various kinds, some of which may, indeed, be punishable under our laws by indictment; but there may be others which the law-makers may not have pointed out, involving such a flagrant breach of duty in a judge, either in doing that which he ought not to have done, or in omitting to do that which he ought to have done, that no man of common understanding would hesitate to say he ought to be impeached for it.

The words "good behaviour" are borrowed from the English laws, and if I were inclined to rest this case on English authorities, I could easily show that, in England, these words have been construed to mean much more than we contend for. The expression durante se bene gesserit, I believe, first occurs in a statute of Henry VIII. providing for the appointment of a custos rotulorum, and clerk of the peace for the several counties in England. The statute recites, that ignorant and unlearned persons had, by unfair means, procured themselves to be appointed to these offices, to the great injury of the community, and provides that the custos shall hold his office until removed, and the clerk of the peace shall hold his office durante se bene gesserit. The reason for making the tenure to be during good behaviour, was, that the office had been held by incapable persons, who were too ignorant to discharge the duties; and it was certainly the intention of the Legislature that such persons should be removed whenever their incapacity was discovered. Under this statute, therefore, I think it clear that the officer holding his office during good behaviour, might be removed for any improper exercise of his powers, whether arising from ignorance, corruption, passion, or any other cause. To this extent, however, we do not wish to go. We do not charge the judge with incapacity. His learning and his ability are acknowledged on all hands; but we charge him with gross impropriety of conduct in the discharge of his official duties, and as he cannot pretend ignorance, we insist that his misconduct arose from a worse cause.

If, however, a judge were not made liable to removal, from the very nature of the tenure by which he holds his office, we still insist that every judge conducting himself improperly in office, comes under that clause of the Constitution which declares, that "the President, Vice President, and civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

We do not mean to contend against a position which one of the learned counsel took so much pains to prove, that the word "high" applies as well to misdemeanors as to crimes; nor do we deem it important at this time to inquire whether a civil officer of the United States can be removed for offences not committed in the discharge of his official duties. It will be time enough to make this inquiry when the case presents itself. At present we aver that the party charged has been guilty of a high misdemeanor in office, and that he ought to be removed for it.

Here, however, we are met by being told, that although his conduct may have been improper, yet that he is not liable to impeachment, unless the offence is of such a nature as that he might be indicted for it in a court of law.

If this be true, as it relates to a judge, the Constitution, to be consistent with itself, must make it universally true; and yet, if the doctrine be admitted, the Constitution will be found to be at variance with itself. Treason is an offence which may or may not be committed in the discharge of official duty, and no doubt the party committing it may be indicted. Bribery is an offence for which a judge may be indicted in the courts of the United States, because an act of Congress makes provision for it, and declares the punishment; but there is no law by which any other officer of the United States can be indicted for bribery. If, therefore, the President of the United States should accept a bribe, he certainly cannot be indicted for it, and yet no man can doubt that he might be impeached. If one of the Heads of Departments should undertake to recommend to office for pay, he certainly might be impeached for it, and yet, I would ask, under what law, and in what court could he be indicted?

To this, perhaps, it might be answered, that bribery is one of those offences for which the Constitution expressly provides that the officer may be impeached. This is true; but let us proceed further, and inquire whether there are not other offences for which an officer may be impeached, and for which he cannot be indicted?

If a judge should order a cause to be tried with eleven jurors only, surely he might be impeached for it, and yet I believe there is no court in which he could be indicted. You, Mr. President, as Vice President of the United States, together with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chief Justice and the Attorney General, as Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, have annually at your disposal eight millions of dollars, for the purpose of paying the national debt. If, instead of applying it to this public use, you should divert it to another channel, or convert it to your own private uses, I ask if there is a man in the world who would hesitate to say that you ought to be impeached for this misconduct? And yet there is no court in this country in which you could be indicted for it. Nay, sir, it would amount to nothing more than a breach of trust, and would not be indictable under the favorite common law.

But, sir, this ground, which was so strenuously fought for, will probably be abandoned, and instead of our adversaries maintaining that the offence must be of an indictable nature, they will, like one of the honorable counsel, (Mr. Harper,) go a step back, and say that it must be a breach of some known positive law. Thus they will endeavor to shelter their client by saying that there is no act of Congress declaring it illegal for a judge to deliver his opinion on the law before counsel have been heard, or to make political harangues from the bench.

There are offences for which an officer may be impeached, and against which there are no known positive laws. It is possible that the day may arrive when a President of the United States, having some great political object in view, may endeavor to influence the Legislature by holding out threats or inducements to them. A treaty may be made which the President, with some personal view, may be extremely anxious to have ratified. The hope of office may be held out to a Senator; and I think it cannot be doubted, that for this the President would be liable to impeachment, although there is no positive law forbidding it. Again, sir: a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives may have a very dear friend in office, and the President may tell him unless you vote for my measures your friend shall be dismissed. Where is the positive law forbidding this, yet where is the man who would be shameless enough to rise in the face of the country and defend such conduct, or be bold enough to contend that the President could not be impeached for it?

It was said by one of the counsel that the offence must be a breach either of the common law, a State law, or a law of the United States, and that no lawyer would speak of a misdemeanor, but as an act violating some one of these laws. This doctrine is surely not warranted, for the Government of the United States have no concern with any but their own laws. In a State court, I would speak of a misdemeanor as an offence against a State law; in the courts of the United States, I would speak of it as an offence against an act of Congress; but, sir, as a member of the House of Representatives, and acting as a Manager of an impeachment before the highest Court in the nation, appointed to try the highest officers of the Government, when I speak of a misdemeanor, I mean an act of official misconduct, a violation of official duty, whether it be a proceeding against a positive law, or a proceeding unwarranted by law.

If the objection that the offence must be of an indictable nature, or against some positive law, means anything, it must be that the misconduct for which a judge or any other officer may be impeached, is either made punishable by, or is a violation of an act of Congress, for we are not to be regulated either by the common law or a State law. What then would be the result? I have pointed out several instances of gross misconduct in violation of no act of Congress, and yet under this doctrine he is to be permitted to pursue his wicked courses until every possible offence is defined by statute. This, too, would teach us that we have done wrong heretofore; for, at the last session a judge was impeached and removed from office for drunkenness and profane swearing on the bench, although there is no law of the United States forbidding them. Indeed, I do not know that there is any law punishing either in New Hampshire, where the offence was committed. It was said by one of the counsel that these were indictable offences. I, however, do not know where; certainly not in England. Drunkenness is punishable there by the ecclesiastical authority, but the temporal magistrate never had any power over it until it was given by a statute of James I., and even then the power was not to be exercised by the courts, but only by a justice of the peace, as is now the case in Maryland, where a small fine may be imposed.

But the Attorney General of Maryland (Mr. Martin) admits that offences may be of so heinous a nature that their punishment carries infamy with them, and that, though not committed in the discharge of official duty, yet if against a State law, the party may be impeached and removed from office. This, though not very material to the present question, may serve us in showing how inapplicable the doctrine is, that the offence must be against a State law or the common law. I will suppose that in New Hampshire there is no law punishing profane swearing. In Maryland a magistrate is authorized to impose a fine of thirty-three cents, and if this is not paid instantly the offender may be put in the pillory and receive thirty-nine lashes. The punishment is infamous, and if inflicted on a judge, according to the idea of this gentleman, he is to be impeached and removed from office. If the same offence is committed in New Hampshire, the judge is not to be removed, not because he has been guilty of a lighter offence, but because there is no State law punishing it. If then the State law is to be made the criterion, a judge in Maryland is to be removed from office for that which he might do with impunity in another State.

To carry this idea a little further:—There was once in the State of Connecticut, and may be yet for aught I know, a celebrated code called the Blue Laws. Under the provisions of this code, I believe it is a fact, that a captain of a ship was tied up and publicly whipped, because, on returning from a long voyage, he met his wife on a Sunday at the front door and kissed her. This was deemed a high offence, and was ignominiously punished. Now, if we are to be governed by the State laws, I trust the Blue Laws of Connecticut will be rejected, and that our grave judges may be allowed to kiss when and where they please, as to their wisdom shall seem meet, without incurring the pains and penalties of an impeachment. This, sir, may be somewhat ludicrous, but I hope it is not therefore the less illustrative of the absurdity of the doctrine contended for. It has been said that the offences for which a judge or other officer is to be impeached, ought to be defined by act of Congress. This is impossible. Such is the multiplicity of passions that sway the human heart; such is the variety of human action, that a code of laws never did and never can exist, in which all human offences are defined. The Constitution is sufficiently definite when it declares that a judge shall hold his office during good behaviour, and that all civil officers shall be removed for high crimes and misdemeanors. The law of good behaviour is the law of truth and justice. It is confined to no soil and to no climate. It is written on the heart of man in indelible characters, by the hand of his Creator, and is known and felt by every human being. He who violates it violates the first principles of law. He abandons the path of rectitude, and by not listening to the warning voice of his conscience, he forsakes man's best and surest guide on this earth. The best and ablest judge will often err in mere matters of law, but as to principles of duty, in discharging acts of common justice to his fellow-men, he can never err so long as he follows conscience as his guide, and suffers justice to be the only object which he has in view.

How far Judge Chase has governed himself by this great, unerring rule of human action, it is your province to determine. How far he has excused himself by his answer and the arguments of his counsel, I shall now beg leave to examine, premising at the same time that it is my intention to confine myself to the first article.

It has been alleged by the counsel for the accused, that my honorable colleagues have argued this case upon the articles and not upon the evidence; and this allegation contains an admission, that if the articles are proved, the guilt of the party is established. It shall be my endeavor to show that there is no material variance between the charges as laid in the articles, and the evidence brought to support them; but that they are amply and fully proved by the very best testimony which could be adduced.

One of the learned counsel in commenting upon the first article, declared that he discovered but a single truth in it, which was, that the judge had formed and reduced to writing an opinion upon the law; and that gentleman, as well as the Attorney General of Maryland, labored with great zeal and with much display of talent, to convince the Senate that there could be nothing wrong in this. Unfortunately for these learned gentlemen, even that truth is not to be found in it, for by recurring to the article it will be found that the judge is not charged for having formed an opinion, or for having reduced that opinion to writing, but for "having delivered an opinion in writing on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the prisoner before counsel had been heard in his defence."

In this we find no charge against him for having formed an opinion, or for having reduced it to writing, and certainly the learned counsel might have spared themselves the trouble of proving what I am sure every member of the Court was fully convinced of before, that there was no impropriety in a judge's forming an opinion on any subject whatever, whether legal or philosophical. It is not, however, unusual for skilful advocates to attempt to draw the attention from the material points in dispute, for the purpose of fixing it on others of little or no importance. Such has been the course pursued by our adversaries. But, Mr. President, the real charge is, that Samuel Chase did, upon the trial of John Fries for treason, endeavor to prejudice the minds of the jury against him, by delivering an opinion to them upon the law before his counsel were heard; and this too in a case of life and death, where the jury had an ample, uncontrollable right, to decide as well the law as the fact. It is the right and duty of judges to inform their minds upon all questions of law whatsoever, but it is an unwarrantable proceeding, it is an unauthorized assumption of power in them, to deliver that opinion to the jury in a criminal cause before the jury is sworn, and before the counsel of the prisoner have been heard in his defence.

I did not expect to hear the fact denied by the counsel, but I did expect to hear it would be admitted, and attempted to be justified. This, however, has not been done; and they have pretended to deny the fact by insisting on an impossibility, I had almost said an absurdity. They have declared that Judge Chase did not make the opinion known, but that it became public by what they call the warm and improper conduct of Mr. Lewis. Sir, it is impossible. What are the facts, as proved even by their own witnesses? That Judge Chase handed the written opinion down to the bar. That it was put into the hands of Mr. Lewis, who, without reading it, immediately and disdainfully threw it from him, declaring that "his hand should never be tainted by receiving a prejudged opinion in any case." How then, I ask, was it made known by Mr. Lewis? He refused to read it, and threw it from him with the correct feeling and indignation naturally arising from a high sense of the injury done to his client. No, sir, it was made public by Judge Chase, as I will presently prove beyond the possibility of doubt, in the hearing of the whole panel of jurors. But permit me here to meet one of the honorable counsel (Mr. Harper) upon that ground, to which he defied my friend who first opened this cause, (Mr. Randolph.) The learned counsel avails himself, he says, of the difference between a general opinion and a direct application of the law to a particular case, and insists that Judge Chase's was nothing more than an opinion upon the law generally. Here I meet him, and if I do not prove that the judge delivered the opinion; that he applied it in the most direct terms to Fries's case; that he knew there was no controversy about the facts, and of course that the defence must rest upon the construction which the jury would give to the Constitutional definition of treason; that he publicly pronounced the opinion so as to make an impression not only upon the jury, but upon the bystanders: "If I do not prove all this, then I will agree to surrender this article, and indeed the whole impeachment.

In order to prove this, I might rest satisfied with referring the Senate to the clear and pointed testimony of Mr. Lewis, Mr. Dallas, and Mr. Tilghman. But as Mr. Rawle and Mr. Meredith do not recollect so much as these other gentlemen, and it has therefore been argued that the former must be mistaken, because it is said that their warmth at the moment gave a coloring not warranted by the facts, I shall not rely solely on the information derived from them. But I mean to show, that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas are supported in their statement by the judge himself, while Mr. Rawle and Mr. Meredith are pointedly contradicted by him. In truth, sir, it would seem as if the counsel for the accused had entirely forgotten that he had ever filed an answer, or they had never read it. We allege that the judge delivered the opinion, and that he applied it directly to Fries's case in the hearing of the jury; they deny this. We have proved it by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, they rely on Mr. Rawle and Mr. Meredith who do not recollect it. Let us hear the judge himself. In the 14th page of the answer the judge says:

"It was for these reasons that on the 22d of April, 1800, (acknowledged by all to be the first day of this memorable transaction,) when the said John Fries was brought into court, and placed in the prisoner's box for trial, but before the jury was empanelled to try him, this respondent informed the above mentioned William Lewis, one of his counsel, the aforesaid Alexander James Dallas not being then in court, that the court had deliberately considered the indictment against John Fries for treason, and the three overt acts of treason stated therein: that the crime of treason was defined by the Constitution of the United States: that as the Federal Legislature had the power to make, alter or repeal laws, so the Judiciary only had the power to declare, expound and interpret the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Here then we find the attention of the counsel and of everybody else, called in open court to the case of John Fries, and all the witnesses agree, that the jury though not then sworn, were in the box for that purpose, as might naturally be supposed when the prisoner was brought in for trial. We find too that the court had deliberately considered the indictment and the three overt acts of treason charged in it. Now let us see what the result of that consideration was: in the 15th page of the answer the judge proceeds with the statement then made by him from the bench, in which he declared, "that the question, what acts amounted to treason, was a question of law, and had been decided by Judges Paterson and Peters in the cases of Vigol and Mitchell, and by Judges Iredell and Peters in the case of John Fries, the then prisoner at the bar, in April 1799. That Judge Peters remained of the same opinion which he 'had twice before delivered, and he, this respondent, on long and great consideration, concurred in the opinion of Judges Paterson, Iredell, and Peters.'"

What opinion was it that Judge Iredell and Peters had before given, and in which Judge Chase then publicly declared that he concurred? Why, that the overt acts charged in the indictment against Fries did amount to treason, for upon those very overt acts, the judge himself admits, Fries had before been tried in April, 1799, when these same acts were decided by Judges Iredell and Peters to amount to treason, and in this opinion Judge Chase then declared that he himself concurred. Here then was a full expression of the opinion. Here it was publicly pronounced in the hearing of the jury, in the face of the prisoner, before his counsel were heard in his defence, and so eager was the judge to make it known that he could not even wait until the jury was sworn. Here too was a direct application of the law to the case of John Fries, then about to be tried for treason, by which application of the law, the fate of the prisoner was fixed, and all hope of life entirely cut off.

But gentlemen say that no opinion was given as to facts. True, sir, for he perfectly knew that there was no controversy about the facts; these were all admitted. And because he knew this, his offence was the greater; for when he was convinced the facts were undisputed, he placed the whole case beyond the reach of hope, by pronouncing the law, before the jury was sworn. That he did know there was no dispute about the facts is proved in the 12th page of his answer, in which he says, "it was not suggested or understood that any new evidence was to be offered," and one of his counsel, the Attorney General of Maryland, has said, that the judge had the use of Mr. Rawle's and Mr. Peters's notes of the former trial. From these notes, and from his conversation with these gentlemen, he became perfectly acquainted with the facts in the case. Knowing them to be undisputed, he resolved to seal the doom of the wretched prisoner, by publicly pronouncing his opinion before the trial commenced, in the presence of the jury, thereby attempting to prejudice their minds against anything which might afterwards be urged in his favor.

The learned counsel for the judge having denied that the opinion was publicly delivered, they endeavor to give a coloring to the transaction, by alleging that it was delivered to Mr. Lewis only, as counsel for the prisoner; and this they, as well as their client, pretend was intended for the benefit of Fries, in order that himself and his friends might see the necessity of procuring new testimony. This is the excuse offered by the judge in the 12th page of his answer, and it has been reiterated over and over again, by his counsel at the bar. Let us examine it, and determine for ourselves, whether *Fries had been tried in April, 1799, for the same offences, and had, under the direction of the court, been convicted of treason; but this last was a new trial, granted in consequence of supposed prejudice in some of the jurors who sat on the former trial.

this could be the motive. In the 10th page of the answer, it is stated, that the indictment against Fries was found by the grand jury, on the 16th day of April, 1800, and "that his trial was appointed to be had on the 22d day of the same month." Thus six days intervened between that on which the indictment was found, and that fixed for the trial, agreeably to the judge's own statement. The court was in session every day, and we may fairly presume that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, both being extensively engaged in business, attended constantly. If this great favor to Fries was intended, and there was a wish to apprise his counsel of the opinion of the court, in order that new testimony might be procured, one would naturally suppose, that some opportunity of conversing with the counsel privately, might have been embraced, and this special favor might have been thus conferred. But what is the fact? This information was never given until the day arrived which was fixed for the trial, nor until after the prisoner was brought to the bar. Was this a time to procure new testimony? Did it afford any opportunity to send fifty or sixty miles into Northampton county, for the purpose of bringing other witnesses? Could this possibly be the motive which actuated the judge? Surely not—or why defer it to the very latest moment preceding the trial? Why deliver the opinion publicly, not only in the hearing of the counsel, but of the jury, and every other person present? Sir, I am persuaded the Court will agree with me, that the reason assigned is, as it has been stated in the replication, an unworthy evasion.

The counsel (Mr. Hopkinson) who first addressed the court in favor of the accused, viewed this part of the subject in a different light. He very ingeniously offered another excuse. He considered it a great favor done to the prisoner, not because it was intended to give him an opportunity of introducing new testimony, but because the judge declared the opinion of the court, for the purpose of drawing the attention of the counsel to those particular points, which it would be necessary for them to argue, in order that the error of the court might be corrected, if it was an error. This he called a very great advantage, and supposed that counsel always ought to be thankful for it. Such a course may sometimes give advantages, but in my judgment the disadvantages are generally much greater. On that occasion, however, it gave no advantage, and could not be intended to give any. The court knew precisely what ground the counsel meant to take. One of them had been present at Fries's former trial, and we are told that Judge Chase had the benefit of his notes, as well as of those of the District Attorney. He knew therefore perfectly well, that the points intended to be relied on, were precisely those which he had peremptorily decided against them. He knew that there could be no necessity for drawing the attention of counsel to them, for they had been relied on at the former trial. This therefore could not be the motive, and is, like the other, nothing more than an evasion.

Let us see, too, how this reason or excuse will correspond with the principal ground of defence set up by the judge, and very much dwelt on by his advocates. In the twelfth and thirteenth pages of the answer, the judge states that there was more than one hundred civil causes then depending in the court, and he conceived that an early communication of the court's opinion would tend to the saving of time. Now permit me to ask if any time whatever could be saved, if, as the gentleman supposes, it was the intention of the court to draw the minds of the counsel to the particular points stated in the judge's opinion? For it must be conceded, that if the counsel were to attempt to convince the court that their opinion was erroneous, no time whatever could be saved, as the very attempt itself would tend to the consumption of that time which the judge deemed so precious.

I have therefore proved that the opinion was publicly delivered; that it was applied by the judge in direct terms to the case of Fries, in the presence and hearing of the jury who were to decide upon his life and death, thus tending to prejudice their minds against him; and I flatter myself I have also proved the entire futility of those excuses which have been set up for him, as well by himself as by his counsel.

Much has been said with a view to convince the court that the opinion thus delivered was a correct one, and it has therefore been argued that his conduct was perfectly justifiable. For my own part, I consider it totally immaterial in the present case whether the doctrine of treason, as laid down by the judge, was correct or not; for even if it were correct, the time and manner of delivering it, and the persons to whom it was delivered, form the substance of the charge against him. It is a misdemeanor, a high misdemeanor in a judge, wantonly to give an opinion upon any case which is to come before him, previously to the swearing of the jury, and the offence is made much greater by the opinion being publicly declared in the presence of the jury, who ought to come to the trial of every cause with minds wholly free from prepossession against either party.

Although the judge has said in his answer, that no gentleman of established reputation for legal knowledge would deliberately give a contrary opinion, yet I have not the slightest apprehension that any little reputation which I may possess, can in any manner be affected by my expressing, as I now do, my entire conviction that the doctrine of treason, as laid down in Fries's case, is wholly repugnant to the spirit and meaning of the Constitution. It is not my intention at this time to enter into an argument to prove this, for I have before said, that I consider it quite immaterial in the present discussion; but I will offer some few observations, to demonstrate to the Senate that there was nothing very unreasonable in the wish expressed by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, to show that the Constitution was susceptible of another construction.

The Constitution declares that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." John Fries was indicted for levying war against the United States, and the facts I believe were, that he, with some others, did, in a forcible manner, rescue some prisoners from the marshal of Pennsylvania. This was called a resistance to a law of the United States, and, by construction, was determined at the former trial to be the treason of levying war. It was in opposition to this construction of the Constitution that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas wished to be heard. It was certainly not a very extravagant wish on their part, for it ought to be recollected that we are a young nation, and it is deeply interesting to us all that the Constitution of the United States should not receive a construction unwarranted by its letter. After the decisions had taken place in the courts upon the Western insurrection, (I mean in the cases of Vigol and Mitchel,) Congress had passed an act declaring that to resist a law of the United States should be deemed a high misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment; and they had before provided, by the act of 1789, that to rescue prisoners from the custody of the marshal should also be punishable by fine and imprisonment. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas were desirous of showing that Fries's case came within the provisions of these laws, and that his offence was not of such a nature as to forfeit his life. They also wished to have an opportunity of proving that the terms levying war ought not to receive the same construction here as in England. To convince the Senate that they were not singular in their ideas, and that the construction given by the court has not been unanimously assented to, I shall take the liberty of referring to an author of merited reputation, to whom I believe our adversaries will not refuse their respect. Judge Tucker of Virginia, in his valuable edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, in the appendix to the fourth volume, under the title of Treason, after reciting that part of the Constitution relating to the subject, observes:

"It is probable that no part of the Constitution of the United States was supposed to be less susceptible of various interpretations than that which defines and limits the offence of treason against the United States. The text is short, and until comments upon it appeared, might have been deemed explicit. It is as follows: 'Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.'

"From this declaration contained in the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land, and the fountain both of the authority of the Government and of the crime against it, a plain man might draw conclusions very different from the artificial reasoning and subtle refinement of technical men; and seeing that that instrument is to be regarded as the act of the people of the United States, both collectively and individually, it might seem reasonable that the interpretation of nine hundred and ninety-nine plain men, who were parties to it, ought to serve as a guide to the thousandth man, who may happen to be called upon to expound it. But as technical men are not very apt to respect the opinions of such as have not been educated in the same habits with themselves, the probability is, that the opinions of one man in a thousand, or rather in a hundred thousand, will overbalance that of the rest of the community, unless the latter should deem it an object worthy of their attention to express their opinion in some way that may be regarded as obligatory upon the few who dissent from them.

"As new-fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions in free States have usually wreaked their alternate malignity on each other, the convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger, by inserting a Constitutional definition of the crime.*

"Judge Wilson, in the first charge which he delivered in the federal circuit court of Pennsylvania, expressed himself thus on the subject: 'It well deserves to be remarked, that with regard to treason, a new and great improvement has been introduced into the Government of the United States. Under that Government the citizens have not only a legal but a Constitutional security against the extension of that crime, or the imputation of treason. Treasons capricious, arbitrary and constructive have often been the most tremendous engines of despotic or Legislative tyranny.†

"Judge Iredell, on a similar occasion in South Carolina, observes: "Treasons consist in two articles only; levying war against the United States, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. The plain definition of this crime was justly deemed of such moment to the liberties of the people, that it was made a part of the Constitution itself. None can so highly prize the importance of this provision as those who are best acquainted with the abuses which have been practised in other countries in prosecutions for this offence. No man of humanity can read them without the highest indignation; nor in particular, can they be read by any citizen of America, without emotions of gratitude for the much happier situation of his own country.‡

"Such probably were the opinions of the citizens of America in general, when they adopted the Constitution; but technical men have since made some inferences and deductions from the use of some words in that definition, which are to be found in the statute of treasons in England,|| from whence they conclude, that the decisions made upon that act in England, during a period of near five hundred years, however contradictory or inconsistent they may be with the text or with each other, have been adopted also by the Constitution, 'as a direction whereby the courts are to understand the application of that act.'§ And it has even been advanced on a very important occasion, that what in England is called constructive levying of war, in this country must be called direct levying of war.¶

"It is on the authority of a passage in the Mirror,

§ Trial of Fries, p. 123 and 168.

¶ The passage stands thus. "If you expunge what is a direct levying of war, there can no such thing as treason be found; either the law is wrong, or the arguments used on the other side. Gentlemen, the law is established, but the arguments vanish like vapor before the morning sun; what then in England is called constructive levying of war, in this country must be called direct levying of war." Trial of Fries, p. 161. I should incline to suspect the reporter of some mistake that Sir Edward Coke lays it down,* that levying war against the King was treason by the common law. We find then that the common law sense of this obscure phrase, as Sir Matthew Hale calls it†, was the bringing in or raising an army. And in this sense it is probable that every man in America [with the exception perhaps of half a dozen lawyers] understood the term levying war, when the Constitution was adopted; and in this sense it seems to be still understood by some gentlemen, whose professional talents are both an honor and an ornament to their country‡.

Such we find are the opinions of Judge Tucker, an able and upright lawyer, who thinks that the Constitution ought to be construed agreeably to the plain import of its language, and ought not to be involved in technical abstruseness. In that series of publications entitled the Federalist, written at the commencement of the present Government, by some of the ablest men in this nation, for the purpose of defending the Constitution, it is matter of boast, that treason was fully defined, and not left to wild and arbitrary construction. But what avails the definition, if the constructive treasons of England are to be drawn in as precedents for us?

Sir Matthew Hale, than whom an abler, or a better judge never graced the English bench, tells us that the words levying war were formerly construed to mean "the raising an armed force or bringing in an army," and surely such to a man of plain sound sense, would appear to be their true meaning under our Constitution. He says that the first instance which he finds of constructive treasons, was in the reign of Henry the Eighth, when certain persons who had combined for the purpose of raising servants' wages, were adjudged to be guilty of levying war; and the next was in the reign of Elizabeth. Thus, from these two decisions constructive treasons became fashionable, and scarcely anything could be done, but arbitrary judges were found to construe it into treason. All was either levying war or conspiring against the life of the King, and executions and attainders innumerable followed. Every new case formed a new precedent, and strengthened the old ones. In the reign of Charles the Second, a number of apprentices were indicted for treason of levying war, and this levying of war consisted in their having pulled down a certain description of houses. Hale was then one of the judges, and although these constructive treasons had been fashionable for a hundred and fifty years, he doubted. His brethren, however, overruled him, and these decisions in the worst of times have governed England since, and are now to be introduced here to govern us. Hale's reasons for differing with the other judges are stated in his Pleas of the Crown and more at large by Keelyng in his reports. Although he lived in bad times, he wished to make them better, by resisting the torrent of oppression which threatened to overwhelm the subject. I am sorry to add that since the Revolution of 1688, the courts of England have thought themselves bound by those prior determinations, and decide accordingly. But we are not bound by them, and I do trust that they will be rejected. It is impossible to say to what lengths we are to be carried, but I cannot help feeling some alarm when I find it declared by Mr. Rawle, the then district attorney, upon Fries's trial, that "what in England is called constructive levying of war, must in this country be called direct levying of war." (See Fries's trial, p. 161.)

I before stated that I did not mean to enter into an argument against the correctness of the court's opinion; nor have I done so, but have offered these remarks to show that it was not unreasonable in Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas to wish that another construction of the Constitution might be received. The counsel for Judge Chase seem to think it monstrous that they should have wished to argue the point after the law had been settled by three former decisions, which had taken place in the course of four years. Let it be remembered that Sir Matthew Hale doubted, after the lapse of one hundred and fifty years from the first of these constructive treasons, and after, for aught I know, one hundred and fifty cases had been decided. Mr. President, far from thinking their conduct on that occasion extraordinary, I, as a free man of America, most cheerfully accord them my thanks for the stand they made; and I do hope and trust, that if ever a similar case should occur, in which the same doctrine of constructive treasons shall be urged to a jury, men like Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas will be found, men of exalted talents and extensive learning, who will be bold enough to assert the rights of the citizen, and save the Constitution of their country from destruction.

Another justification of a peculiar nature is set up in defence of Judge Chase, by a statement made in Keelyng's Reports. It is there said that "after the happy restoration of King Charles the Second, Sir Orlando Bridgman, chief justice of the King's Bench, and some six or eight others, judges, prosecutors, and King's solicitors, assembled for the purpose of determining in what manner the regicides should be tried, and they settled many points which it was supposed would occur upon the trials." This, sir, is an unfortunate period to refer to for justification of the conduct of judges in our day. Never was there a moment of such fawning servility; never was there a period of such unbounded licentiousness. The hope of reward or the fear of punishment brought almost every man crouching at the foot-stool of the throne, and all united in singing hosannas to the King, and crying aloud for the crucifixion of the miserable regicides. This conspiracy (which has been quoted) against the wretched victims whose sacrifice was resolved on, was headed by that most servile of all servile tools, Sir Orlando Bridgman. His character and those of his brother judges who conspired with him, may be recollected from the charge which he gave to the grand in this passage, but it would seem that it had been submitted to the inspection of the counsel to whom it is ascribed.

jury on that occasion. It will be found in the fourth volume of State Trials, and it will there be seen how flamingly he talked of the divine right of Kings, whom he called God's vicegerents on earth; their persons he said were too sacred for their conduct to be inquired into: they held their power from God, and were accountable to him alone: it was treason in their subjects to inquire into the propriety of what they did; with much more of the same cast. These are the times, these the men, and this is the conduct now introduced for the justification of Judge Chase. If they will afford him a justification he is welcome to it for me. They were woful times indeed, one would have thought the Parliament which the King found in session upon his return, was submissive enough; but he was not satisfied, and finding the whole nation ready to bow at his nod, he ordered a new one elected, and they proved so compliant to all his wishes, that he continued them for eighteen years. This sufficiently proves the servile spirit of those whom the King thought proper to employ, on this noted occasion, and it is not much to Mr. Keelyng's honor that he was one of them. The points which they did settle were of an extraordinary nature, and one of them was read a few days since by one of the counsel (Mr. Key) to show that Basset was a good juror in Callender's trial.

If, however, this famous precedent had been made in the best of times, it does not apply to the present case. For these judges, bad as they were, yet had modesty enough to keep their opinions to themselves, till after the trials had commenced, and did not deliver them until the occasions arose which called for them. Judge Chase, we have fully proved, delivered his opinion before hand, publicly, and in the hearing of the jury, so that the authority of Mr. Justice Keelyng and Sir Orlando Bridgman does not justify him. He outstripped even them.

Having thus, as I conceive, fully established the first specification contained in this article, and having answered the only colourable excuses advanced in favor of the judge, I shall proceed to the second specification. This is a charge against him for "restricting Fries's counsel from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, and from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client."

The restriction is in some sort admitted, for we are told that the counsel on both sides were restricted, and Mr. Rawle's testimony is relied on to support their allegation. If the counsel on both sides were restricted, it was a restriction of a most curious nature, as far as it related to the district attorney, Mr. Rawle; for the only restriction imposed on him was that he should not defend Fries, which his duty would not permit, nor perhaps his inclination. It is in vain therefore to talk about both being restricted, when the opinion of the court was all on one side; and it was well ascertained by the course taken by Mr. Rawle on the former trial, that he had no disposition to controvert the doctrine of treason, as laid down by the court.

That the counsel of Fries were prohibited from recurring to such English authorities, as they believed apposite, and from citing certain statutes of the United States, I consider entirely proved by the testimony of Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas. Without meaning to impeach Mr. Rawle's veracity, or that of any other person, I contend that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas are entitled to more credit than he is, because he took no notes of the first day's proceedings, and is contradicted in many very material points by the admissions of the judge himself. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas gave their testimony a year ago; they have considered it at the bar now, and are supported by the judge in his answer, as far as he thought it prudent to go. That Mr. Rawle is contradicted, and Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas supported by the judge in many material points, I will proceed to show.

Mr. Rawle says that the judge, when he handed the written opinion down, declared the counsel on each side were to have a copy, and another copy was to be taken out by the jury. Mr. Lewis states this materially different, for he says the judge declared that a copy was to be delivered to the jury as soon as the case on the part of the prosecution was opened or gone through. Here these gentlemen differ. Let us see what the judge says. In the 15th page of the answer he says he stated that "three copies were to be made out, one to be delivered to the attorney of the district, one to the counsel of the prisoner, and one to the petit jury, after they should have been empanelled and heard the indictment read to them by the clerk, and after the district attorney should have stated to them the law on the overt acts in the indictment, as it appeared to him." Thus Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas are supported, and Mr. Rawle pointedly contradicted.

Again, Lewis and Dallas state a long conversation, not of a very mild nature on the part of Lewis, which took place between him and the judge on the first day, in which the contents of the written paper were very fully disclosed by the judge. Mr. Rawle recollects nothing of this, but expressly says the court when they handed down the papers, only stated that they had thought proper to draw up their sentiments of the law, likely to arise in the cases of treason, in order that they might be perfectly understood, which would tend to save time. He does not recollect that anything more was publicly said about it that day. In the 14th and 15th pages of the answer, the judge states a long conversation that took place between himself, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Dallas, and in this supports the testimony of these two gentlemen, while he contradicts that of Mr. Rawle.

Another fact in which Mr. Rawle differs from Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas is as to John Fries being in court that day. Mr. Rawle does not recollect that he was; Mr. Lewis swears that if he was not in the prisoner's box at the moment the paper was handed down, he was placed there a few minutes after, and Judge Chase, in the 14th page of his answer expressly states, that Fries was placed in the prisoner's box, before any of the events occurred which form the subject of inquiry to day.

When Mr. Rawle's memory is so defective as to these three important facts, in the statement of which Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas are so strongly supported by the judge himself, I ask if their testimony ought not to have infinitely more weight than his? In noticing these contradictions, I have not relied on my own notes of the evidence, or on my own memory, but have referred to the three printed affidavits of Mr. Rawle, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Dallas, made out by themselves last year, and corroborated by the oral testimony which each has delivered in at the bar.

I must therefore be permitted to insist that Fries's counsel were prohibited from recurring to English authorities, and from citing certain statutes of the United States. It is fully proved by Mr. Lewis, and corroborated by Mr. Dallas. The latter was not in court when the conversation took place; but coming in immediately after, he was informed of it by Mr. Lewis, and then stated to the court what Mr. Lewis had told him. The court did not deny it, and certainly it is to be presumed, if Mr. Lewis had made an erroneous statement of facts to Mr. Dallas, and they had been repeated by Mr. Dallas, the court would have contradicted them. This was not done, and both these gentlemen now swear that they were prohibited.

Let us inquire why there was a wish on the part of the prisoner's counsel to recur to English authorities. On the former trial of Fries, the court had grounded their opinion upon the construction which had been given in England to the words levying war. The district attorney and his assistant had relied on the same authorities. The counsel for the prisoner were desirous of showing, as they themselves have stated, that although these interpretative treasons had been admitted in England since the Revolution of 1688, yet that they were founded on precedents made during arbitrary reigns, by which the courts in England afterwards conceived themselves bound. I have already shown to you from Hale's Pleas of the Crown, what was held to be the plain and simple meaning of the words levying war, antecedent to the reign of Henry VIII., when these interpretative treasons were first introduced, and it cannot be doubted that the object of Fries's counsel was to convince the jury that the Constitution of the United States ought to be construed agreeably to the plain import of its own language, without being subjected to those wild and arbitrary constructions, which had originated in the worst of times for the worst of purposes. The reason why they wished to cite the statutes of the United States I have before mentioned to be, to show that the offences charged against Fries were of such a nature as to subject him to fine and imprisonment only, and not to a forfeiture of his life.

But, sir, a doctrine as novel to me as any I have lately heard, has been advanced on this occasion. A distinction is attempted to be taken between the right of the jury to decide the law as well as the fact, and their power to do so. I have always thought that in criminal cases the jury had both the right and the power. This is the first time I have ever heard it denied, and I trust it will be the last. This right is one of the most valuable features in the trial by jury, and if a jury should be so servile on a question of life and death, to surrender their own opinions to those of the court, they would be unworthy of the name of freemen. Although the right is denied, the power is admitted. I contend, therefore, that the power includes the right. For if they have been suffered to exercise this power for more than an hundred years, without being restricted by law, it surely cannot be questioned that they have acquired the right. The right to decide both the law and the fact is admitted in England; it has been acknowledged there for more than two hundred years, although I believe an instance or two may be found in the time of the noted Jeffries, when juries were attainted for daring to exercise this right. The power to attain however has been long since abolished, and no instance can be produced since the Revolution of 1688, in which a verdict of acquittal has been ever set aside, because the jury have ventured to decide against the opinion of the court. The judge in his answer admits the right of the jury to decide both the law and the fact, and if he had not, but had taken the ground contended for by his counsel, I should have considered it a strong evidence of his guilt under the third specification.

The third and last specification charges the judge with "debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument and determine upon the question of law as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give."

We do not contend that the counsel were debarred from addressing the jury by the interference of sheriffs and constables, for it is not necessary to prove the actual exercise of force. But we do allege, and we have proved it by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, that the judge declared on the first day, that they must address the court and not the jury. I have before shown that these gentlemen are entitled to more credit than either Mr. Rawle, Mr. Meredith, or Mr. Tilghman, for their testimony is better supported than that of the others by the answer of the judge. It ought to be remembered, too, that they were more particularly interested in the transaction than the rest of the gentlemen, and therefore the probability is, that the facts were more strongly impressed on their minds.

An attempt however is made to shelter the judge from this part of the accusation, by saying that the declared counsel would be heard although this opinion was given. Sir, this is another evasion. The opinion itself carries with it internal, uncontrovertible evidence of the determination of the court that the counsel should not address the jury. What is the principal ground of the defence? what is the leading reason urged for giving this extraordinary opinion before the jury was sworn? It was, as the judge says, and as his counsel have argued, to save time. They state that there were more than one hundred civil causes then depending, that the delay of business in Pennsylvania had been long a subject of complaint, and the judge was anxious to make Fries's trial a short one, in order that they might have time to proceed with the other business. Now suffer me to inquire how time was to be saved; how the trial of Fries was to be shortened, if his counsel were to be allowed to address the jury on the law which the court had already decided? Was not the opinion of the court given for the express purpose of preventing them from addressing the jury; or, if not for this, let me ask for what purpose it was given? Was it to prejudice the minds of the jury; to close their ears and their understandings against any arguments which might be offered them? Gentlemen say no. Was it to save time? This was impossible, because the time was still to be occupied by the counsel being permitted to address the jury. Why then, let me ask, was the opinion given? The answer is ready. It was intended to produce both these effects. The minds of the jury were to be preoccupied by the imposing authority of the court, and in this manner it was expected to deter the counsel from addressing them on the law. Nothing, therefore, can be clearer, than that the counsel were prevented from addressing the jury, and that the judge "endeavored (in the language of the article) to wrest from the jury their right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law." But it is said that the right of the jury to decide the law does not give them a dispensing power over the law, and that therefore they are bound by the opinion of the court. Nor does the right of the court to decide the law give them a dispensing power over the law. The jury have a right to decide the law, and are not bound by the opinion of the court. In order to enable them to decide correctly they have a right to hear argument, and any attempt to prevent this, is an attempt to wrest from them their right to decide the law, and is a high misdemeanor.

We are told, however, that if anything wrong was done on the first day, ample atonement was made on the second. It is true that the judge exhibited some appearance of a wish that the counsel would proceed on the second day, but Mr. Lewis well remarked, that although the papers were withdrawn, the impression which had been made on the minds of the jurors could not be removed. What sort of an atonement, too, was this? It carried insult with it; and the language in which it was made had a still greater tendency to strengthen the impression made the day before. The counsel were publicly informed they might proceed as they pleased, but it must be at the hazard of their characters, under the direction of the court. Is there a man of reputation on earth, possessed of the smallest spark of feeling, that would consent to disgrace himself by addressing a jury under such circumstances? This alone, if nothing else had taken place, was sufficient to drive them from the defence of their client; and if they thought that their abandoning him might eventually save his life, they were fully justified in doing so.

The learned advocates for the judge have talked highly of the independence of the judiciary, and have asked what inducements any judge could have to act as we have charged Judge Chase with acting. Are there then no inducements for a judge to swerve from his duty? Has he no feelings to gratify, and is it impossible for him to become a partisan? Does his character as a judge divest him of his ambition as a man? Is he so incorruptible that temptation cannot assail him? Look through the annals of other nations—read the history of England for the last forty years. Judicial independence has been for a long time as well secured there as here; and yet how many instances shall we find in that country of prosecutions in which the feelings of the Ministry had been engaged, and in which their influence over the judges has been too flagrant to be mistaken? In Ireland, miserable Ireland, a still more gloomy prospect presents itself. They, too, have boasted an independent judiciary; but an overruling influence has crumbled it into ruins. The demon of destruction has entered their courts of justice, and spread desolation over the land. Execution has followed execution, until the oppressed, degraded and insulted nation has been made to tremble through every nerve, and to bleed at every pore. Let us then be warned by the fate of Ireland. In State prosecutions her judges look to the Castle; although they cannot be put down, they may be elevated. Some of our judges have been elevated to places of high political importance; splendid embassies have been given to them. I will not say that they were given or accepted with improper views; but they have been given, and surely they hold out inducement enough for a judge to bend to the ruling party. It is our duty to prevent party spirit from entering into our courts of justice. Let us nip the evil in the bud, or it may grow to an enormous tree, bearing destruction upon every branch. You have now an opportunity of doing it, and I trust you will not suffer it to escape you. I therefore hope that you will not only remove Judge Chase from the high office which he now fills, but that by your judgment you will forever hereafter disqualify him from holding any office of profit or trust under the Government of the United States.

I have thus, Mr. President, gone through the first article of the impeachment, and will not encroach upon the others; their elucidation I shall leave to my friends, who will follow me. A sense of public duty alone led to the present prosecution, and having discharged this, we shall have nothing to reproach ourselves with, let your decision be what it may.

Trial of Judge Chase.

MR. RODNEY.—Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Senate: The present trial exhibits a spectacle truly solemn and impressive. A man who holds one of the highest judicial offices under the Government, who, from the period of the Revolution, has filled many of the most important public situations, and whose hairs have been bleached in the service of his country, is charged before this dignified tribunal, by the Representatives of the American people, with the commission of acts in violation of his duty as a judge, and of the laws and Constitution of the land.

On one hand, the character of an aged and respectable individual, which may be dearer to him than the small remnant of his life, is involved in your decision; on the other, the most precious rights of free citizens, and the dearest interests of society.

The mind which could contemplate, unmoved, such a scene, cannot feel for the welfare of the people, or the honor of the nation, and must be equally insensible to the finer sympathies of life and the practice of its charities and affections.

The public anxiety manifested by this deeply interesting trial must be evident to all—a trial of the first importance, because of the first impression—a trial not confined to a single act in the conduct of the accused, but embracing a variety of transactions at different periods of his life—a trial which departs from the ordinary mode of decision, whose novelty and magnitude have excited so much interest and attention that it seems to have superseded for the moment, not only every other grave object or pursuit, but every other fashionable amusement or dissipation.

The task of prosecuting is always very unpleasant, and to me extremely painful; but my rule has ever been not to suffer private considerations or personal feelings to stand in the way of a firm and independent discharge of public duty.

To this exalted tribunal I look with confidence for a display of that dignified impartiality, which will do credit to their elevated situation, and reflect honor on their country. You will raise yourselves, I am convinced, above the common level of human prejudices, personal or political, and will suffer no considerations but those which are perfectly correct to be blended with your inquiries or mingled with your decisions.

Party, it is true, is a spirit of so subtle a nature as to diffuse itself almost imperceptibly over the human mind; it frequently pervades the system without being felt, and sometimes warps the judgment when least suspected. Against the influence of this spirit I need scarcely caution the judges whom I have the honor to address. It cannot approach within the pale of this court or enter their hallowed walls.

I have marked, Mr. President, in the questions which you have so correctly put to the witnesses in the course of their examination, that singleness of eye, which looks to the discovery of truth alone, without reference to the party whose case it may affect; whilst your conduct in maintaining that order and decorum suitable to the solemn-nity of the occasion has exhibited an example worthy of imitation.

I have observed, with heartfelt pleasure and honest pride, the unwearied and impartial attention paid by the members of this court during the progress of this momentous cause. To my mind it presages a decision worthy of themselves and serviceable to their country, and is a sure pledge that their determination will be honest, upright, and independent.

If, after a fair and full inquiry into the facts, illustrated by the arguments for and against the accused, and a careful examination of the law, commented on by those whose duty it is to support the impeachment, and those who are opposed to it, the Senate shall be of opinion that the charges have not been substantiated, and pronounce a verdict of acquittal, believe me, sir, I, as a citizen faithful, obedient, and affectionate to the laws of my country; shall most cheerfully acquiesce in the decision. But I do confidently trust that it will not take place, on the principles or the precedent established in the case of Warren Hastings, the Governor of Bengal, that plunderer of India, that destroyer of the people of Asia, that devastator of the East, whose crimes were without number, and whose enormities exceeded calculation. What fields have been dyed, what streams have been tinged with the innocent blood of victims sacrificed on the altar of his avarice or his ambition! An obligation however solemn, a treaty however sacred, interposed but a weak and feeble barrier to the views of his personal or political aggrandizement. Even a zenana, the sacred retreat of women, holy and consecrated to the fairest work of the creation, by the religious customs of that country, has been violated whenever the silver and the gold, the jewels and the diamonds, were sufficient objects to attract his attention or gratify his rapacity.

Before I proceed to the discussion of those facts and principles more immediately connected with the subject now under investigation, permit me to advert for a few moments to the manner in which the defence has been conducted. I shall also claim your indulgence for a small portion of time, whilst I reply (I fear in a desultory way) to some remarks, and notice some matter which has been blended with this case, no doubt with the view of giving it a complexion favorable to the defence, but which I humbly conceive to be rather foreign and extraneous.

The fascinating voice of eloquence and the seducing tongue of ingenuity, though excited with great address, will produce no other effect before this tribunal than to excite that degree of pleasure which we all feel on the display of professional talents. It shall be my duty (because I believe it to be not only the duty but the interest of every advocate to have a decision on argument and argument alone) to avoid everything like declamation, and to address you in the sober narrative of fact, and the temperate language of reason.

The counsel for the aged defendant have explored every avenue to the human heart to awaken your sensibilities, and have appealed to your passions to enlist them under their banners; at one time attempting to excite your sympathies in favor of their unfortunate client, and at another endeavoring to kindle your resentment against the prosecution. They may, perhaps, have been occasionally in the habit of addressing those with whose feelings they could play as the winds do with the waves; and, animated by the trophies of former victories, they have recurred to the same means of conquest which have before crowned their exertions with success. The judges of this court are no doubt alive to the generous feelings of sympathy and compassion, when an object presents itself calculated to excite them. But even when under the influence of this mysterious power, they will always remember that humanity is the second virtue of courts, justice the first.

We have been more than once solemnly reminded that the decision which you may give will be re-examined by those who succeed you, and that posterity will rejudge the judgment which you may pass at this time. To that impartial tribunal let the appeal be made. I fear that when future annals, faithful to the cause of truth and justice, shall record the patriotism and the virtues of my honorable friend who gave birth to this impeachment, the weeping voice of history will be heard to deplore the oppressive acts and criminal excesses of the judge who, with a boldness and violence unparalleled in this country, seems to have trampled under foot, as if conscious of impunity, the established principles of law, and the rules of decency and decorum.

The defendant himself, in his answer, looking beyond the transient scenes of this world, has crossed the stream of time, and carried us, in idea, on the ocean of eternity, to the footstool of that throne which is washed by its waves. It is true ere long we must all embark on that voyage from which no mariner returns; and be borne with myriads on the same swell to the judgment seat, when our fates will be decided for eternity. On that awful day, I trust we shall appear with the hopes and the consolations which beam upon the soul from the everlasting light of Divine Revelation; that, whatever frail passages may checker the volumes of our lives, though the conduct of the defendant towards the unfortunate, unprotected, and persecuted Fries may appear scored matters in the book which records his deeds, infinite mercy will obscure them from the eyes of infinite purity, and a sincere repentance blot them out forever.

It struck me with some degree of surprise, when I heard the language of complaint from my learned friend, (Mr. Hopkinson,) who summed up the evidence on the first article in favor of the accused, because this impeachment was not instituted sooner. He seemed to ask with an air of triumph, when did the transactions take place upon which the prosecution is grounded? I answer with confidence they took place at different and distant periods. Some of them as far back as the year 1800, and others but yesterday, as it were. The whole linked together by the spirit of persecution, and forming a chain of offences against the violated laws of the country and the insulted justice of the land, which cannot be broken by testimony or weakened by argument. And yet because the guardians of the people's rights and liberties have submitted to bear with patience the oppressive acts of the defendant, until they could endure them no longer; because considering him clothed beneath the ermine of justice with the common infirmities of man, they have been slow to anger, and have waited for the season of repentance and reformation; the very lenience and forbearance, which they have manifested by their conduct, to the world, are forsooth used as an argument against the present impeachment. With what justice or propriety this Court will determine. Had they, imitating the example of the accused, employed their time in hunting for criminality, and the instant they suspected an offence, a sentence of condemnation succeeded, quick as the thunderbolt pursues the flash, they would have received, I presume, credit for the zeal and promptness which they displayed in the task of prosecution. Let it be remarked that justice is of slow pace, but of certain step, and that the sufferings and the tears of the innocent, however deeply buried, will rise up in judgment, to confound the guilty.

The House of Representatives, so far from deserving blame, in my humble opinion, merit commendation for the reluctance with which they proceeded to accusation, and for the care, caution, and dignity which have marked their steps. I have frequently heard an unbecoming zeal reprobated in a prosecutor; but never before did I hear from the lips of a counsel for an offender, a complaint of delay and remissness in charging his client with guilt. What a striking contrast does their conduct furnish, compared with that of the defendant! They betrayed no thirst for prosecution, but an unwillingness to accuse; no eager appetite for conviction, but an anxious desire that impartial justice should take place between the public and an individual, whom irresistible evidence had compelled them to present before the highest judicial authority of the nation. Not, it is true, for the murder of despotic princes whose will was the law, and whose laws perhaps were as sanguinary as those of Draco; nor for the plunder of empires, swayed by an iron sceptre as oppressive as the dominion of Hastings. Far other crimes are laid to his charge. The defendant, a citizen of this free land, sworn to support our mild Constitution and our equal laws, and bound by his oath of office to administer justice impartially, having a perfect knowledge of his duty, (for of ignorance the whole world will acquit him,) stands charged with plundering, in the holy habit of a judge, a jury of his country of their most sacred rights, and injured and insulted freemen of their Constitutional privileges.

He was indeed providentially prevented from imbruing his hands in the blood of poor Fries, but he stands accused of shedding, with unfeeling severity, the life blood of the Constitution itself.

Trial of Judge Chase.

Such are the crimes for which he is arraigned at your bar, and which one of the gentlemen has been pleased to term petty offences. In the dark catalogue of criminal enormities, perhaps few are to be found of a deeper dye. If I were an advocate of the doctrines of constructive and cumulative treasons, of which the learned judge appears to have been a great admirer and a zealous supporter, I would say that he himself was guilty of judicial treason against the Constitution of the country, and majesty of the people.

The independence of the Judiciary, the political tocsin of the day, and the alarm bell of the night, has been rung through every change in our ears. They have played upon this cord until its vibrations produce no effect. The sound is rather calculated to stun us into an insensibility against real attacks, for the poor hobby has been literally rode to death. To the rational independence of the Judiciary, I am, and ever have been, a firm and uniform friend. But I am no advocate for the inviolability of judges more than of Kings. In this country I am afraid the doctrine has been carried to such an extravagant length, that the Judiciary may justly be considered like a spoiled child. They are here placed almost beyond the reach of the people, though not beyond the immediate power and influence of the Executive. I wish not to see them the slaves of any administration, but the faithful and impartial executors of justice. My desire is that the laws, like the providence of the Deity, should shed their protecting influence equally over all.

It will be allowed that the hopes of an individual are as powerful inducements to action as his fears. Whether the Executive can depress or exalt him, his influence is equally great. Whether he can punish his errors or reward his faults, his dominion is the same. We all know that an associate judge may sigh for promotion, and may be created a Chief Justice, whilst experience teaches us, that more than one Chief Justice has been appointed a Minister Plenipotentiary. These facts are staring us in the face, when we talk of judges being independent of the Government.

What has been the natural effect of such conduct? Have the judges stood aloof during the political tempests which have agitated the country—or have they united in the Io triumphe which the votaries and idolaters of power have sung to those who were seated in the car of Government? Have they made no offerings at the shrine of party; have they not preached political sermons from the bench, in which they have joined chorus with the anonymous scribblers of the day and the infuriate instruments of faction? Let a recurrence to past events decide.

I wish to be understood as speaking on these topics in the abstract, and not with a view of imputing improper motives to those concerned in the arrangements which have taken place.

The people of the United States, on the other hand, have no offices of profit and emolument to bestow. They have no post immediately in their power to give, except a station in the House of Representatives, which a judge would not accept from their hands. But, let me ask, was there no vacancy in the gift of the Executive, to which the defendant could aspire, and to which his conduct might furnish him with a passport or a letter of introduction?

Some observations have been made on the independence of the judges in England. In that country they are removable by an address of both Houses of Parliament. By what a slight tenure, by what a slender thread, are their offices held! The voice, nay, the whisper, or the breath of the Minister for the time being, may remove them, and yet they have generally manifested a spirit of real independence, even in the season of alarm and terror, of which I fear our judges at a similar period cannot boast. But in that country, a seat on the bench is considered as a place of rest, and they look not beyond it. There the judges are not made Envoys Extraordinary or Ministers Plenipotentiary.

We ought not to be imposed upon by names in this country. Give any human being judicial power for life, and annex to the exercise of it the kingly maxim "that he can do no wrong," you may call him a judge or justice, no matter what is the appellation, and you transform him into a despot, regardless of all law, but his own sovereign will and pleasure.

I had nearly omitted stating, but it is worthy of remark, that, by the Constitution of the Union, the Chief Justice must preside in case the President is impeached; and, if the President can at any time send him out of the country to negotiate treaties or conventions, he can most effectually prevent the execution of this salutary provision, and shelter himself from punishment.

These ideas are thrown out in reply to the lengthy remarks on judicial independence, and to which it was stated no answer would be given except some jargon about the sovereignty of the people! They contain a concise commentary on the theory furnished by the text of practice.

In this country, where the people are justly recognised as the real sovereigns of the land, and the only source of all legitimate authority, it is wonderful to observe the manner in which it is too much the fashion of the times to speak of them. The first article of our political creed, that all power emanates from the people, cannot be attacked by argument, and yet they attempt to turn it into ridicule. On this head, they are extremely dexterous. In the course they pursue, they exhibit all the skill of political jockies. They admit the principle that the will of the people should rule, because, forsooth, they dare not dispute it. But it must not interfere with their own views, or it ceases to be that awful object, that just and legitimate sovereignty which commands respect, and to which they bow with submission; it is no longer the voice of the people, but the clamor of faction; it instantly becomes political jargon, grating to the ears of those who claim the exclusive right, as if anointed with holy oil, of protecting the people from the violence of their own passions, or, in plain language, saving them from themselves!

Trial of Judge Chase.

I cannot subscribe to another doctrine of my learned friend (Mr. Hopkinson)—for such I may style him from the terms of intimacy, at an early period of life—that the people, after delegating a portion of authority for their own welfare and advantage, to different departments and subordinate agents, have nothing to say or do with the manner in which such authority is exercised. My position is the reverse. The people should watch with a jealous eye over those whom they have entrusted with authority, to discover whether it is enacted for their benefit or perverted to their detriment—whether it is exercised for the public good, or prostituted to private purposes. This is the rule in private life, and it will hold equally true in public.

Suffer me, at this place, to notice the remarks of the learned counsel who spoke yesterday, (Mr. Harper,) with so much sensibility and feeling for his client, on the change of parties in popular governments, and the proscriptions, persecutions, and punishments, too frequently inflicted by those who are triumphant, on the fallen victims of their authority; when acts, innocent in themselves, because against no known law, have been converted into crimes to gratify the vindictive passions of the victorious against those whom the fortune of political war has placed within their power. No man can deprecate more sincerely than I do, such a state of things. To the situation of affairs in this country, I presume these remarks cannot have the most distant application. If they were made with reference to the present Administration, to the Executive or Legislative Departments of the Government, the allusion may perhaps have the light support of visionary imagination, but has no substantial foundation in reality. It may be fancy, but is not fact.

The illustrious Chief Magistrate of the Union has furnished a precedent, by his liberal and enlightened conduct, of which the lamentable annals of mankind afford no example. Under his wise and his mild guidance, what auspicious beams of public sunshine have been diffused over the whole face of the country! until, to the discontented few, the language of the Latin poet might justly be applied—

"O fortunati nimium sua si bona norint!"

This enlightened policy has been adopted in conjunction with the luminous constellation of distinguished worthies, by whom he is surrounded; whose exalted character and talents add to the usefulness, the dignity, and splendor of his measures, and increase to an extent almost incalculable the general sum of the happiness of this great and independent nation.

Turning our eyes to those who have exercised the high and responsible functions of legislation, we find their acts equally deserving commendation. Their proceedings are calculated to excite at once the envy and the admiration of their opposers and the world. They breathe not the fell spirit of resentment and persecution. To their honor be it spoken, that, instead of enlarging the circle of offence, they have reduced the scale of criminality. They have abolished an odious, and, I believe, an unconstitutional seditious law, which had been executed with a rigor and severity perfectly congenial with the passionate policy which gave it birth. The decrees under it, if not written in the blood of the sufferers, were written in their tears. A more dreadful engine of persecution and oppression cannot well be conceived. With this instrument in their hands, they could have smote their enemies and shielded themselves. It would have been a sword and a buckler, but they disdained the idea.

Actuated by the best motives, with the honest view of purifying the fountain of justice, and restoring the characters of the American bench, they are now engaged in the unpleasant, but indispensable task of bringing to exemplary punishment a judge who has offended against the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, and the well-known statutes of Congress, who has violated the bounden duties of his office, and that high Legislative act, which, to the sanction of a law, added the solemnity and obligation of an oath.

In this important undertaking they are contending not for themselves, but for posterity; not for those in power, but those whom power has forsaken. Against all the wild theories of new-fangled opinions and the monstrous iniquity of exploded doctrines, they wish to teach a lesson of instruction to future judges that, when intoxicated by the spirit of party, they may recollect the scale of power may one day turn, and preserve the scales of justice equal.

We have now arrived at an important point of the discussion, comprehending the Constitutional doctrine of impeachments. On this ground, the learned counsel have made a formidable stand, and have contended for it with as much zeal and perseverance as if it were the Thermopylae of their defence. The reason must be obvious. Conscious of the weakness of their cause upon the merits, and sensible that the conduct of their client will not bear the eye of scrutiny, they wish to preclude investigation by arresting us at the threshold of inquiry. To protect a citadel without a palladium, they have endeavored to form of various materials a Scæan gate, which it requires no stratagem to enter. The positions they have piled together, without much regard to order and regularity, seem to resolve themselves into the shape of a plea to the jurisdiction of this Court over the case. It appears in a strange, anomalous form, both in the answer and their argument, but this is the result, I believe, when well understood.

One of the counsel has exclaimed, "Look on 'this dignified tribunal, inspiring awe and veneration! Was it constituted for the trial and punishment of such offences as are charged in the 'articles of impeachment?' Drawing an inference even from the appearance of the judges and of these walls against the exercise of the authority vested in them by the Constitution! I would ask, in turn, the counsel to look on his client, if he were present; to recollect the elevated post that he fills, the powerful talents with which the bounty of nature has blessed him, the knowledge which he has acquired, the experience he has had; I would say, behold a man, designed to have shone one of the brightest luminaries that ever dignified the profession of the law, formed by nature for the friend and benefactor of society; what has been his conduct? Seated in the curricule of passion, he has driven on, Phæton-like, and destruction has marked his course; persecution and oppression have followed in his wake. His faults and his follies have increased with his years. Age has added to the rashness and violence of youth. His shining talents and superior knowledge have been employed in support of doctrines fatal to the liberties of his country. The Temple of Justice has been profaned by unholy acts, and its altars violated with impious hands. The laws and the Constitution have been trampled under his feet. But shall these acts be perpetrated with impunity in this free country? Is it not becoming the dignity of this tribunal to inquire into offences of the highest grade, committed by a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States? I trust they will consider their talents and their time well employed in this arduous investigation; that neither the elevation of the offender, the boldness with which he avows his acts, nor the ingenuity with which his counsel defend them, will protect him from the impartial sentence of the law. Justice, I must acknowledge, appears in her most attractive form, and with the fairest features, when she presents her helping hand to relieve injured innocence from cruel oppression; but she is not less worthy of approbation, when, with a stern countenance, she hurls the bolt at the head of the offender, and inflicts merited punishment on the guilty. In ordinary cases it is necessary, on every exception to jurisdiction, to state the proper forum which has authority to try the questions involved in a cause. The objection must be predicated on the principle that the right to decide is vested in another tribunal. The gentlemen have not been so good as to point out the authority which has cognizance of the offences of Judge Chase, and can grant adequate redress, if this Court be not vested with that power.

We have been told by that able lawyer, the Attorney General of Maryland, that a judge cannot be impeached for any offence which is not indictable; nor, indeed, for an indictable offence, unless it be a high crime or misdemeanor; and not even for a high crime or misdemeanor, except such as stamp infamy on the character and brand the soul with corruption. A variety of cases have been put to explain his ideas. The law books and the Constitution have been relied on to support those positions, which it becomes my duty to examine. Without troubling you to remove the lumber of the books, let me call your attention, in the first place, to the Constitution. The Constitution shall be my text. I think I shall be able to demonstrate that, in order to render an offence impeachable, it is not necessary that it should be indictable. But, I will go further, and prove that, agreeably to the learned counsel's own principles, Judge Chase has committed indictable offences.

Taking his own explanation of crimes and misdemeanors, and recurring to his authority, I will prove that, within the strictest terms of the definition on which he relies, Judge Chase is guilty, not merely of misdemeanors in the various acts of judicial misbehaviour, but of aggravated crimes against the express language of the laws and the positive provisions of the Constitution.

In adverting to the Constitution, when looking at one part, we should take a view of the whole instrument to fix the proper construction. In examining any provision, we should consider the bearing and tendencies of all the rest. By adopting this rule we shall preserve order and harmony throughout the system.

The first place in which the subject of impeachment is mentioned in the Constitution is in the first section of the first article. The language used by those who framed it, is, in my humble opinion, too plain to be misconceived, and too clear to be misunderstood: "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment."

This section vests the exclusive authority to impeach in the immediate Representatives of the people. The power thus delegated is general and comprehensive. It is not limited to any particular acts or transgressions, but is coextensive with every proper object or subject of impeachment. The House of Representatives is thus constituted, most emphatically, the grand jury of the nation: A high and responsible authority, which, I trust, will always be exercised with prudence and discretion, directed with impartiality and justice. But I do confidently hope that there will ever be found sufficient spirit and firmness to arraign the guilty delinquent, however elevated his station, when the Constitution or laws have been infringed, the tenure of office broken, or its duties violated.

The next passage, in order, which touches this topic, and to which I shall refer, is the third section of the same article: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present."

This clause establishes a tribunal for the trial of impeachments. To the Senate this important trust is wisely confided. It prescribes the manner in which the jurisdiction shall be exercised, directs that the members shall be under oath or affirmation, and fixes the number necessary to convict. Let us proceed a step further in the path: "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States; but the party convicted, shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."

The part I have just read contains two very salutary provisions. The first limits the extent of the punishment to be inflicted by the Senate. The second, as a necessary consequence of the former, reserves to the ordinary tribunals of law the right to proceed by indictment. This last provision has been a fruitful source of argument to the learned counsel. They have very ingeniously played upon these terms, and, in the zeal of their imaginations, have fancied that they proved to a demonstration the position, that an offence must be indictable, or it is not impeachable. There may be magic in their argument, but I do not perceive there is any logic. The superstructure which they have erected on this basis, is easily demolished. From the language of this clause they draw the inference that the framers of the Constitution intended that no person should be impeached for any offence for which he was not liable to be indicted. Is this the fair import of the expressions? The text of this instrument is remarkably free from ambiguity. Clearness, correctness, and precision, are its leading characteristics. With a very few exceptions, it speaks a language intelligible by all. Had it been the design and wish of the authors of the Constitution that no offences should be impeachable which were not indictable, they would have declared so in express and positive terms, and left nothing for inference or conjecture. This they have not done, and we may reasonably presume they did not intend to do. They prudently looked into the volume of history, where they saw the shocking purposes to which, in evil times, the power of impeachments had been basely and inhumanly prostituted. They read in those instructive pages the dear-bought lessons of experience, and wisely ordained limits, which the authority to punish should not exceed. They fixed a ne plus ultra for the tribunal that they established, which their severest judgments should not pass. They knew, at the same time, that crimes might be perpetrated and offences committed, which would demand additional chastisement. The loss of office, and disqualification to hold any in future, the maximum of punishment which they had prescribed, would be very inadequate and bear little proportion to the atrocious guilt which might be incurred. Under the influence of these impressions, they reserved to the tribunals established by law, the right to inflict the just penalties annexed to this class of cases. Without any intention whatever, when any acts had been committed which manifested an unfitness for office, or when there had been a breach of the tenure by which it was held, by misconduct or misbehaviour, to prevent the proceedings by impeachment, although the case might not be such as to warrant any additional punishment at law. This, I apprehend, is the object they had in view, and this is the fair, easy, natural, and obvious sense of their words they have used.

Those conversant with the juridical history of England, or who have studied her political annals, must be sensible of the deplorable situation to which that country has been reduced, at different periods, by the abuse of the power of impeachment. The revengeful exercise of this authority has too often deluged the scaffold with blood. In that country the proceeding by impeachment for any offence supersedes all other modes. The person accused, whether he be acquitted or condemned, cannot afterwards be indicted for the same offence, or called to an account before the ordinary tribunals. The former course is a complete bar to the latter. To prevent those consequences flowing from a proceeding by impeachment under the Constitution, those who formed that instrument, at the same time that they limited the punishment, have expressly declared it shall have no effect to bar a trial before the ordinary courts, but that the party shall be liable to indictment and punishment according to law. Without this positive provision, as we are almost as much in the habit of drawing on the Bank of England for law as our merchants are for cash or credit, we might have incorporated a principle into our code totally repugnant to the system. The Constitution has drawn the true line on this subject. From a mere reprimand or temporary suspension, the court may ascend in the scale of punishment to removal and disqualification. But thus far can they go, and no farther. They cannot pass the Rubicon. If the crime deserves a more exemplary sentence, recourse must be had to the ordinary mode of proceeding, and then their judgment is not pleadable in bar to an indictment. By this means adequate punishment may in all cases be inflicted.

In England every person, in a public or private capacity, either as an officer or an individual, is liable to be proceeded against by impeachment. In this country the sphere of impeachment is properly limited. The Attorney General of Maryland has taken a long, tedious and circuitous march to arrive at this point, which I would readily have yielded without an argument. I do not recollect that any of my colleagues contended for the position that every man in this country, in his individual capacity, might be an object of impeachment. For myself I utterly disclaim the idea. Admitting, as I do, in its fullest extent, this wide distinction between the power delegated by the Constitution and that exercised in England, which embraces every subject of that kingdom, how does it bear on the case or affect the argument? After laboring for a considerable time, and employing all his talents, and that fund of legal knowledge which is inexhaustible, to prove that the House of Representatives cannot impeach every citizen indiscriminately, the learned Attorney General has not favored us with any application of his principle to the present cause. It proves certainly one among many other broad lines of difference which exist between the British doctrines on the subject of impeachment and the constitutional provisions of this country. In this respect it adds to the weight of our scale. It shows how cautious we should be in bowing down to British precedents which cannot be perfectly applicable. I hope I have satisfied the Court, that the gentlemen are mistaken in their argument on this part of the Constitution. In the general wreck of their defence, I conceive this sinking plank, to which they have clung, cannot afford them the most distant prospect of safety. We will now proceed a little further in the broad and plain road of the Constitution, carefully examining the ground on which we move.

By the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, it is provided that, "The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The learned counsel have placed great reliance on this passage, to prove that an officer must be guilty, not merely of an indictable offence (as they concede every crime or misdemeanor to be) but must have committed a high crime or high misdemeanor to justify an impeachment. One of the learned gentlemen, to fix the true construction of the terms "or other high crimes and misdemeanors," commented at great length on the expressions. To illustrate the subject his fancy readily formed an objection, which with logical accuracy he removed. He demonstrated that, agreeably to the strictest grammatical construction and the nicest propriety of speech, the epithet high was to be considered as prefixed to misdemeanors as well as to crimes. In this manner the phantom, which his own imagination raised, was laid not by a spell, but by the exertion of his argumentative powers. We would willingly have conceded the point, and spared him his labor and his breath. We mean not to cavil about trifles, or dispute for straws.

Taking it for granted that he has given the proper construction to a part, let us examine what is the just sense of the whole of this passage. In plain English, it commands, upon the conviction by impeachment of certain atrocious offences, that the guilty officer shall be removed at all events. Depriving the court thus far of the discretion which they would otherwise have possessed, as to the judgment they might pass. Having previously limited, in general cases, the punishment which they might inflict according to their discretion, by establishing a maximum which they should not exceed, in this particular grade of flagrant offences, they have fixed the sentence which they shall pass. The language of the Constitution is peremptory and imperative. Those convicted of such daring enormities, of those high crimes or high misdemeanors, must be removed from office, which they have justly forfeited. This is the minimum of punishment to be inflicted. Perhaps those who penned the great charter of the Union apprehended, that in evil times, some high officer of the United States, clothed with power and armed with influence, might be proved to have committed the base and detestable crime of bribery, or some other equally great, by evidence too strong and too powerful to be resisted, and in an unfortunate hour, awed by fear or seduced by favor, the Constitutional judges would not hurl him at once from the seat which he was unworthy to occupy, but permit him to remain in his station, to the disgrace of the country and to the injury of the people. Hence they were induced to make this wholesome provision, which left nothing to the discretion of the judges. But is there a word in the whole sentence which expresses an idea, or from which any fair inference can be drawn, that no person shall be impeached but for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors?" It does not pretend to specify the various acts of an officer which may subject him to an impeachment, its whole object is to define and fix the punishment which he shall incur on the commission of particular offences, which is removal from office. This is the least penalty they can inflict in such cases, and God knows it would be much too little, had they not in the former part provided, that after stripping the traitorous impostor of the insignia of office and power, the ordinary tribunals may add to the Constitutional sentence of the Senate the fines or forfeitures imposed by law.

From the most cursory and transient view of this passage, I submit with due deference, that it must appear very manifest that there are other cases than those here specified for which an impeachment will lay, and is the proper remedy. In these particular cases the punishment is ascertained, to wit, removal from office; but in a clause to which I have sometime since adverted, it is discretionary. Where was the necessity or use of that, if this defined all the impeachable offences, and specified the punishment? We must, if possible, give effect to every sentence of this instrument. We must not suppose that its authors made nugatory provisions. The sense and meaning which I have given to their language, and the constructions which I have maintained, will give force and effect to every word.

The system of impeachment thus understood, and I humbly submit rationally explained, is perhaps as little liable to exception as any branch of the Constitution. It is stripped of those terrible instruments of death and destruction, which have made such dreadful havoc and carnage in the ages that have preceded us. We have been benefited by the sanguinary precedents of barbarous times. We have been taught wisdom ourselves by the folly of others. We have improved the advantages we possessed, and thus, according to his own inscrutable ways, has the benevolent Author of our existence brought good out of evil.

In guarding effectually against the cruel and vindictive punishments which the extraordinary tribunal of impeachment might inflict, in the exacerbations of party violence and personal animosity, the fathers of the Constitution took care to provide that a certain grade of offences should deprive the guilty incumbent of his office, thereby rendering him a harmless object to the community, when dispossessed of his abused authority. Nay, they went further. Their wisdom and prudence led them to make a specific declaration, that after being deprived of his power, he should be subject to the legal consequences of his guilt, upon trial and conviction before the ordinary tribunals at law. Thus rendering the system perfect and complete.

There is an important provision contained in the Constitution, intimately connected with this subject, to which I now beg leave to refer. It will be found in the first section of the third article:

Trial of Judge Chase.

"The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour."

With this particular part of the Constitution the learned judge must have been more especially acquainted when he accepted of his present office, and must then have expressly accepted it on the terms specified. No man can seriously say that for a judge to continue in the exercise of his authority and the receipt of his salary, after any acts of misbehaviour, is not a violation of this essential provision of the Constitution. He holds his office explicitly and expressly during good behaviour. The instant he behaves bad he commits a breach of the tenure by which he holds the possession, and the office becomes forfeited. The people have leased out the authority upon certain specified terms. So long as he complies with them, and not a moment longer, is he entitled to exercise the power which was not intended for his individual advantage but for their benefit. But, sir, who is to take notice of these acts of misbehaviour? How are they to be ascertained, and what shall be considered as such? Are the people in their individual capacity, ipso facto, on the commission of the act to declare the office forfeited, and is a judge then to cease from his labors? Or must it not be officially, or rather judicially ascertained? This, I conceive, would be the proper mode of procedure. Has the Constitution provided no tribunal for this purpose? I answer it has, most indubitably. By the Constitution the Senate, as the Court, and jury too in cases of impeachment, has the sole power of removing from offices those who hold them by the tenure of good behaviour. If a judge misbehave he ought to be removed, because agreeably to the plainest provision he has forfeited his right to hold the office. The Constitution having established this single mode of removal, and having declared that a judge shall hold his office only during good behaviour, it becomes the duty of the Representatives of the People, as the grand inquest of the nation, vested with the general power of impeachment, when they know, of their own knowledge, or from the information of their constituents, that acts of misbehaviour have been committed, to present the delinquent to this high tribunal, whose powers are competent to inquire into the case and apply the remedy; whose authority is co-extensive with the complaint, commensurate with the object, and adequate to the redress of the evil. Shall it be said that it is true the Constitution has declared that a judge shall hold his office no longer than he behaves himself well, and that though he behaves never so ill, it has provided no means to turn him out of office, if he has the hardihood to remain in his seat? If such a doctrine be contended for, it is too preposterous to receive the sanction of this court. It would render this provision nugatory indeed. It would do more; it would be establishing the principle, that whether they behave well or ill, they must continue in office, because there was no mode fixed for removing them. This would be the strongest construction that plain language, obvious to the common sense of the most unlettered man, ever received in a court of justice. The method I have pointed out solves all difficulties at once, and releases us from every embarrassment on this subject. It makes the Constitution consistent with itself, and preserves uniformity throughout all the parts.

The learned counsel were compelled to make a show in maintenance of unsound doctrines, to give the appearance of support to positions equally untenable.

I flatter myself that every member of this Court is by this time convinced that if a judge misbehave, he should be deprived of his office, because guilty of a breach of the tenure by which it is held. That any acts of misbehaviour must be judicially inquired into and ascertained. That the Constitution, having delegated to the House of Representatives exclusively the general power to impeach, acts of misbehaviour are proper subjects of impeachment, upon conviction of which the Senate has the authority to remove an officer, and is bound to exercise it. Shall we be told, then, that no matter how gross the acts of judicial misbehaviour, or how flagrant the misconduct of a judge, he cannot be removed from office, nay, he cannot be impeached, unless guilty of treason or bribery, or some crime equally great? Sir, it is impossible that the intelligent understandings and the mature judgments of this Court could countenance for a moment such an idea.

The terms "during good behaviour," appear to have been considered as very vague and indefinite by the learned counsel for the defendant, from the manner in which they have argued the case. When, in the strong, nervous language of my honorable friend, the conduct of the accused has been described in the most appropriate terms in the articles of impeachment; they have treated them with levity, as if they did not understand their import, because they admitted of no serious refutation. The clear explanation of the expression "during good behaviour," and the lucid exposition of this passage contained in the charges themselves, they seem unwilling to comprehend. The commentary is as unintelligible as the text. When to such conduct as was never before witnessed in a court of justice is applied the epithet of novel, we have been told by one counsel that the term is too uncertain to be comprehended—no precise idea can be affixed to it, nor is the language sufficiently technical to constitute a criminal charge. When behaviour the most rude and contumelious, disgraceful on any occasion, but truly degrading on the bench, and unquestionably criminal, because calculated to bring the Judiciary into the lowest contempt, and to excite universal indignation against the tribunals of the country, is portrayed in the impressive style of truth, the age of captious sophistry or technical bigotry is resorted to, for proving there is no sense or meaning in the charge. Upon what an ocean of uncertainty have we embarked when the plainest language is not understood! If sound, solid common sense, were to be confounded by technical jargon, the tower of Babel would not present a greater confusion of tongues. Sir, when the gentlemen cannot but feel the force of these charges, with what admirable ingenuity do they attempt to evade them! Is this tribunal, say they, to erect itself into a court of honor, or assume the chair of chivalry, and form a scale by which decorum and good manners may be nicely graduated? Is every slight deviation from the line of politeness at an assembly or drawing-room to be marked with accuracy and chastised with severity? The testimony furnishes apt and ready answers to those questions. The learned judge is not arraigned because he does not possess the polished manners of an accomplished gentleman, but for outraging all the rules of decency and decorum by conduct at which the plain sense of every honest man would revolt.

I beg this Court seriously to consider whether a judge may not be guilty of acts of misbehaviour inferior in criminality to treason or bribery, for which he ought to be impeached, though no indictment would lay for the same. When gentlemen talk of an indictment being a necessary substratum of an impeachment, I should be glad to be informed in what court it must be supported. In the courts of the United States or in the State courts? If in the State courts, then in which of them? Or, provided it can be supported in any of them, will the act warrant an impeachment? If an indictment must lay in the courts of the United States, in the long catalogue of crimes there are very few which an officer might not commit with impunity. He might be guilty of treason against an individual State, of murder, arson, forgery, and perjury, in various forms, without being amenable to the federal jurisdiction, and unless he could be indicted before them, he could not be impeached! Are we then to resort to the erring data of the different States? In New Hampshire drunkenness may be an indictable offence, but not in another State. Shall an United States judge be impeached and removed for getting intoxicated in New Hampshire, when he may drink as he pleases in another State with impunity? In some States witchcraft is a heinous offence, which subjects the unfortunate person to indictment and punishment; in several other States it is unknown as a crime. A greater variety of cases might be put to expose the fallacy of the principle, and to prove how improper it would be for this Court to be governed by the practice of the different States. The variation of such a compass is too great for it to be relied on. This honorable body must have a standard of their own, which will admit of no change or deviation. The test by which they will try an impeachment cannot be that of indictment. Even in England, to whose practice and whose precedents such constant recourse has been had, the learned counsel have not adduced a single case where a judge of one of their superior courts has been indicted for any misconduct in office. Nay, I believe I may defy them to show an example of the kind. The best authorities tell us they are not subject to indictment, but may be proceeded against by impeachment. They have been impeached, convicted, and punished for giving opinions which they knew to be contrary to law, and for a variety of misdeeds, but never in a solitary instance that I know of have they been indicted. I think I can put so many striking cases of misconduct in a judge, for which it must be admitted that an impeachment will lay, though no indictment could be maintained, that the learned counsel themselves must be compelled at length to surrender this post at discretion, without any terms of capitulation. I will not state the case of a judge wilfully and designedly neglecting to hold a court on the day prescribed by law, for I am aware of the answer gentlemen would give, that it is an offence against a particular provision. But let us suppose Judge Chase, to comply with the forms of the law at the time appointed, should appear and open the court, and notwithstanding there was pressing business to be done, he should proceed knowingly and wilfully to adjourn it until the next stated period. He would be guilty of no violation of any positive law, for which he might be punished by indictment; but ought he not to be impeached? Suppose he proceeded in the despatch of business, and from prejudice against one party, or favor to his antagonist, he ordered on the trial of a cause, though legal grounds are exhibited, for postponement. Is this not a proper subject of impeachment? And yet there is no express law infringed. If when the jury return to the bar to give the verdict, he should knowingly receive the verdict of a majority; is there any positive provision by which a jury shall be composed of twelve men, and that their decision shall be unanimous? I believe even the learning of that profound lawyer (Mr. Martin,) from the reading of laborious years and the indefatigable researches of a life devoted to the pursuit of his profession, could not show any positive provision in the Constitution of the United States or any statute of Congress on the subject. So far from it being originally necessary in civil cases, that a jury should be unanimous, the late Judge Wilson, (a great and venerable authority,) magnum et memorabile nomen, asserts that a majority always decided agreeably to the primary principles of that valuable institution.

Again: there is no man so ignorant as to be insensible to manifest violations of the sanctuary of a court. It was never intended as a stage for the exhibition of pantomimes or plays. Were a judge to entertain the suitors with a farce or a comedy, instead of hearing their causes, and turn a jester or buffoon on the bench, I presume he would subject himself to an impeachment; and yet there is no positive law preventing a court from being converted into a theatre, or of preferring the buskin to the sock: if he should exhibit a tragic scene, in which an unfortunate fellow-citizen might find himself really no actor in the part which he bore, I presume his conduct would claim the attention of the House of Representatives, as the grand inquest of the nation. It must be unnecessary to multiply examples of misconduct in a judge against the known law of his duty, so manifest at first blush that the most callous conscience cannot be insensible to them, not minutely specified and described (for that would be impossible) by particular provision in any Legislative act, but all embraced and comprehended in the solemn oath which he takes to perform his duty faithfully and impartially as a judge. As a judge he is bound to execute the laws. Every opinion which he gives, and every sentence which he passes, must be in conformity to law and be authorized by it. It ought to be the judgment of the law, and not his own individual opinion. If he wilfully make a decree not sanctioned by law, he is guilty of misbehaviour as a judge, for it is a glaring violation of the fundamental principles of his office. I shall have occasion in the course of my argument to advert to judicial opinions delivered by the accused which there was no Legislative act to warrant, no precedent to authorize, no principle to sanction, and which the utmost latitude of legal discretion would not justify. In such a case, if this court be satisfied that he acted innocently wrong, that it was an honest error of judgment which led him astray, he will no doubt stand acquitted. But if, from a concurrence of circumstances, they are convinced that he erred through design, from prejudiced and partial motives, though he may not have been corrupted by a bribe, they will consider him as a proper subject of their jurisdiction, and a proper object for the exercise of their authority.

The doctrines of the learned counsel for the defendant would lead to a conclusion which they may not have contemplated, but which the country would feel. Time would fail me to enumerate the different offences of various grades which a judge might commit, and for which he ought most assuredly to be impeached, though no indictment could be maintained in any of the Federal courts. If their positions were correct, a judge might violate all the Ten Commandments without subjecting himself to impeachment and removal; for I know of no method of removal but through the medium of impeachment. There is no law of the United States prohibiting drunkenness on the bench, or indeed punishing this vice at all, unless we look into the laws of a naval or military court martial, and yet a judge ought certainly to be removed from office if guilty of habitual intoxication. The use of profane or obscene language by a judge is not expressly proscribed by any act of Congress with which I am acquainted, though if it were forbidden in general terms, gentlemen might say with as much propriety as they have done in other cases, in the course of their argument, that every term, considered as such, ought to be enumerated, and yet, I believe, should a judge, in his place, be guilty of taking the name of his God in vain, of cursing and swearing on the bench, or using the obscene language of Billingsgate or St. Giles, he ought to be impeached and removed. The sanctity of a court should be preserved unsullied, and the officer displaced who was capable of exhibiting so shocking an example, calculated to destroy all respect for, and confidence in, the Judicial establishment of the country, and to corrupt the morals of the nation. But, sir, why need I enlarge on this subject? The counsel for the defendant have appeared at one stage of their argument to possess great respect and deference for precedent. To consider cases solemnly argued or deliberately adjudged, as fixing the law so perfectly as to justify a court in absolutely preventing any counsel, even though concerned for a criminal, and that, too, in a capital case, from questioning principles thus established. If precedent will furnish us with a clue to the intricate labyrinth in which they have attempted to involve us, we are in possession of one equal to that of Ariadne.

Suffer me again to refer them to the precedent which I cited a few days since. I allude to the case of Judge Addison, in Pennsylvania. One of the counsel, (Mr. Martin,) for whose legal erudition I feel the greatest respect, has endeavored to impeach the authority of the highest tribunal in that State, and has asked if that decision is to be a precedent for this court? I was the more surprised at this, because his colleague (Mr. Lee) had cited, in the course of his argument, a case from Kirby's Connecticut Reports, decided by Chief Justice Ellsworth and his associates. I ask, sir, in reply, whether, when a case determined in one of the ordinary courts of Connecticut has been produced by the opposite counsel as entitled to consideration, the decision of the Senate of Pennsylvania, the highest court of criminal judicature in that Commonwealth, ought not to be respected. Permit me to add, that in my humble opinion, there is as much propriety in referring to such examples as in recurring to British precedents. I have said, and with increasing confidence I repeat it, that this case, under the constitution of Pennsylvania, is emphatically stronger than the present, under the Constitution of the United States, on the much litigated question, whether a judge can be impeached for any act for which he cannot be indicted. In the constitution of Pennsylvania, article 5th and section 2d, there is a provision not to be found in the Constitution of the United States, by which a judge, for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, may be removed by the Governor, on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature. This provision would seem to be intended to meet the distinction which the learned counsel have labored to establish. In this light, Judge Addison himself on his trial considered it, and pressed the point most forcibly on the Senate of Pennsylvania. He had the strongest interest in so doing. If this course had been pursued, he would have merely lost his office, but upon conviction by impeachment he dreaded the disqualification to hold any office which the Senate might annex to the judgment of removal. But, sir, this is not the only reason, cogent as it is, for considering the case of Judge Addison particularly applicable to the present. It so happens that we have a decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania on the very objection which the gentlemen now take, when the conduct of Judge Addison was brought before them previous to his being impeached. If the learned counsel will not give full faith and credit to the determination of the Senate of Pennsylvania, perhaps they will admit the authority of her supreme court. I hope this tribunal, at least, will give it equal weight with that of the supreme court of Connecticut. A very correct account of the case will be found in the statement of the Attorney General on the trial of Judge Addison, taken in connexion with a printed report of the case, which was produced by Mr. Dallas on that occasion. I will not detain this honorable Court with reading all which is there recorded on this subject, but will refer to pages 51, 52, 64, and 69, of Addison's trial, and endeavor to present them an accurate view of the case.

On the ground of an application filed by J. B. C. Lucas, then an associate judge of the same court in which Judge Addison presided, stating that Judge Addison, on a particular occasion, after having delivered a charge to the grand jury himself, had prevented Judge Lucas from addressing them, by ordering a constable to be sworn and the jury to be taken from the box, the Attorney General moved for leave to file an information against Mr. Addison.

The Attorney General made two points. First, that Judge Lucas had an equal right with the presiding judge to deliver a charge to the grand jury, on principle and authority. The Chief Justice, Shippen, immediately observed, that it was unnecessary to speak to that point or to read authorities, "speak to the second point—Is this conduct the subject of an information?"

After the argument was closed, the opinion of the court (Judge Breckenridge taking no part) was delivered by the Chief Justice, who stated that the proceeding was arbitrary, unbecoming, unhandsome, ungentlemanly, unmannerly, and improper, but "but that it was not indictable, nor the subject of an information," and that there was another remedy. Referring no doubt to an impeachment; for the Attorney General states, in page 52, "That from what fell from the judges of the Supreme Court, when the case was before them, it might be easily inferred that impeachment was the proper mode to correct the evil complained of."

Thus we have the solemn adjudication of the Supreme Court that conduct in a judge may be impeachable though no indictment can be maintained for it. We could not have formed for ourselves a precedent more apposite.

An impeachment was accordingly presented against Judge Addison by the constitutional authority to the Senate of Pennsylvania. Pardon me for trespassing so much on your time as to read distinctly the articles, in order to put this court in possession of the whole case:

"ART. 1. That the said Alexander Addison, being duly appointed and commissioned president of the several courts of common pleas, in the circuit consisting of the said counties of Westmoreland, Fayette, Washington, and Alleghany, within the territory of the said

Commonwealth, while acting as president of the said court of common pleas of the said county of Alleghany, on Saturday, the twenty-eighth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, in open court of common pleas, then and there holden, in and for the county last aforesaid, did, after John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, also duly appointed and commissioned one of the judges of the court of common pleas of the county last aforesaid, had, in his official character and capacity of judge as aforesaid, and as of right he might do, addressed a petit jury, then and there duly empanelled, and sworn or affirmed, respectively, as jurors in a cause then pending, then and there, openly declare and say to the said jury, 'that the address delivered to them by the said John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, had nothing to do with the question before them, and that they ought not to pay any attention to it;' thereby degrading, or endeavoring to degrade and vilify the said John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, and his character and office as aforesaid, to the obstruction of the free, impartial, and due administration of justice, and contrary to the public rights and interests of this Commonwealth.

"ART. 2. That the said Alexander Addison, being duly appointed and commissioned president as aforesaid, did, at a court of quarter sessions of the peace and court of common pleas, holden in and for the county of Alleghany aforesaid, on Monday, the twenty-second day of June, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and one, under the pretence of discharging and performing his official duties as president aforesaid, unjustly, illegally, and unconstitutionally claim, usurp, and exercise authority not given or delegated to him by the constitution and laws of this Commonwealth, inasmuch as he, the said Alexander Addison, president as aforesaid, did, under pretence as aforesaid of discharging and performing his official duties, then and there, in time of open court, unjustly, illegally, and unconstitutionally stop, threaten, and prevent the said John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, also duly appointed and commissioned one of the judges of the said courts, from addressing, as of right he might do, a grand jury of the said county of Alleghany, then and there assembled and empanelled, and sworn or affirmed, respectively, concerning their rights and duties as grand jurors, thereby abusing and attempting to degrade the high offices of president and judge as aforesaid, to the denial and prevention of public right, and of the due administration of justice, and to the evil example of all others in the like case offending."

You have now a clear and comprehensive view of the grounds on which the impeachment was supported. The first charge accuses Judge Addison of speaking, in terms very unjustifiable for a president of a court, of an address delivered to a petit jury by his associate, Judge Lucas. The language which he used, and the manner in which it was proved to have been delivered, are equally exceptionable. His conduct was rude, ungentlemanly, and utterly inconsistent with that decorum and respect which should be inculcated and practised on the bench, to preserve the credit and the character of a court of justice. Its object and tendency was to deter Mr. Lucas from exercising his judgment and expressing his opinion from the bench, and to reduce him to a perfect cypher.

The other charge was, for preventing Judge Lucas from addressing a grand jury. This was effected in the same rude and insolent manner, as will appear from the testimony of Judge Lucas himself, in pages 33 and 37 of the printed trial.

To support the first article, I believe it would not be possible to find any positive act or special provision prescribing what particular language a president of a court may use, and what he shall not, in reference to the opinion which an associate justice may have delivered. There is no legal barometer for weighing words, nor any particular law embracing all the variety of cases of lighter and darker shades which may occur. The learned counsel who supported the prosecution did not cite a single precedent, even, of the kind. There may have been a law to be found in the breast of every man of common sense and common manners, with which Judge Addison was not unacquainted, and upon which the Senate considered themselves perfectly justified in convicting him. This was the general, but clear and comprehensive law, which marked his rights and duties as a judge. The law of his office, prescribed by his oath.

The second article, for preventing an associate judge from delivering a charge to the grand jury, after they had received one from the president of the court, could not have been maintained on the ground of any express statute or legal usage. It is the first time I ever heard of such a case. The uniform practice in the courts to which I have been accustomed is, for the chief justice or president to deliver the charge. This was more especially the case in the court in which Judge Addison presided, for it appears they had adopted a positive rule on the subject. The practice of a court of justice is generally considered as the law of that court. But the Senate, believing on principle (and believing correctly) that the power of all the judges of the court was equal, pronounced a sentence of condemnation.

With these plausible circumstances to counterbalance him, Judge Addison, a gentleman of considerable celebrity both in the legal and political world, and of unquestionable talents, conducted his own defence. His principal reliance was on the very objection which the learned counsel for the present defendant now make. He contended that he had committed no act for which he was liable to indictment, and that he was, therefore, not subject to impeachment. In the position that his conduct was not indictable, he was supported by the opinion of the supreme court, who had, nevertheless, considered it a fit subject for impeachment. His argument was able and ingenious; but, sir, his objection was anticipated or answered in such a masterly manner, by a chain of reasoning so irresistible, that it produced complete conviction on the minds of the Senate of Pennsylvania. This honorable Court know the result. He has been not only removed, but disqualified to hold the office of judge in any court of law in that State. We have, then, the deliberate opinion of the Senate of Pennsylvania, upon solemn argument, confirming the decision made by her supreme court. If these cases do not furnish us with lessons of instruction, I know not where such lessons are to be read.

I will remark, sir, further, in relation to this case, that had it not been for the extreme anxiety of Judge Addison to propagate his political dogmas from the bench, he would never have been reduced to this serious dilemma. Like the defendant, he converted the sacred edifice of justice into a theatre for the dissemination of doctrines to which I hope I shall never subscribe. If I have a desire relative to the administration of justice, paramount to all others, it is that party and party spirit should be banished from every court. My sincere and fervent prayer is, that the laws, like the providence of God, may shed their protecting influence equally over all, without respect to persons or opinions.

I have been requested by the Attorney General of Maryland to state another and a recent case which has happened in Pennsylvania. For his satisfaction I will briefly inform this honorable Court of all that took place on that occasion, in the least degree applicable to the present trial. Three of the judges of their supreme court were accused of fining and imprisoning, without the intervention of a jury, a fellow-citizen, for publishing a paper which they considered as a contempt of court. The judges were defended by two most able and eloquent counsel, who contended that the constitution, the laws and the practice of Pennsylvania, by adopting the common law doctrines on the subject, justified the proceeding; and that if there was no law to justify it, their conduct flowed from an honest error in judgment, for which they were not liable to impeachment. But, sir, they did not attempt to maintain the position contended for on this occasion, that to support an impeachment the conduct of a judge must be such as to subject him to an indictment. Nor could they, with any consistency, have supported such a doctrine, for their clients had before, in the case of Mr. Addison, decided that his conduct was not a proper subject of impeachment though it might be of indictment.

This precedent, then, fortifies the former decisions on this point, and adds another authority to those which previously existed, and to which I have adverted.

The judges were acquitted, I acknowledge, and were I to hazard an opinion, I would say because some of the members of the Senate of Pennsylvania thought their conduct proceeded from an honest error of judgment. If this court shall be of the same opinion with respect to the conduct of Judge Chase, I trust they will follow the precedent and acquit him, and I shall cheerfully acquiesce in the decision.

I fear I shall fatigue this honorable Court by noticing the various cases on this subject, but I cannot omit pressing on their attention a decision of the most authoritative and binding nature, because it is one of their own. The case to which I allude and its attending circumstances must be fresh in the recollection of every member of the Senate. The district judge of New Hampshire was impeached for habitual drunkenness on the bench, and for using profane and indecent language. It was not in evidence to the court that drunkenness or profane and indecent language were indictable by any law of that State. There is no law of the United States, unless we recur to the naval or military code, punishing these vices as offences. Of course, sir, it was not pretended by the Managers on that occasion, of whom I had the honor to be one, that any indictment could be maintained against Judge Pickering in any civil court of the United States, or of the individual State of which he was a citizen. I appeal to your recollection, sir, for the accuracy of this statement; and, let me ask, what was the result? A Constitutional majority of the Senate pronounced a verdict of guilty and passed a judgment of removal.

One of the counsel, (Mr. Harper,) of whose argument I may be permitted to observe, without disparagement to the talents and learning of his colleagues, that it contained an able and masterly defence of the conduct of the accused, sunk beneath the weight of this stubborn and conclusive precedent. It was a stumbling block which he could not remove out of his way; and he seemed compelled, reluctantly, to yield the principle to the decisive authority and pointed application of the case.

We have then the whole weight of American authority in our scale, whilst the learned counsel have not been able to adduce a single precedent, foreign or domestic, against us. When I speak of precedents, I do not allude to the obscure dicta which may be found by turning over the dark lantern of tradition in remote ages of antiquity, or to the interpolations which may be scattered through the marginal references to the abridgments, by unknown editors; but to some authoritative case which has occurred since the regular date of parliamentary impeachments. The fines which Edward I. imposed on some of his judges, in what manner is not certainly known, to replenish, as many have supposed, an exhausted treasury, are familiar to every student. But from the period of impeachment to the present time, I believe no instance of an indictment can be shown against a judge of the Common Pleas, Exchequer, or King's Bench in England, nor against a Lord Keeper or Lord Chancellor, who hold their offices to this day, let it be remembered, during pleasure. The civil business of the Court of Chancery is more important than that of all the other courts, and the decisions of that tribunal have been as impartial I believe as any, notwithstanding the high sounding doctrines of judicial independence. There have been many impeachments, the judges have sometimes been complained of by information in the execrable Star Chamber, but there have been no indictments at law. The Star Chamber has been long since abolished, and the sole method of proceeding against judges of the superior court now is by impeachment. The best writers agree, "that judges of record are freed from all presentations whatever, except in Parliament, where they may be punished for anything done by them in such courts as judges." Numerous authorities might be cited on this subject, but I shall content myself with barely referring to them.—1 Hawk. 192, chap. 73, sec. 6; 1 Salk. 396; Woodeson 596, Jacob's Law Dictionary, title Judges, 12 Co. 25, 26.

Were I to rest the point here, I confidently believe we should be perfectly safe, but I will proceed further, agreeably to my engagement, in the commencement of my argument, and demonstrate that according to their own principles, and authorities, Judge Chase has been guilty of crimes and misdemeanors, in the strictest technical sense of the terms, for which he ought to be punished in an exemplary manner.

In contesting the principles that no act is impeachable unless it also be indictable, I have not contended for the position attributed to me by the learned Attorney General of Maryland, that a judge may be impeached for conduct which is not criminal. On the contrary, we rely on supporting this as a criminal proceeding, and the gentlemen are entitled to every advantage which they can reap from this declaration.

I have had occasion to state that I considered every act of misbehaviour in a judge as a misdemeanor, and the Attorney General of Maryland has expressed in strong terms his perfect agreement in the opinion, that misbehaviour is synonymous with misdemeanor. He appeared to imagine that he gained a great advantage by making this concession, and I am content to give him the full benefit to be derived from it. I shall not shrink from the position, but meet the gentleman with pleasure and confidence on this ground. I love to break a lance in the open field of discussion, and disdain every kind of ambush in argument.

As we agree in one point, that misbehaviour and misdemeanor are convertible terms, Jacob's Law Dictionary, which quotes the language of Judge Blackstone in his commentaries, has been recurring to for a definition of a misdemeanor. Let us try the conduct of Judge Chase by his text. "A crime or misdemeanor (says Judge Blackstone) is an act committed or omitted, in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it." "This general definition comprehends both crimes and misdemeanors, which properly speaking are mere synonymous terms."

There is a public law that prescribes the following oath which Judge Chase took on his entrance into office; 1 vol. p. 53. "I do solemnly swear, that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially perform all the duties incumbent on me as a judge of the Supreme Court, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Who that reads this solemn and impressive provision, and looks at the plenary evidence we have before us, can hesitate to pronounce the respondent guilty of violating a public law, which he was bound by the most sacred of all human obligation, to execute with fidelity? His oath informed him that the law, like the Gospel, was no respecter of persons, and yet what have we beheld in his conduct, when a poor, unfortunate Fries, or a wretched Callender was before him, upon a criminal charge? I appeal to the testimony which I shall by and by comment upon, whether his acts do not prove that he marked them out as victims to be sacrificed on the altar of party. Sir, I cannot believe that gentlemen will seriously contend that the expressions "faithfully and impartially to perform his duties," have no definite meaning; that conduct grossly prejudiced, and the most shameless partiality, shall be considered as no violations of his solemn oath. If they did, I have too exalted an opinion of the good sense and discernment of the court to believe they would countenance such an idea. Their import is certainly plain and obvious, without recurring to the black-lettered lore for explanation. What, then, was the conduct of the respondent to Fries, if testimony not only unimpeached but unimpeachable is to be believed? Was he not prejudiced both against the unhappy prisoner and his case, which he had from a superabundance of zeal completely prejudged? Or, sir, when he declared Callender ought to be hung, and set off with his miserable pamphlet in his pocket, ready scored for his purpose, and proceeded in the most arbitrary manner with his trial, was he impartial, or was he not guilty of the most manifest and daring partiality? Shall he be guilty of all these outrages against the plain language of a public statute, which combines the obligation of an oath with the sanction of a law, and yet be innocent of any crime or misdemeanor? If gentlemen will hold up the acts of Congress in one hand, and the acts of Judge Chase, proved by the testimony, in the other, they will see and be satisfied, that within the strictest legal definition he has been guilty of repeated and aggravated violations of public law, and therefore unquestionably of crimes and misdemeanors.

The Constitution, however, is declared to be emphatically the supreme law of the land. This sacred instrument he was bound by a twofold oath to preserve inviolate. All executive and judicial officers of the United States, independent of their oaths of office, are bound by oath to support the Constitution—Art. 6, sec. 3.

By the seventh article of the amendments of the Constitution, which have been duly ratified, and therefore now form part of that instrument, it is declared, that "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

This article secures to every accused individual the right of a trial by an impartial jury. Without their unanimous consent, no matter how eager the Government are for conviction, no person can be punished. Where any man is charged in due form with the commission of a crime, and pleads he is not guilty, the jury are to decide on the whole case whether he be innocent or not. Their verdict must be commensurate with the issue joined, which involves both fact and law, which they have indubitably the right to decide, agreeably to the express and positive provision of the Constitution. This right, therefore, is an original right, flowing from the highest authority. It is beyond doubt a principle and not an incidental right. It is not a right incidental to the trial, but it constitutes the trial itself; for there can be no other trial in the case but by jury.

This same amendment guaranties to the accused the assistance of counsel. How important is this privilege, when it is recollected that veterans of the bar are generally selected to prosecute. The situation too of an innocent man, charged with the commission of a crime, is delicate and embarrassing. It excites frequently apprehensions which unfit him for making a defence. I feel myself compelled to declare, upon the authority of the testimony in this case, that the respondent has been proved guilty of violating the supreme law of the land in those great essential provisions. He has deprived accused individuals of a trial by jury, for he would not suffer the jury to decide, or even to hear argument on the subject of the law, and he has deprived them of the benefit of counsel by conduct which drove counsel from the bar. This has happened in more than one instance, and above all, an injured fellow-citizen has been stripped of his invaluable privileges in a capital case. Is this imagination or is it reality? Let the recorded testimony determine. If, however, I am correct, must I not have satisfied this honorable Court, agreeably to my promise, that taking the learned counsel's own definition, and relying upon his authorities, I have demonstrated that the accused has been guilty of crimes and misdemeanors. But have I not gone further, and shown that he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, and such as disqualify him for a seat on the bench, so as to come fully within the rule which he has laid down?

God forbid that it should be said, when a judge is guilty of grossly violating not merely a public law, but the supreme law of the land, nay, a law which he was bound by two solemn oaths to support, he is not guilty of any crime or misdemeanor; or that when he violated this supreme law which he is thus obligated to respect, for the purpose of depriving a fellow-citizen, accused of a capital crime, of the benefit of counsel, and the inestimable right of trial by jury, he shall not be declared guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, which evince a want of integrity, and mark a depravity of heart that completely disqualify him for a judicial office.

I have now finished my observations in reply to the preliminary objections which have been made to this mode of proceeding, and have been reluctantly compelled to discuss them at much greater length than I at first contemplated, from the zeal and pertinacity with which they have been urged and insisted on by the learned counsel opposed to us. Under the impression that I have been successful in this undertaking, I shall hasten to the investigation of the articles themselves.

Trial of Judge Chase.

To the observations which have already fallen from me on the subject of the technical refined exceptions that have been taken to the language of the articles, I shall only add a remark or two in reply to what fell from one of the counsel, (Mr. Lee,) when commenting on the 5th and 6th articles.

He appeared to consider the House of Representatives bound down to the same strict and technical forms required in the ordinary courts of justice. Even there I believe suitors are too often caught in this miserable net, which is calculated to hold a shadow and let the substance escape. But the legal maxim, if I am correctly informed, applicable to impeachments, is, that they whose duty it is to present them, may speak in plain, common language, loquendum ut vulgus—Foster 389, 90; 2 Woodes. Lect. 607. I believe if we were to try the articles either by the test of technical nicety, or the standard of common sense, they would be found on examination correct in form and substance. The articles particularly excepted to charge the respondent with committing acts in violation of certain public laws of the United States, either enacted by Congress or adopted by their statutes. If this be not a sufficient allegation of criminality, I know not what would constitute an offence. Suppose an act of Congress were made to punish an assault or battery committed in any place within their exclusive jurisdiction, and an indictment were to state the fact to have been committed, and allege that it was done against the act in such case made and provided, it would certainly be held sufficient in any court of criminal judicature in the United States.

In examining the various articles of accusation, I will consume no more of your valuable time than the intrinsic importance of the subject absolutely requires. I am not standing in an ordinary court of justice. I do not consider myself arguing a case before an honest, but perhaps an unlettered jury. I feel myself addressing an enlightened tribunal, composed of venerable and illustrious characters, who add to the native virtue of integrity, that intelligence and knowledge which is acquired by the study and experience of years. I am sensible that I am addressing those more capable of communicating information to me than I am of instructing them.

The case of poor Fries, embraced by the first article, presents a melancholy picture; of which I must solicit you, painful as the object may be, to take a view. From this gloomy spectacle you would naturally desire to avert your eyes, and I could wish for the honor of human nature that it had never been exhibited. But your duty compels you to contemplate it, whilst mine compels me to portray it.

In justice to my early acquaintance, (Mr. Hopkinson,) who defended the respondent against this charge, I must observe, that the task assigned him was performed with great ability and address. But my learned friend, (Mr. Nicholson,) in reply to his observations, presented such a clear exposition of the facts, and such a sound commentary on the law applicable to this article, that I am sensible he must have removed the great mountain of objections which overshadowed for a time this part of the case. My share of duty is therefore considerably diminished. It only remains for me to add a brick or two to the wall which he has erected, and to answer some of the remarks of the learned Attorney General of Maryland, and his eloquent colleagues, Mr. Harper and Mr. Key.

On questions of fact I shall rely principally on the admissions contained in the answer, and shall not detain this Court with adverting to the volume of evidence which has been taken, unless where the respondent has thought proper to deny any material part of a charge. I believe his own answer confesses substantially the truth and correctness of the principal facts on which the articles rest. This Court will require no stronger evidence, I presume, than the admissions of the party, deliberately recorded by himself. When he denies facts, it is his duty to support such denial by the necessary proofs. But taking the answer altogether, though a masterly performance in point of style and language, in my humble opinion, it gives a death wound to his case.

It appears that Fries had been tried in the year 1799, before Judges Iredell and Peters, and convicted of the crime of high treason. His counsel afterwards moved for a new trial, on the ground that one of the jury had been prejudiced against him. That he had not in fact been an impartial juror in the case. The court, consisting of the same judges, upon argument, ordered a new trial to be had. A new trial, according to the best authorities, is "a rehearing of the cause before another jury, but with as little prejudice to either party as if it had never been heard before." In this light Judge Chase should have considered it. He ought to have gone to Pennsylvania with a mind totally unprejudiced, and viewed every circumstance of the case with the utmost impartiality. The very circumstance which produced the second trial ought to have put him sufficiently on his guard. When a new trial has been directed, to use the language of the respondent in his answer, "solely on the ground 'that one of the jury' (a single man out of twelve) 'after he was summoned, but before he was sworn on the trial, had made some declarations unfavorable to the prisoner,'" how ought an impartial judge to have felt and to have acted? Mr. Chase, let it be recollected, presided in a court composed of but two members. With this lesson before his eyes, we find the respondent forming an opinion in his closet on the law of treason, applicable to the case of poor Fries, and not satisfied with making up his own mind on this subject, he took care to bind the judgment of his associate, by obtaining his approbation of that opinion, which he reduced to writing for the purpose. This irregular and reprehensible measure was adopted before the hour of trial arrived, when the man whose life was at stake was to be heard on a subject that involved his existence. This bold step in the path to conviction, has been defended on plausible grounds, and by subtle refinements.

The respondent in his answer and the learned counsel in their defence have endeavored to prove that this conduct was not only right, but perfectly proper and correct. Among the various pretexts eagerly laid hold of to justify this novel procedure, they urge as a reason for prejudging and despatching a capital case, the multiplicity of civil business pending in the same court! I will forbear to inquire into the facts on this point, though I believe there is not a spark of testimony to prove the allegation to its full extent, because, if the docket had been loaded with civil suits, it would form no excuse for hurrying though a criminal trial, on the issue of which the life of a fellow-citizen depended. That cause must be bad indeed that requires to be propped by such miserable expedients. When I first read this passage in the answer, it struck me with astonishment, and excited a burst of indignation which it is my duty to repress. "A multitude of civil business" is depending, and therefore I must make up my mind conclusively on the law in a capital case, before the proper season arrives, without hearing a single word from the prisoner or his counsel in defence!" The learned judge certainly did not reflect on the effect of such an excuse, which instead of palliating his conduct, aggravates it. That he was in a great hurry, every part of his conduct proves. From the opinion, a copy of which is annexed to his answer, it would appear that he did not intend to make it public, at least until after the jury had been sworn and Fries was on his trial. In that we find these expressions: "The court heard the indictment read on the arraignment of the prisoner some days past, and just now on his trial, and they attended to the overt acts stated in the indictment."

This honorable Court will recollect that the whole current of the testimony proves, and the defendant in his answer admits, that he delivered the papers containing this ex parte opinion before Fries's trial commenced. Such was his eagerness to despatch the case, with a view, he says, of reaching expeditiously the civil list. As if gifted with the spirit of intuition and with an infallible judgment, he seems not to have proceeded on the principle of castigatque auditque, but to have improved even upon that model, considering it not necessary for him to hear arguments at any stage of a cause, for the purpose of forming a correct opinion. His counsel ask us whether it be a fault in a judge to have a profound knowledge of the law, which will enable him to decide promptly any question that may occur; and the respondent said, on Fries's trial, that "he had an opinion in point of law as to every case which could be brought before the court, or else he was not fit to sit there." Yet, when Callender's trial was progressing, we find this same judge, upon a common point of practice relative to a challenge to the jury, calling out for Coke on Lyttleton to be brought into court before he could make up his mind on the subject.

Sir, I hope always to see more of profound legal erudition and extensive information on the bench. A rational diffidence in their own opinions is the result and the companion of knowledge. Characters of this description, who combine integrity and impartiality, qualities essential for a judge, with their learning, will never form and deliver an extra judicial opinion. They will adopt the maxim, audi alteram partem, in their practice. If judges act correctly and properly in deciding the law in a single case, without hearing both sides, the principle will hold good in all cases. Every issue of pure, unmixed law ought to be thus decided. Demurrers, special verdicts, and motions in arrest of judgment, instead of being determined in open court on solemn argument, should be decided by the judges in their closets. Cases in error, removed up to the higher tribunal for the purpose of correcting the mistakes of inferior jurisdictions, would of course be adjudged without argument. The court would only have to meet to deliver the opinions in public, which they had formed in their chambers. Surely when gentlemen contend it was correct in the respondent in a criminal case, when law was blended with fact, and the life of the accused involved in the issue, they must advocate in civil causes, where from the nature of the pleadings, the fact is separated from the law, the practice of their own principle. I agree it would save time and some expense in obtaining decisions, but would causes be decided as justly and satisfactorily?

I have before stated, and endeavored to prove by the letter and spirit of the Constitution, that in all criminal cases the jury have an established right to decide the law as well as the fact. The respondent, whose actions do not always correspond with his declarations, in the charge delivered before they retired from the bar, to the jury who convicted Fries, uses the following language: "But the jury are to decide in the present, and in all criminal cases, both the law and the fact."

It cannot therefore be necessary for me to repeat the same answer to the maxim that has been suggested, ad questiones facti respondent juratores, ad questiones legis respondent iudices, which Lord Chief Justice Vaughan, on a memorable occasion, gave to the counsel of his day; a very good maxim, but often very improperly applied. It is referable to these cases solely when the law and fact by the pleadings are separated, as in the case of demurrers and special verdicts. It has not the most remote application to criminal cases, on the issue of not guilty, which necessarily blends law and fact together. A pure, unmixed question of law never came before a jury, it is always mingled with fact, and must depend upon the testimony. In such a case the judge cannot give any positive directions of law on the trial; for the law can only arise out of facts, and the judge cannot know what the facts are until the jury have given their verdict. Lord Hale, a great authority in criminal law, also observes, that "it is the conscience of the jury that must pronounce a prisoner guilty or not guilty; for to say the truth, it were the most unhappy case that could be to the judge, if he at his peril must take upon him the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, unhappy also for the prisoner; for if the judge's opinion must rule the verdict, the trial by jury would be useless." I think I tread on ground which can neither be removed nor shaken, when I assert the unqualified right of the jury in Fries's trial to decide the law equally with the fact, because, added to all the rest, I have the respondent's own authority in support of the position.

Suppose then that Judge Chase had not been so eager and in such great haste to display the offspring of his profound legal reflections. That he had been patient enough to wait as he originally designed, as appears in his answer, "until after the petit jury should have been empanelled and heard the indictment read to them by the clerk," and the jury, "before the district attorney should have stated to them the law on the overt acts alleged in the indictment as it appeared to him," had presented a set of papers to the court and counsel on each side, containing their decided opinions of the law; that the overt acts stated in the indictment did not amount to treason agreeably to the Constitution. That they would not have this law controverted, nor suffer any cases of construction in the British statutes to be cited. I presume the learned judge would scarcely have brooked such conduct in the jury, though the case is parallel with his own. He declares himself that the jury had a right to decide the law in that cause, and they would only have done what he himself did do, decided it without argument, having made up their minds at home, after hearing the indictment read on the prisoner's arraignment. Had the jury adopted this conduct, which I fear the judge could not have tolerated, and had they persisted in it, the prisoner must have been acquitted, against the predetermined opinion of the court. Sir, notwithstanding the observation of Mr. Harper, that the court refused to grant a new trial in criminal cases in favor of life from motives of humanity, and not because they have not the power if they choose to exercise it, I must beg leave most explicitly to deny this position. The court possess no such authority, nor have they ever attempted it in a single case within my recollection, and certainly the learned counsel produced no example of the kind. Besides, the defendant states in his answer, that "he well knows that it is the right of juries in criminal cases, to give a verdict of acquittal which cannot be set aside on account of its being contrary to law."

To bring the case home to the business and bosom of the respondent, let us suppose that when he first appeared before this honorable Court, surrounded by the able and eminent counsel which the laws and humanity afford him, you, Mr. President, had presented to his advocates a paper containing the predetermined opinion of a Constitutional majority of the Senate, that if the facts contained in the articles of impeachment were substantiated by proof, that the respondent was guilty in law of high crimes and misdemeanors, for which he ought to be removed from office and disqualified to hold any other under the United States, would he not have said, and with great justice too, that you had prejudged his case? The refined distinctions so eloquently urged to excuse his own conduct, would have vanished the moment the reality was experienced. The splendor of his sophisms, which have sometimes almost dazzled our eyes, would have been obscured by his own feelings. The instant the case was made his own, his conduct would have furnished us with all the evidence and all the arguments that would have been required. Had this court acted in such a manner, it would have given the respondent a volume of explanation on the subject of prejudging the law, which one of his counsel (Mr. Hopkinson) has stated he did not understand. But, thank Heaven, this tribunal has treated the respondent with that indulgence which is due to individuals in his situation. They have given him the full benefit of our equal laws. They have acted upon the humane and benevolent principles of our code, which presumes every man innocent until he is proved to be guilty. The laboring oar is on our side, and unless we satisfy the Senate by plenary evidence of his guilt, they must and will, I trust, acquit him.

The examples of Lord Chief Justice Eyre and of Judge Iredell, in the charges which they have delivered to the grand juries, have been referred to, for the purpose of shielding the respondent. The cases are utterly dissimilar, and bear no analogy or resemblance to each other. Their charges contain a general definition or description of those offences which come under the cognizance of a grand inquest. When they do advert from peculiar circumstances to particular cases, the opinions they express are always subject to correction; for whoever heard of a judge refusing to permit the counsel for an accused individual to controvert any doctrines delivered in his charge to a grand jury? This was not the conduct of Lord Chief Justice Eyre or Judge Iredell. Whatever sentiments they may have expressed in their charges, they were open to conviction, and permitted the counsel to indulge themselves in all the latitude of argument they considered necessary to their client's defence. Would to God, that the respondent had imitated the examples which his own counsel have held up to our view!

As the learned judge had formed this ex parte opinion, to which he was determined to adhere, his advocates make a merit of his revealing it at the period he did, and they inform us that he might have kept it locked up in his own bosom, of which he alone kept the key, and have divulged it when it was too late to counteract it. But the express purpose of opening the budget was, to prevent the counsel from controverting the points. For the defendant, in his answer, expressly says: "The court held itself bound by the former decisions, and would not therefore alter its opinions in consequence of any arguments." Without this precious confession, we well know the effect of bias on the human mind. Such is its peculiar mechanism and constitution, that when an opinion is once formed on any subject, it is extremely difficult to correct it, though erroneous. When once, therefore, the judgment was rivetted against the prisoner, before the season of exertion in his behalf comes round, the tongues of angels would have been insufficient for the task of changing it.

The aid of precedent has been called in to justify this wide departure from principle, and it is contended that the opinion was correct in point of law. My honorable friend (Mr. Randolph) has detected and exposed the fallacy of this species of justification. I will remark that a great and respectable character (Lord Mansfield) has observed, that he is a most unrighteous and wicked judge who decides without hearing both sides—even when he decides correctly—because his judgment is the effect of chance or accident, and not the result of a fair, full, and impartial investigation. Precedents, let me observe, do not make the law, they are merely evidence of it; nor is the law to be absolutely decided by precedents, judicandum est legibus, non exemplis. "If a judge conceives that a judgment given by a former court is erroneous, he ought not in conscience to give the like judgment, he being sworn to judge according to law," says Lord Chief Justice Vaughan. But Judge Chase declares that, had he differed in opinion from former precedents, even in a capital case, he should have held himself bound by them. But here let me ask what are those precedents to which he subscribes? It is not my intention to go at full length into the discussion of them, or comment at large on the law of treason. My object is, on this interesting occasion, to enter a solemn protest against doctrines which would entail on us all the constructive treasons of another country, and to assign in a few words the reasons of my opinion. I am not to be deterred from my duty by the assertion that no counsel of eminence would controvert the principles laid down by the respondent in his ex parte opinion, more especially when characters of such high standing at the bar as Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, have honorably and conscientiously opposed such monstrous doctrines. The Western insurrection in Pennsylvania was materially different from the momentary disturbances in the counties of Bucks and Northampton. The precedents which arose from one could not be applicable to the other, and the cases of Mitchell and Vigol, which have been cited, are readily distinguished from that of Fries.

In the first, the combination was formed and organized to seize all records and papers, and to destroy all offices, to expel all officers in the whole survey. The insurgents traversed the country armed, seized papers, attacked offices, and drove officers out of the country.

They seized and imprisoned the marshal, who escaped and returned to Philadelphia by a circuitous route.

They assembled at Cooche's fort, consulted on the attack upon Colonel Neville's house, marched thither in military array, summoned him to surrender by a flag, set fire to his house, and destroyed his records. They assembled at Braddock's field; deliberated on taking the garrison at Pittsburg; marched thither with that avowed object; but finding the garrison prepared for defence they filed off.

They assembled after the proclamation, and after the militia were ordered to march. They avowed an intention to resist. They compelled the Government to negotiate. The leaders, Bradford and Marshal, fled on the approach of the army, and the insurgents generally accepted the terms of amnesty, as in a case of treason. The army was, however, maintained for sometime in the country.

In the last, the people were illiterate, ignorant of the laws and language. They did not conspire to act themselves, but to prevent particular inferior officers from acting, by making the assessments in particular townships.

They acted like a mob, in obstructing the progress of the officers by threats, hooting, &c., and once they took an officer's tax list or papers, but immediately returned them.

They assembled expressly to release or rescue a particular set of prisoners whom they called their neighbors.

They rescued the prisoners, and withdrew without injuring or attempting to injure the marshal, or the tax officers who were at Bethlehem.

They never suggested the idea of resisting the army. They dispersed as soon as the proclamation was issued, and they never met afterwards.

The distinctions are striking and obvious.

In the insurrection of 1794, the object was general; in the riot of 1799, it was particular.

In 1794, the insurgents acted as assailants; the rioters of 1799 stood on the defensive, and only obstructed the officers in attempting to act.

In 1794, the design of attacking a fort and resisting the army was deliberately formed, and overt acts committed to carry it into effect; in 1799, the idea of attacking or resisting the military power of the Government never was suggested.

In 1794, the sedition act had not provided for combinations to impede the execution of a particular law: In 1799 that act was in existence.

In 1794, the outrage extended to the seizure of the marshal to prevent his executing any process. In 1799, it was confined to the release of a particular set of friends and neighbors.

The precedents, therefore, of Mitchell and Vigol, which have been so much relied upon, did not, I humbly submit, apply to the case of poor Fries. But the defendant has dwelt much on the opinion expressed by Judge Iredell, in his charge to the petit jury on the former trial of Fries, notwithstanding the verdict was set aside, which was given on that occasion, and Judge Chase should have proceeded on the second trial, as little prejudiced by any opinions on the former, as if such trial had never taken place. It appears from the testimony of Mr. Dallas, that so confident was he of the broad difference between the cases of 1794 and 1799, that in the first trial he did not advert to the former, little suspecting that they would be considered as precedents for the latter. When he found, by the charge of Judge Iredell, that he did unexpectedly rely upon them, his intention was, in the second trial, to direct his arguments to the manifest distinctions between them. In this, however, he was disappointed by the arbitrary conduct of the defendant. Under these circumstances, can this case be considered binding and obligatory; or, is a single precedent to make the law, and absolutely prevent counsel from controverting it?

The learned judge bolsters up his opinion by stating that, it is in conformity to the uniform opinion of British judges since the Revolution of 1688. But these judges were bound by all the precedents which had previously occurred. And is every baneful exotic to be thus transplanted into our soil? If they are, I trust, however they may flourish in their native land, they may wither and die in our clime. The Constitution defines treason, and to that instrument alone we should look for a complete description of the crime. Those illustrious characters who formed it, no doubt supposed they gained a great point in thus ascertaining with precision the offence. The precedent, Montesquieu justly observes, for the crime of high treason to be indeterminate or uncertain, is of itself sufficient to make any Government despotic. The text of our Constitution is sufficiently plain without any British glossary. Let me earnestly recommend, on this point, without reading them myself, the perusal of the observations of a learned and excellent judge (Mr. Tucker) the pure ermine of whose character is not sullied by a single stain, contained in his edition of Blackstone's Commentaries. On this American stock shall we ingraft every scion which we can procure from the luxuriant upas of England? No, sir; I trust there will be found independent judges who will prune away such unnatural branches, and restore the original purity to the Constitution.

The Court will indulge me, at this stage, with a few observations in reply to the authority from Keelyng, cited by one of the counsel (Mr. Hopkinson) and which I had nearly omitted. They must have been extremely pressed when they had recourse to this case, where the Judges, the Attorney General, and the Solicitor General for the Crown met together in conclave to decide the fate of those accused of treason. Need I remind this intelligent Senate that this shameful transaction, this gross prostitution of justice, took place before the Revolution, and just after the restoration of Charles II., when pliant judges were selected to bring to punishment the innocent as well as the guilty. The island of Great Britain was at that period a common slaughter-house. Such was the savage thirst of the Government for blood, that they persecuted persons who had fled to the remotest parts of the earth. Is it not surprising that conduct, pursued at a time when proscription was the order of the day, should be produced, to justify the respondent? It proves vastly too much. It evinces that, if precedents in evil times are to be implicitly followed, there is no offence, however great, no conduct, however flagrant, which may not be sanctioned and supported. But, sir, to produce a case which happened before the Revolution of 1688, to excuse the conduct of a judge who refused to hear authorities read prior to that period, is, I must confess, a singular incident in this trial. Independent of the consideration that the court themselves had thus predetermined the case of the unfortunate Fries, what must have been the effect on the minds of the jury summoned on the panel, who were present when this ex parte and extra-judicial opinion was published to them and to the world? The agitation produced at the bar has been described by the witnesses in such a manner, that you are capable of contemplating the sum, and of estimating the fatal effects which it must have necessarily produced in the case of the prisoner.

I contend, therefore, from the respondent's confession, and the testimony, that he is guilty of the first specification contained in this article; that he unfairly, and in violation of the plainest rule of duty, prejudged the case of Fries, without any reasonable excuse, much less justification for so doing.

Not contented with prejudging the cause and prejudicing the minds of the jury who were to try the issue, he proceeded still further, with adventurous strides on untrodden ground. Apprehensive that a single ray of argument must dispel the mist which he had raised, he determines that the counsel assigned by the court themselves shall not controvert before the jury the opinion delivered in writing. They were directed to address themselves to the court, who would not, if we believe Judge Chase himself, in his answer, alter their opinion on the subject. And yet the respondent admits the undoubted right of the jury to decide both law and fact.

It appears, from the history we have received of the case, that the counsel for Fries, knowing that the Attorney for the United States would rely on cases decided in England since the Revolution, wished to trace them to their origin. It is a fact which will not be disputed, even by the respondent, that, since the Revolution, the British judges have held themselves bound by the authority of cases previously decided. Sensible, then, that the determinations which resulted from the sanguinary precedents which the rude decisions of barbarous ages had established, would be urged against their client, the counsel for Fries desired to go to the fountain head, to expose the poisonous source from which such streams flowed. Is there any member of this Court who can, for a moment, hesitate to pronounce their conduct correct on this point? Judge Iredell, whose example has been quoted, on the former trial, permitted it to be done.

The advocates of Fries wished also to draw arguments in favor of the defence from some of the acts of Congress, particularly from the sedition law, as it is commonly called. Mark the objection of the respondent: "Treason is defined in the Constitution. We can pay no respect to the opinion of the representatives of the people of the United States on this subject. We will not hear them. Much time was wasted on the former

Trial of Judge Chase.

'trial by citing and commenting on the statutes of Congress.' The opinions, however, of three or four British judges are entitled to great weight and consideration. Judges who never read or heard of our Constitution, but who paid the debt of nature before it existed. But the deliberate opinion of both Houses of Congress, and the President of the United States, evidenced by a solemn Legislative act defining and punishing the very offence, in my humble opinion, which Fries had committed, was not to weigh a feather in the scale. It might reasonably be supposed that the acts of Congress, though not received as authoritative and decisive of the question, would be respected, and no person could have imagined that counsel were not to be permitted to read them. The Legislative body contained, at that time, characters well versed in Constitutional lore. The sentiments of men, however well acquainted with the provisions of the Constitution, as a matter of study and of duty, were not to be expressed before a jury, to decide law and fact, for the purpose of informing their consciences on legal topics. I will not detain you, by citing cases to prove that acts of the Legislature have been frequently received to assist the judgment even when deciding on a Constitutional question. An able and upright statesman (Mr. Madison) has declared at an early period of the Government, "that as to a doubtful part of the Constitution, an exposition, may come with as much propriety from the Legislature as any other department of Government." The wisdom of judges has not always been thought so paramount to that of legislators, that they would not even hear their opinions. But, then, Fries was before the court, it was perfectly irrelevant and highly improper to refer to an authority so inconsistent with the closet opinion of the court. I have generally understood, in the little experience I have had in courts of justice, that opinions given without argument are never to be relied on, and I question whether any counsel in any court of justice, except where the respondent presided, would think of producing as authority, the singular document, prepared in his chamber, in a case which he had never heard argued. His able defenders assert (in the very face of his own declaration, that his opinion could not be changed by any arguments) that the respondent was willing to hear the counsel for Fries. Such is the testimony of a witness, Mr. E. Tilghman, whose candor and impartiality are beyond the reach of suspicion, and to whom I give the most implicit credit. The learned judge did observe that, "nevertheless, counsel should be heard." Considering that he was resolutely determined never to change his written opinion, one would suppose he might have agreed that they should range as widely as they pleased through the field of argument, and could have safely permitted them to talk until they were satisfied. This, however, was not the fact. They were to be heard in his own way and on his own terms. His memorable expressions in relation to the cases which the counsel for the accused wished to cite and to apply, must be recollected by this Court: "What!

cases from Rome, Turkey, or France!" In this emphatic manner did he persevere in preventing any recurrence to the rotten foundation on which the authority that the learned judge considered as conclusive was built. Was this imitating the conduct of Lord Chief Baron Eyre? Let any gentleman peruse the trials of the honest Hardy, the upright Tooke, and independent Thelwall, and he will be struck with the difference of conduct. Throughout those trials the court leaned to the side of the prisoners, as if, in the benevolent language of the law, they really were counsel for the accused. They manifested a becoming indulgence to the celebrated characters concerned for them, and when Mr. Erskine, that distinguished ornament of the bar, who is not more justly admired for his shining talents than his inflexible unblemished integrity, by some animated observations which proceeded from the warmth natural in an honest cause, excited the feelings of the Solicitor General, the President of the court complimented him for the zeal and ability which he displayed in the cause of his clients. Messrs. Lewis and Dallas both declare expressly that the respondent said that they must address themselves to the court and not to the jury. I acknowledge that neither Mr. Tilghman nor Mr. Rawle, for whose characters I feel the greatest respect, recollect this particular fact, but surely this cannot operate against the positive testimony of two witnesses; for though there may be an apparent contradiction to a superficial observer, there is no real difference between them. On the subject of positive and negative testimony, let me refer this Court to what has already happened in the course of this very trial, where the advocates on both sides are attentively taking notes of everything which is said. The gentleman who closed the defence (Mr. Harper) mentioned that one of the Managers had stated that an impeachment was merely an inquest of office. I believe there is not a Manager who recollects that such an observation was made (unless it may be the gentleman who made it) and yet there is not one of us who does not believe that it was actually made. It is precisely the same case with respect to the testimony of Messrs. Dallas and Lewis. There cannot be any exception taken, on this point, to their evidence merely because the other witnesses have not the fact impressed on their recollections: Let me observe, further, that Messrs. Dallas and Lewis particularly state that Judge Chase absolutely declared that the acts of Congress should not be read; the same remarks, which have just been made, will apply to Messrs. Tilghman and Rawle's not recollecting that fact. By the Constitution every accused individual is entitled to the benefit of being heard by counsel. If the court will not permit the jury to hear, or the counsel to speak, any language which they do not approve, they deprive the accused at one and the same time of the right of trial by jury, and of the privilege of being heard by counsel. The learned judge states that the jury have an undoubted right to decide both law and fact, but in the same breath declares that he is to be the exclusive judge of what is law.

Trial of Judge Chase.

This really reminds me of the story of the sailor in the play of the Tempest, who agreed that his comrade should be the Viceroy over the island provided he were Viceroy over him. As it relates to the counsel you may as effectually deprive a prisoner of this benefit by preventing their speaking on the points which they conceive material to the defence, or by a rude course of overbearing, insulting conduct toward them, which will totally disqualify them for the task, as if you were to nail their lips or clap a padlock on their mouths. Such was the conduct pursued by the respondent in Fries's case that, I hesitate not to pronounce him, on the strength of the facts, guilty of depriving the unfortunate prisoner of the benefit of counsel, and the jury of their Constitutional right. I do not contend that counsel should be permitted to read on a trial anything they please—an idle tale, a novel, or a farce—totally irrelevant to the issue; but I assert and maintain their undoubted right, in the case of Fries, to read and comment at large before the jury on the statutes of Congress, and on those old precedents from which the modern ones sprang, like shoots from a parent stock, which they earnestly wished and desired.

When deprived of their Constitutional privileges they would not degrade the independent character of the profession by becoming the servile instruments of the court. They disdained going through the mockery of a trial, that their client might be hung according to form; and they retired with indignation from a tribunal which had reduced them to this distressing alternative. For this laudable conduct the Attorney General of Maryland has been pleased to say, they ought to have been instantly committed to prison. What, sir! Send counsel to jail for insisting on their Constitutional right to address the jury at large on the law in a criminal case, and on a trial for high treason, and for withdrawing when compelled, by conduct unequalled in the annals of jurisprudence, to abandon the cause of their client, and suffer professional ignominy and disgrace! So far am I from subscribing to this extraordinary opinion, that I think the gentlemen who defended Fries deserved a civic garland or a laurel wreath, for their manly firmness and dignified independence. I was sorry, sir, to hear from the lips of a learned and respectable witness (Judge Winchester) that, in Maryland, it is the uniform practice in criminal cases to take the judgment of the court on points of law, and that although counsel seriously differed from them in opinion, it would be thought a high breach of professional decorum to attempt to controvert the point before the jury. When, however, I put a case of gross and palpable error in the opinion of the court, on a trial for a capital offence, and asked the witness whether he would not then argue the case before the jury, that able and humane judge replied that such a case would justify a departure from the ordinary course. Yet even in Maryland the court do not, I understand, decide the point until it is legally brought before them, and fully discussed. When the respondent, therefore, in the case of Fries, determined without hearing any argument, and before the season of trial arrived, he should have recollected the memorable example recorded in Holy Writ. Even Omniscience would not condemn Adam without hearing him: "Adam, where art thou?" And shall man,

"Proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Play such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As make the angels weep?"

We find the respondent, after he had thus completely stripped Fries of the panoply with which the Constitution and the laws of his country had clothed him, informing the disconsolate prisoner, almost in the very words of the execrable Jeffries to the unfortunate Sydney, that "the court would be his counsel, and by the blessing of God, would serve him as effectually as his counsel would have done!" Gracious heaven! what must have been the deplorable situation of the accused, and what the emotions of his mind at that awful moment? Before a jury prejudiced by the court themselves, deprived of their rights, without counsel and without friends, standing on the verge of eternity. His senses must have sickened at the scene, and expiring hope reclined upon the tomb. But I will not attempt to portray it; my feeble powers and weak language lag far behind nature. I should do injustice to the subject, which you can better feel than I can describe. On your feelings, therefore, I must draw for the deficiency of expression. It is truly singular that the respondent should rely on the circumstance of Fries's counsel retiring from the case, as a ground favorable to the present defence. This is taking advantage of his own wrong, because it so happened (for the ways of the Deity are inscrutable to the human eye and intellect) that his illegal and unjustifiable conduct rescued Fries from the grave, after he had consigned him to an ignominious tomb, and released the poor victim which he had bound to the altar. Yes, there was an overruling Providence who watched over the prisoner; there was, to use the language of the eloquent Curran, "a redeeming spirit in the Constitution, which walked with the sufferer through the flames of the prosecution, and rescued him unhurt from the conflagration." The shameful occurrences on the trial of Fries reached the ears of the late President Adams. Through the then Attorney General of the United States, he requested from the counsel for the prisoners, a statement of the grounds on which they intended to rely had they been permitted to defend him. These were candidly and concisely, but with great clearness and perspicuity unfolded, and Mr. Adams, rising superior to the passions of the day and the folly of the times, with a firmness and humanity which did him infinite honor, stretched the arm of mercy to the devoted victim of party. Sir, I will venture to affirm, notwithstanding the confident manner in which it has been asserted, that the respondent's prejudicated opinion on the law of treason in the case of Fries was correct, that, in questioning that opinion, I have the authority of Mr. Adams in my favor, evidenced by an official act, of which I feel it would be impossible for me to speak in terms of panegyric too lofty. As I cannot add to the eulogium of my honorable friend, Mr. Randolph, I will not, by any feebleness of expression, take from it. Is the respondent entitled to any share of the merit of this great and good action? Did he intercede at the seat of mercy? And yet, because the life of Fries was saved by the justice and humanity of Mr. Adams, his counsel would almost persuade us that Mr. Chase had this object in view, when he adopted the conduct which he exhibited on the trial. He deprived him of an impartial trial by jury, the adamant chain which secures the life of a fellow-citizen, and suspended his existence on the slender hair of Executive discretion, and his counsel make a merit of the deed!

Trial of Judge Chase.

Taking the conduct of the respondent altogether, in that unfortunate case, which will be remembered as long as virtue is revered or vice deplored, it exhibits a stupendous colossus of judicial despotism and legal injustice, which, standing with one foot fixed on the rights of juries and the other placed on the privileges of the accused, bestrode the prostrate Constitution and laws of the land, and with a look more fatal than that of the basilisk, threatened to destroy the liberties of our country.

The case of Fries was succeeded by that of Callender. There is seldom one act of crying injustice without being followed by another. It is the misfortune, if not the fault, of the respondent, that his conduct compels us to unfold more than one solitary case, in which he grossly violated his duty and the laws of the land.

Callender had written a book, which I never saw until since the commencement of this trial. A wretched performance, which ought never to have excited in the breasts of the honest supporters of the late Administration any passion but contempt. They should have applied to it the memorable declaration of one who once figured in political life, "a wise and virtuous Administration is not to be battered down by mere paper shot." The respondent, it appears, was furnished by one of his present counsel, (Mr. Martin,) when in the act of setting off for the district of Virginia, with a copy of this formidable work, which threatened destruction, in his opinion, to the Federal fabric. The book was ready scored to his hands, so that, with a single glance, he might discover the fatal passages. With this volume for a "vade mecum, or travelling companion," he proceeded to Richmond to hold a circuit court. Soon after his arrival a presentment was made and an indictment found against Callender. The miserable object of persecution was hunted up and down the country. At length he was discovered by the marshal and brought into court. To the indictment he pleaded not guilty, and able and eminent counsel appeared to defend him. To avoid any dispute about testimony in discussing this case, I shall rely implicitly on the evidence of their own witness, Mr. Robertson. The case of Callender is comprised by the second, third, fourth, and fifth articles, which specify the particular acts that were committed in violation of the law and of his duty as a judge. I shall advert to the prominent grounds of charge in the order in which they occurred on the trial, without confining myself to the order in which they are stated in the articles.

Callender not being prepared with the testimony necessary to substantiate his defence, an affidavit was filed in due form, which stated ample grounds to postpone the trial of the cause, and upon which the court ought certainly to have granted a continuance. One of the counsel for the respondent has read a rule of the Supreme Court, which declares that they will consider the practice of the King's Bench as forming the outline for them. In the authority which I produced a few days ago, the general doctrine on the subject of postponing trials is laid down in a clear and plain manner. In the case of the King vs. D'Eon, the court of King's Bench state very accurately the rule adopted for the postponement of a cause. It is only necessary to state in the affidavit that a material witness is absent, whom you have used your diligence to obtain, without the benefit of whose testimony you cannot safely proceed to trial, and that you expect to procure his future attendance. The affidavit of Callender stated the absence of witnesses whom he believed material, mentioned their names and places of residence, and the facts which he expected to prove by them. This was the very term when the indictment was found. What are the objections raised against the motion to postpone, founded on this affidavit, and the reasons urged in support of the respondent's refusal to put off the trial? They are truly singular. One is a refined technical objection to the form of the affidavit, because it does not state in strict legal language that Callender expected to be able to procure at a future time the attendance of the witnesses. But he states facts which prove on the face of them, that by postponing the trial he could obtain the benefit of their testimony, for he mentions the places of their residence, all of them within the United States. I say the case is stronger than if, secundum formam, he had sworn that he could procure their attendance. When he tells where they lived, the court must have been satisfied on this point. However, the respondent assigns a curious reason, to be sure, for his conduct. If the witnesses who were absent were actually before the court, and were to prove all that Callender had stated or expected, it would not have justified all the libellous passages that had been selected from the book and thrown into the indictment. How was Judge Chase to know but that Callender had testimony as to those points on which his absent witnesses would not have deposed? I have ever understood it to be a sufficient ground of postponement, if a witness be absent who can prove any one material fact in a cause, and I never yet heard of a court after being satisfied of this, attempting to ascertain whether there were other witnesses who would prove all the rest of the facts necessary to substantiate a defence. This would be most effectually trying and deciding a cause upon a motion which was intended to prevent the trial of it at that time. It is further contended, that any person who writes on political subjects should have all the documents, vouchers, and witnesses, at his elbow to prove the truth of any fact which he asserted. I have always thought that when a charge is preferred against any man, it is time enough then to look for testimony to prove his innocence. In fact, there is no method which I know of by which he could procure the evidence of any individual until there was a case depending. All the ex parte affidavits he could obtain, this honorable court know would be incompetent testimony.

The respondent it seems was willing to postpone it for a particular period, provided he would be present at the trial. Nay, he would go all the way to Delaware, and return again to accomplish an object he seems to have had so much at heart. In my humble opinion this part of the Judge's conduct proves stronger than almost any other of his acts, the motives which influenced him. If I were to select any one circumstance to prove that his intentions were improper, I would lay my hand on this. "I will not postpone this important trial until the next term, because, according to the arrangement, I shall not then be on this bench, but I will agree to delay it for a shorter period, and travel three or four hundred miles in order to accommodate Mr. Callender with my presence on the trial." Did any lawyer ever hear of such conduct? Did they ever hear of a court adjourning to a particular time, to try a single solitary case of a common misdemeanor?

I read a case the other day from Bacon, where the trial of an indictment was postponed until the second term from that in which the motion was made. I referred to another case in Cowper's Reports, where the court declared they would postpone the cause for ever, as the witnesses were not within the power of the defendant, unless the prosecutor would agree that their depositions should be taken and read as evidence.

Let us suppose that Callender had stated in his affidavit that he could not procure the attendance of material witnesses, because the process of the court would not reach them, and that the respondent himself had been of opinion that their testimony could not be taken by commission, the court possessing no such authority in a criminal cause. Ought he not under these circumstances to have imitated the humane example of a British judge, and to have told the District Attorney that he would postpone the cause until he consented that their depositions should be taken. He preferred acting in a very different way. As some of the witnesses were not within the power of the court, no matter how material their testimony might be to the defence, it was an argument sufficient in his own mind to order on the trial of the cause, more especially as the affidavit did not state, what was never before required, that he had other witnesses ready to prove the residue of his case, provided he could procure the evidence of those that were then absent, which was absolutely necessary, fully and completely to substantiate his defence. I take up this case and test the conduct of the respondent by the facts which at that time appeared before him, and not by any subsequent declarations of the counsel for Callender. Was there any legal cause of suspicion in the case, arising from any circumstances which have been related? The wretched author of a vulgar, miserable performance, had been presented, arrested and indicted, and was about to be tried off hand, as if in a court of pie poudre, where business is despatched as quick as you can shake the dust from your shoes, when his counsel exhibited an affidavit of the absence of material witnesses, and moved the court to postpone his trial to the usual course. And though strong legal grounds are laid before them, this reasonable request is refused upon the miserable pretexts which have been assigned. Despatch appears to have been a favorite object with the respondent in criminal business. But this extempore mode of proceeding, this impromptu method of administering justice, when an accused individual is praying for time to collect the testimony necessary for his defence, is in perfect hostility with the humane spirit of our laws and the practice of every court with which I am acquainted. I have read as a maxim of law, that in capital cases no delay is long; and I should presume, that in crimes of an inferior grade, a reasonable postponement, as the object cannot be to convict and punish innocence, ought certainly to be granted, and is enjoined in all the authorities, let us turn our eyes to whatever book of practice or precedent we may. I am far from thinking that there may not be such glaring violations of the law by those who are presumed to be best acquainted with it, as at first blush to prove that they were intentional, and proceeded from impure motives, not from ignorance, but design.

Suppose a judge should sentence any person to the pillory for an offence which was by law punishable with a small fine, or condemn him to the whipping post for a crime, the penalty annexed to which was imprisonment. I presume in either case there would be no question about motives. I put these merely for examples, because I take it, whenever there is an unequivocal, glaring and manifest violation of any known principle, or settled rule of justice, with which a man well educated in the legal science, and more especially one who possesses the viginti annorum lucubrations, cannot be unacquainted, no doubt can arise whether he acted from honest mistake, or evil design. The case which was cited on this point by one of the counsel, (Mr. Key,) from Term Reports, does not apply on this occasion. That was an application to the court of King's Bench for an information, which is a more summary mode of proceeding than by indictment, and in such cases it is the practice of that court, unless very strong grounds are laid before them, not to interpose their extraordinary power of granting an information, which deprives the accused party of the security and protection of a grand jury, and will compel the applicant to resort to the ordinary remedy of indictment.

I do respectfully submit, for the reasons assigned, that the conduct of the learned judge, in refusing to postpone the trial of Callender, was a most manifest violation of the principles of law, and was attended with such circumstances as render it highly improbable that it proceeded from a mere error in judgment.

Let us examine the subsequent conduct of the respondent. And whilst we view him progressing with the case, we shall find him at every step deviating more widely from the course which he ought to have pursued.

It is in evidence, that a person (Mr. Basset) was called to the book to be sworn as a juror, who suggested to the court facts, which, in my humble opinion, rendered him incompetent for that office. This suggestion, was made from laudable motives. It proceeded from a conviction that he was not an impartial juror, whose mind had received impressions unfavorable to the case of the accused. He candidly stated to the court that he had seen in the newspapers extracts, said to be taken from the work called the "Prospect Before Us," and that if the extracts were truly taken, he had formed an unequivocal opinion, that the book was a libellous publication, for he had made up his mind that the sedition law, as it is called in common parlance, was perfectly Constitutional. This very work was the foundation of the indictment, which we may reasonably suppose contained, if not all the passages which had been scored by that profound lawyer the Attorney General of Maryland, a judicious selection of those that were most obnoxious and offensive. I undertake to state as a correct principle of law, that upon an indictment for a libel, though particular sentences may have been culled by the prosecutor, the jury have a right to examine the whole publication, and to judge from the general context of the book, whether the publication be criminal or not. This was universally allowed, even when the powerful talents and commanding influence of a Mansfield had effected a monstrous innovation in the trial by jury, in cases of this nature; when, like the defendant, (but recollect not in a capital case, as on the trial of Fries,) he had reduced the jury to mere cyphers, and had usurped their powers, and arrogated for the court the right to decide what it was the duty and the province of the jury to determine. The poor jury were to be confined to the mere fact of publication, and the truth of the innuendoes, and the court were to decide exclusively the law.

It was reserved for that great and enlightened statesman, Mr. Fox, to restore the law to its ancient uniformity, and revest in the jury that power in prosecutions for libels, which they possessed in every other criminal case. It will be remembered that in this arduous and laudable undertaking, he was supported by the eloquent Erskine, and the venerable Earl of Camden, who had resisted, with that independence and integrity which strongly marked his dignified character, the new-fangled doctrines of the Court of King's Bench. Since the libel bill has been enacted, in all the cases which have occurred, the subject has been left at large with the jury. I recollect particularly on the trial of the King vs. Stockdale, which took place soon after, Lord Kenyon told the jury they were not tied down to the passages selected from the pamphlet, but were to compare the extracts with the whole publication, and judge for themselves from the entire work, as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and Stockdale was acquitted. If a juror had formed an unequivocal opinion, that the work entitled the "Prospect Before Us" was a libellous publication, he had in fact formed an unequivocal opinion on an indictment predicated on extracts, taken from that book. There is no logic which can destroy or evade this position, drawn from the facts. Observe the subtlety, with which the respondent eludes the most obvious principles. The question put by him to the juror was, "Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion on the charges contained in the indictment?" Remember that the indictment was not read to him, in order that he might know what it contained, and having understood its contents, be able to give a correct answer; he was called upon to declare whether he had formed and delivered an opinion on what he had never seen, nor heard read, and, with sophistry exposed to vulgar inspection, the learned judge proceeds to state, that "he never saw the indictment nor heard it read, and, if he had neither read nor heard the charges, he was sure he could not form an opinion on the subject." But how unjust was the conclusion which the respondent drew from his premises; for the indictment which Mr. Basset never heard read, when he came to read it, might be found to contain those very passages which he considered as libellous; and how in the face of the fact, for the juror had decided "The Prospect Before Us" to be a libel, and the "Prospect Before Us" Judge Chase knew himself to be the sole basis of the indictment. Let us suppose that the respondent himself, after scanning with eagle eyes this terrible publication, had absolutely made up his mind that it was libellous, and had afterwards been called upon as a juror, on an indictment against Callender, which he had never seen or heard read, but which in fact was founded on this publication. Would he pretend to say, because he did not know what the indictment contained, that it was impossible he should have formed an unequivocal opinion on the charges which composed it? I presume not. Behold then the imposition which was practised upon a juror, who had made up his mind absolutely on the very question to be tried. He might as well have asked him whether he had formed and delivered an opinion on any indictment, of which he had never heard before, as one which he had never read, and of the contents of which he was utterly ignorant. To have asked Mr. Basset whether he had formed and delivered an opinion on any particular case in the books with which he was entirely unacquainted, and if he answered from that circumstance in the negative, to have ordered him to be sworn, would have been just as proper as the course the judge pursued. Mr. Basset had formed an unequivocal opinion, that the publication for which Callender was indicted was a libel; and had delivered this opinion to bring it completely within the respondent's rule. Some of the counsel have observed, that the objection was not made by the advocates of Callender, and that it proceeded from a mere suggestion of Mr. Basset. And which is the strongest case? I apprehend that where a juror, conscious of his impressions, from motives of delicacy, puts the court in possession of information, on which they were bound to act. Let me ask under these circumstances, whether Mr. Basset was an impartial juror? And does not the imperative language of the Constitution declare, "that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury?" With this plain provision on my side, I want not the glossary furnished by the authorities which have been cited by the counsel for the respondent. Nor can it be necessary to enter into a critical examination of them, as we have a case determined in our own courts, on the motion for a new trial, made on behalf of Fries. On that occasion, this honorable Court will find, that all the precedents relied upon at this time were adduced and urged. The passages from Brooke, Roll, Viner, and Trials per Pais, were cited. The law at large and the law abridged, were brought before the judges, who decided after a solemn argument in favor of a new trial. This single case is sufficient to overturn the authorities, in which the respondent's counsel appear to repose such implicit faith. What were the facts on the motion for a new trial in Fries's case? After a verdict of guilty, an affidavit was made that one of the jurors had said that Fries ought to be hung. Mr. Basset, this court will recollect, in effect declared as positively that Callender ought to be convicted. Mr. Basset had formed an unequivocal opinion, that the publication for which Callender was indicted, was a libel. This opinion, to bring it completely within the respondent's rule, he delivered in open court at the moment of being sworn as a juror. That certainly was giving an opinion that Callender ought to be punished. But the juror in Fries's case, when confronted with the witnesses who deposed to his declaration, denied having made use of the expressions imputed to him.

I do therefore most sincerely believe, that the respondent decided against the principles of law and the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution, when he directed Mr. Basset to be qualified as a juror on the trial of Callender. He decided also against the just construction of his own rule, contained in the question which he had addressed to the jury, and gave it an interpretation which rendered it equally ridiculous and absurd. The question must have presupposed the juror acquainted with the contents of the indictment, and must have been predicated on this principle. Any other supposition would render it not merely idle and nugatory to be put, but truly nonsensical; and yet the respondent made his being ignorant of the charges in the indictment the pretext for swearing him on the jury. So far as relates to the delivery of an opinion which he had previously formed, Mr. Basset, in answer to an interrogatory which was put to him by me, replied, that he did publicly, in open court, pronounce the opinion which he had formed of "The Prospect Before Us," from the extracts which he had seen in the papers. Here then is proof that he did deliver in the most solemn and public manner an opinion on the subject, from which, on his oath as a juror, for he was just about to be qualified, he could not depart without subjecting himself to ignominy and the severest reproach.

The point is, I humbly conceive, too plain to require any further comments, and I shall proceed to another extraordinary circumstance which occurred on this trial, which I am sorry to say was characterized by so many and such strange modes of proceeding, that I think we might safely challenge the profoundest researcher in the judicial history of England to furnish a parallel. Let me remark, that all the questions proposed to the witnesses, on the part of the prosecution, were put ore tenus. The tongue and not the pen propounded them. As soon as the examination began on the part of the defendant, or to speak more correctly, before it commenced, the tables were turned, and the counsel of Callender were directed to reduce to writing the questions which they wished to ask. This is proved to be a novelty in trials of this nature. If so, was it an innocent novelty? Why embarrass the counsel for the prisoner with an unusual and unprecedented regulation, and compel them to do that which they did not require on the part of the prosecution. This extraordinary measure has been attempted to be excused, because this honorable Court has adopted, though partially, the same rule upon the request of any of its members. The large number of judges, of which this dignified tribunal is composed, rendered such a rule necessary and proper. It flowed from the very nature and constitution of this court, and is agreeable to constant and general usage. The two cases bear no resemblance nor similarity to each other. The rule operates here equally and fairly, let the question come from what quarter it may, whether from the Managers or the counsel, or whether it be proposed by any member of this honorable body. The counsel for Callender submitted to this new law of the court, promulgated at the instant it was to be executed, and suited to the case before them. They reduce the questions which they wished to ask Colonel Taylor to writing. Immediately an objection is raised against them. And if it were not already known to this honorable Court, I am sure no member could guess what it was. The respondent had first inquired of them what they intended to prove by the witness, and then insisted that their interrogatories should be committed to writing. It will be recollected that from the miserable trash of Callender, the prosecutor had picked and culled here and there the most noxious and loathsome passages. Every offensive paragraph constituted a separate and distinct charge. The charges were of course numerous. The following sentence was selected as the ground of two of them. Alluding to the late President Adams, the publication says, "He was a professed aristocrat. He had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest." The passage itself contained two distinct assertions, both of which had been charged with the proper inuendoes, to explain the intentions of the author, and the tendency of the expressions as highly criminal in the indictment. The District Attorney, it appears from the note taken by Mr. Robertson of his argument, considered the term aristocrat, used in the common political or party acceptance, with the views of Callender as particularly offensive and libellous. Contrary to the precipitate opinion of the respondent, he considered the assertion that Mr. Adams was a professed aristocrat, a substantive offence of itself. Colonel Taylor's testimony it was expected would go to prove the truth and justice of those observations of Callender's. It often happens that counsel are not accurately informed of all that a witness can depose. From the questions drawn up in haste by Mr. Hay, to be put to Mr. Taylor, the respondent drew the inference, but, in my humble opinion, very erroneously, that Colonel Taylor's testimony would not go the whole length of substantiating the facts necessary to evince that Mr. Adams was a professed aristocrat, and that he was faithful and serviceable to the British interest. He thought it could only prove part, and therefore rejected it as inadmissible. For this opinion Mr. Robertson states, that the judge declared that "he took the responsibility on himself, and risked his character on it." His reasons were neither solid nor plausible. He stated that the passage constituted an entire charge, and every part of it must be proven, or none at all. If a person had a respectable witness as to part, and another equally respectable as to the residue, he would examine neither, because singly taken their testimony would not go to all the charge. It is seldom, indeed, any party can make out his whole case by one solitary witness, and when it does happen it is always suspicious. When an individual is selected to prove all that is required, agreeably to the rule of the respondent, no objection of this kind would occur. But is not that case much stronger where a number of witnesses appear, each ready to depose to the particular facts within his knowledge, and where the sum or aggregate of their testimony furnished a complete answer to the charges, however numerous?

I may safely venture to say, that in the annals of any courts of justice or injustice under Heaven, such an exception of testimony is not to be found. The Chief Justice of the United States, a gentleman every way well qualified to judge, declares that he never heard of such an objection before. It is without precedent, and in violation of every rule of the law of evidence. The idea is too absurd to be dwelt upon. It is too distorted in principle to admit of consistency in practice. It is contraband in law, and can only be smuggled by the address with which it was introduced. It requires great talents and ingenuity for a moment to hide its deformity, and in vulgar hands it would become truly ridiculous and contemptible. It is utterly indefensible; and the respondent's counsel themselves have felt it incapable of being justified. They have attempted to excuse it, by endeavoring to show that the learned judge was not influenced by bad motives. For my part I consider it so flagrant that I can ascribe his conduct to no other, especially when taken in connexion with the facts and circumstances proved by the evidence. This will lead me to make a few remarks on the quo animo, with which he acted throughout the whole of this transaction. On this topic the evidence is copious and pointed. We have been charged with destroying the confidence of society, because we have given evidence of the declarations of the respondent made to Mr. Mason. These have been stated with all that delicacy which is characteristic of the gentleman. I do not discover from the manner or the circumstances, that the respondent's conversation with Mr. Mason was a confidential one. If I did, I will candidly acknowledge I should feel little disposed to trespass on the walks of private life. It was said to have taken place at an unguarded moment, and that every unreserved expression should not be tortured into an accusation. Let us bear in mind that the respondent was a judge of the land, and about to depart to Virginia to perform the duties attached to his office. He had then in his possession a copy of Callender's work, and declared he would teach the people of Virginia to distinguish between the liberty and the licentiousness of the press, and that if the State was not too much depraved to furnish a jury of good and respectable men, he would certainly punish Callender. If we pursue him on his way to Richmond, we find him in the stage asking a perfect stranger whether he had ever seen "The Prospect Before Us," and expressing a wish that Callender had been hanged. He actually proceeded to Richmond with the scored book in his pocket, which was delivered to the jury, and Callender was convicted and punished. It is said by his counsel, that these declarations of the respondent's were not made in earnest, they were mere jests. I suspect Callender did not find them so. Like the fable of the frogs, it might have been jest and sport to Judge Chase, but it was cruelty to him. Sir, I will not dwell longer on those unpleasant and painful circumstances. This honorable Court can and will duly appreciate them. Much more might be said on this case, but I will leave the task to abler hands than mine. My honorable friend will do ample justice to those points which I have omitted.

From Virginia, flushed with success and elated with his triumph over Callender, the respondent hastened to Delaware. The night preceding the day on which the respondent was to hold the court, he lodged at the village of Christiana, about five miles distant from the court-house. From this place he rode into Newcastle the next morning with Dr. William McMechin, who was summoned as a grand juror to the court, and it is in evidence, was actually sworn on the panel. This is the very man, who, it is represented, gave the respondent the information relative to the seditious printer. As a grand juror it was his duty to communicate to his fellows any offences against the laws of the land which had come to his knowledge, and it was the duty of the grand jury to present every criminal act punishable by the laws of the United States. We are bound to pronounce that Mr. McMechin put the rest of the grand jury, for he was sworn so to do, in complete possession of all the information which he communicated to the respondent. With these circumstances, the respondent was perfectly well acquainted. He saw with his own eyes the very man empanelled on the inquest who had opened the budget to him, and knew it was his duty to unfold the intelligence to his brethren. The respondent proceeds to deliver an appropriate charge to the jury—a charge free from all those blemishes which stain a subsequent performance of the same kind. He presented to their view in chaste and eloquent language the proper subjects for their inquiry. In my humble opinion it may have been equalled but never excelled. I considered it, according to my poor judgment at the time, a perfect model; the most finished piece in style and substance that I ever heard addressed to a grand jury. Had he stopped here he would have been an object of praise rather than complaint. Had he been contented with discharging his official duty he would have been entitled to our thanks, rather than merited an accusation.

The grand jury retire to their chamber, and after some time return to the box. To the credit of the then marshal of the Delaware district, I must observe, that he had manifested on that occasion, (as I know him uniformly to have done, even when the storm of party raged with the greatest violence) in the selection of his jurors, an independence becoming the responsible station which he filled. They were not men of pliant tempers, nor were they carefully culled from the ruling sect, but chosen without respect to party, from the most respectable of both sides. It gives me great pleasure to speak of such conduct, because I wish to hold it up as an example. The grand jury were asked by the clerk in the usual form, "have you any bills or presentments to make?" Their foreman respectfully answered they "had not." On this, the judge could no longer bridle his temper. He had anticipated perhaps a treat from the prosecution of an obnoxious printer, and expected to regale his palate with a favorite dish. Provoked by disappointment, his passion burst into a flame, and he condescended to stoop from his bench, for the purpose of seizing on his prey. It was at this period he betrayed emotions so highly reprehensible, and so very unsuitable to the dignity of his situation. In a tone, well adapted to the exceptionable language, he observed to the grand inquest "What! no bills or presentments?" This was matter of astonishment to him, and he proceeded to make the observations so correctly described by Mr. Read, the District Attorney of Delaware, a gentleman of irreproachable life and manners, whose character is not only unimpeached but unimpeachable, and Mr. Lea, one of the grand jury themselves, to whom part of the observations were addressed, a merchant of established reputation, and as a man respected by all who are acquainted with him. Sir, after the observations I have made on positive and negative testimony, I will not stop to demonstrate that everything stated by Mr. Read and Mr. Lea was said, though not recollected by some other witnesses. I will barely mention that all the extra-judicial remarks of the respondent were addressed to the grand jury or to the district attorney. They must, therefore, naturally be presumed to have paid the strictest and closest attention to all that fell from the learned judge, and we have produced one of the grand inquest themselves, and the district attorney, to prove the language he used. I feel confident under these circumstances, that implicit credit will be given to them. I am also convinced that the statement made by the respondent is scarcely more favorable to his cause. The grand jury repeat, to the interrogatory put to them by the respondent, the answer which they gave to the previous question of the clerk, and request additionally that they may be discharged, as many of them were farmers, and it was hay harvest, a very busy season with them. But no matter for that, the business of the persecution, for I will not say prosecution, must go on if possible. The judge would not discharge the grand jury on the first day, agreeably to general practice, as proved by Judge Bedford, though pressed so to do. He proceeds to give them information of the seditious temper which had manifested itself in the State, and particularly in Newcastle county: a county, which, suffer me to say, is well known from its old and unshaken patriotism from the Revolution to the present day. But he did not stop here, he proceeds to mention a seditious printer, point out the place where he lived, and the borough of Wilmington, justly celebrated for its uniform attachment to the cause of republicanism, and, according to his own answer, to specify the title of his paper, and just as his name was escaping from his lips, a returning sense of propriety checked his speech. Sensible how deeply he had committed himself already, he paused for reflection. But he had gone too far to effect a safe and honorable retreat. He calls on the district attorney to know if a file of the papers cannot be had. Some officious person offers to procure them, and the respondent directs the district attorney to examine them and lay them before the grand jury, who are ordered to attend the next morning. They do accordingly attend, the file of the papers is laid before them and examined. Behold, after all his exertion, the respondent had his labor for his pains; after all this noise and bustle montes parturiunt, and not even ridiculus mus nascitur. The grand jury return once more to the box without any bills or presentments, and the learned judge with admirable address covers his defeat. Such appears to have been his conduct on that memorable occasion. Where is the law, or the authority which gives him the power to goad the grand inquest to indict an individual, or vests in him the right to order a district attorney to search for criminality? Is the judge himself authorized to hunt up offenders? Or is he justified in pronouncing a person guilty of sedition before he is charged with the offence? Remember, though he did not mention the name of the printer, he confesses himself that he named his paper, and id certum est quod certum reddi potest. Instead of pronouncing sentence of condemnation on a person before he has been accused, the benevolent language of our laws commands the judge to be his counsel when the constituted authority of the country has put him on his trial. If this conduct be not a violation of his duty, if it be not a case of plain and palpable misbehaviour, I know not what is.

Mr. HARPER. The judge did not undertake to pronounce sentence on his guilt, or innocence. He gave the information as he received it.

Mr. RODNEY. I am now arguing from what I consider in evidence; I am speaking from a copy of the deposition of Mr. Read, taken last winter, in which my honorable colleague, (Mr. NICHOLSON;) has remarked the very expressions used by the witness when he gave his testimony on the trial, and which literally corresponds with his former deposition.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Burr.) Proceed, sir, if it differs in any respect, the Court will mark the difference.

[Here Mr. Rodney referred to Mr. Read's deposition, and contended that the respondent gave as matter of information part of what he stated, but as to the residue, he undertook to assert it; and proceeded.] But, sir, if it is all to be considered as matter of information, let the respondent's rule in Callender's case operate upon himself. His language there was, you should have the proof at your elbow for everything you publish. Do unto others as you would have others to do unto you, is a golden rule. He undertakes on the credit of another to inform against an independent citizen, and to bring him before the accusing power of the country, who by their solemn act, with one voice pronounce him innocent. A judge who ought to set an example to the nation, and more especially one who had just returned from punishing a person for communicating to the public information which he had received from others, appears guilty of pronouncing from the bench a libel on the character of a county and of an individual, and contends in the face of his own doctrine there is no guilt or criminality in it. But this predetermination of a case not before him, is in my humble opinion extremely reprehensible. To show that the respondent is not culpable, a precedent from the State of Pennsylvania is cited. Much as I venerate the character of the then Chief Justice of that State (Mr. McKean) and esteem him dear as a man, (I should be lost to the sense of gratitude if I did not,) I cannot in the case alluded to, subscribe to the precedent which he established. But even that is clearly distinguishable from the one under consideration. Mr. Cobbet, who undoubtedly was a man of extraordinary talents, not merely for invective and abuse, but for the strength, simplicity, and originality of his style, however much I may dislike the monstrous principles which he espoused, had been previously bound over for various supposed libels against characters peculiarly the objects of protection with the laws of this country. This may be considered as an inchoate accusation, and may have led Mr. McKean to make the observations which he delivered on that occasion.

Though I do not, Mr. President, perceive my voice fail me, I feel myself so exhausted with standing such a length of time this morning, before the court adjourned for half an hour, and so long since that temporary relaxation, that I find myself unable to continue any longer on my feet.

The Court adjourned until the next morning; when Mr. RODNEY proceeded as follows:

Mr. President—Before I resume the discussion of the Delaware charge, I beg leave to return my sincere thanks to this honorable Court for the indulgence which they were kind enough to grant me last evening. It is the first and most sacred principle in our criminal code that a man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. The counsel for the respondent have strenuously urged this principle, and wish it to govern the case of their client. I am willing to give him the full benefit of it. But did the judge himself act in conformity to this in Delaware? No. He did undertake to denounce a person guilty of a crime, before he was charged with the commission of any offence. Did he allow an independent printer who would not sacrifice the freedom of his press, on the altar of the Baal, or the Mammon of the day, the advantage of those principles which his counsel now claim for him? He did not. He pronounced the absent man guilty without waiting to see or hear him. Upon the mere say so of another, he took the risk upon himself, to tell the grand jury there was a printer of libels against the Government, when his informant was one of them, and even after they had returned, without any bills or presentments. It manifests a deliberate persistence in accusation, which I will forbear to qualify by the proper terms. The grand jury, upon a careful examination of the very documents on which he relied, can find nothing libellous, nothing seditious, and the contemplated victim is thus preserved by the integrity and the independence of a jury of his fellow-citizens.

The conduct of the learned judge at the circuit court in Maryland, furnishes, I consider, one of the strongest articles of impeachment. I had intended to have dilated very much at length on this charge, but the fatigue of yesterday has really indisposed me, and I have already trespassed too much on your time.

Every member of this Court must have been sensible of the impropriety of the respondent's conduct on that occasion. Every reflecting man must be decidedly opposed to the idea of blending political discussion, with the legal observations which ought to proceed from the bench. A party harangue little comports with the temperate and learned charges to be delivered by the president of a court. The character of an electioneering partisan, whose rostrum is a stump, or whose stage is the head of a hog'shead, is utterly inconsistent and incompatible with that of a grave and upright judge. The duty of a judge is to expound the laws, and not to exercise the office of a censor over them, and much less to disgrace himself by reprobating them in a manner calculated to excite groundless alarm and apprehensions in the minds of the people, and to alienate their affections from the Government. Every man in his individual capacity possesses the undoubted right to advocate the political principles which he believes most beneficial to his country. The respondent as an individual is entitled to this privilege in common with his fellow-citizens, and to the free exercise of his splendid talents in such a case. But does this justify him as a judge in his judicial character, and from the judgment seat, to preach political sermons, and impose his private dogmas on the people, under the garb of administering the laws? Sophistry may for a moment confound two things perfectly distinct in their nature and effect, but the mist vanishes before the light of argument.

I most ardently desire that the sanctuary of justice may not be profaned by the unhallowed spirit of party. The law, like the gospel, should be no respecter of persons, whatever may be their political sentiments. The virtue and integrity of a judge should keep him within the line of his duty, and form an eternal barrier against the encroachments of party prejudices and partialities. If politics are forbidden to enter, or even to approach a court of justice, neither judge nor jurors will feel those sensations which disqualify them for the impartial discharge of their respective duties. Though party may rage with violence and agitate the country, all will be calm and tranquil in a court, in which every man's property, liberty, and life, will find a safe harbor. This should be inculcated by lessons and by examples, as a primary principle in our judicial system. I am happy to find that we all agree on this great and essential point. It is the anchor of hope amid those storms and tempests in which it is the will of Providence that all human affairs should sometimes fluctuate. The learned counsel, though they acknowledge the conduct of the respondent to have been imprudent, improper, and indiscreet, attempt to justify it by the production of charges, which wear a political aspect, delivered during the American Revolution. I will enter my protest against those, even at so turbulent a season; but none that have been produced furnish any grounds of defence to the respondent. In no instance which has been cited, have they attempted to exclaim against the very Government from which they received their commissions. We behold the defendant, a judge of the United States, passing judgment of condemnation on the laws which he was bound to conform to, and execute, and with the policy of which, in his judicial character, he had nothing to do. Much pains was taken in the examination of the testimony to disprove a fact the defendant himself admits in his answer; to show that the respondent did not censure the Administration, when he himself has furnished us with a copy of the charge in which he condemns in the strongest manner one of the most prominent acts which have passed since a change took place in the politics of the country. He reprobates the late law abolishing the judicial establishment, made under the late Administration. To this law the Senate, who in their Executive capacity form a material part of the Administration, gave their consent, and the President, who is at the head of affairs, gave his approbation. And yet gentlemen contend that the respondent uttered not a syllable against the present Administration! Is it not a plain, incontrovertible act of misbehaviour in a judge to denounce the very law under which he was then exercising his functions, and to hold it up to the people as shaking to the foundation the independence of the national Judiciary?

It will be conceded that there yet exist State jealousies against the General Government, the acts of which are closely watched and scrutinized. When the Constitution of the United States was framed, it was the legitimate offspring of a liberal spirit of accommodation which reconciled jarring interests, discordia semina rerum. It requires the patriotic exertion of every good man to preserve and to promote a reciprocal cordiality between the General and State Governments. The officers particularly of each should manifest a respect and reverence which would inspire at once confidence and attachment. What language can express the criminality of the respondent, when from the bench of the United States he undertook to thunder anathemas against the act of the Legislature of an individual State! Was this a part of his duty, or was it not? Can there be a doubt, sir, but that it was a gross violation of his duty, and that the respondent well knew it at the time? Yet such were his unbridled passions and his uncontrolled prejudices, that, regardless of the station which he held, and the dignified post which he occupied, he did not hesitate to commit the character of the United States by conduct which must have irritated the audience against the government of Maryland and its officers. If ever a mobocracy take place in this country, it will be brought about by such instruments and such conduct. Let those clothed with the laws become the violators of them, let the judges of the United States issue fulminations against the measures of individual States, and the judges of the different States retaliate, by declaiming against the acts of the General Government, and the consequences are easily foreseen.

When a poor miserable object like Callender, without character and without influence, censures the measures of our Administration, or reprobates an unconstitutional law, the respondent considered him guilty of a crime and deserving of punishment. But a man elevated to the bench may declaim in the strongest language against any measure or law of the United States, or of an individual State with perfect impunity! Recollect, sir, that if the defendant be justified in reprobating a single law of the United States, he has the right to reprobate them all indiscriminately. It is without question the duty of a judge to inculcate a respect and a reverence for the laws of the land. But, sir, the respondent, so far as he was able, has endeavored to excite the indignation of the people against them, and to terrify them into an opposition to measures which he has chosen from the bench to denounce, by the dread of a mobocracy and other alarming stories unworthy the columns of a common newspaper, and scarcely equalled since the days of the Rye House, and of Titus Oates.

Mr. President, I have now gone through the several articles of impeachment, and submitted to your consideration the remarks which I had to offer in illustration of the subject. Permit me, before I conclude, to observe, that in this country, no ignominious punishment follows upon a conviction by impeachment. Your sentence cannot extend so far as to hurt a single hair of the respondent's head. In England, the power to punish is unlimited, and has been but too often exercised with cruel, unrelenting severity. With us, it seems intended to restore and to preserve the purity of office, rather than to punish the offender by a penalty proportioned to his guilt. Remember, if this honorable Court acquit the defendant, they declare in the most solemn manner, and their sentence will be of record, that he has on all the occasions to which I have adverted, behaved himself well, in a manner becoming the character of a judge worthy of his situation. They sanction every act which he has committed, and proclaim them to the world as examples which ought to be followed. Sir, they in effect adopt every part of his conduct and make it their own, thus participating in the actions and transgressions proved against him by the testimony. This is indeed a serious consideration. Are the members of this Court prepared by a solemn judgment, which, proceeding from a tribunal so elevated, will have a powerful and commanding influence, to sanction by their high authority the conduct of the respondent? No, sir; I trust that they will embrace the present opportunity of displaying the virtue, the purity, and the energy of our republican Government, and that, in pronouncing the sentence which they may pass, they will erect a beacon, by which future judges will avoid the rocks on which the respondent now lies shipwrecked.

Sir, I have the fullest confidence; that if in the opinion of the members of this Court the respondent be innocent, they will have the independence to acquit him, and I entreat them to do so. On the other hand, if he be guilty, they will have the firmness to convict him.

With a sincere and a fervent hope that the Supreme Ruler of the Universe may so govern the decision of this case, that it may punish guilt, but protect innocence, I cheerfully submit it to the consideration of this honorable Court.

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—Mr. President: After the very long and able, though (as I fear it must have proved to this honorable Court) tedious discussion of this important subject, it again becomes my duty to address you. That duty springs not only from the authority with which the House of Representatives have been pleased to invest me, but is enforced by the strong and deep interest which I take in the question before you. It is an interest which I am not ashamed to avow here. Strange, indeed, would be the mechanism of my composition, could I stand indifferent to the fate of this impeachment; if the success of a prosecution instituted at my own motion, of an indictment drawn by my own hand, and backed by the strongest body of evidence that perhaps was ever adduced in support of any accusation, should fail to interest me. My first wish indeed would have been to find this great culprit innocent of the charges which have been preferred against him. But since, by the clearest testimony, and even by his own admission, we are denied this gratification, all that remains for us is to see that signal justice done upon him which the Constitution demands for offenders of his high rank, and which we confidently expect from your decision.

The course which has been pursued by my learned colleagues and right excellent friends leaves but a barren field in which to glean after them. I shall, therefore, present you with the most condensed view that I can take of the subject, endeavoring, as far as possible, to avoid the ground which has been already trodden; and should I fail in this attempt, I hope to be pardoned, as having been absent during a great part of this discussion. Very far indeed is it from my intention, by tiresome repetitions, yet more to weary the patience of the Court, and prolong that decision which is anxiously awaited by all. I was not present when the defence was opened, in a style so honorable to himself, by the junior counsel of the respondent, (Mr. Hopkinson.) I was then ill abed. I regret the loss of the very able argument which he is said to have urged against the first article. God forbid that the time shall ever come with me when merit shall be disparaged because found in an adversary. Report speaks fairly of the gentleman's performance, and I am willing to credit her to the utmost extent.

Suffer me to say a few words on the general doctrine of impeachment, on which the wildest opinions have been advanced—unsupported by the Constitution, inconsistent with reason, and at war with each other. It has been contended that an offence, to be impeachable, must be indictable. For what then I pray you was it that this provision of impeachment found its way into the Constitution? Could it not have said, at once, that any civil officer of the United States, convicted on an indictment, should (ipso facto) be removed from office? This would be coming at the thing by a short and obvious way. If the Constitution did not contemplate a distinction between an impeachable and an indictable offence, whence this cumbrous and expensive process, which has cost us so much labor, and so much anxiety to the nation? Whence this idle parade, this wanton waste of time and treasure, when the ready intervention of a court and jury alone was wanting to rectify the evil? In addition to the instances adduced by my right worthy friend, (Mr. Nicholson,) who first addressed the Court yesterday, permit me to cite a few others by way of illustration. The President of the United States has a qualified negative on all bills passed by the two houses of Congress, that he may arrest the passage of a law framed in a moment of Legislative delirium. Let us suppose it exercised, indiscriminately, on every act presented for his acceptance. This surely would be an abuse of his Constitutional power, richly deserving impeachment; and yet no man will pretend to say it is an indictable offence. The President is authorized by the Constitution to retain any bill presented for his approbation, not exceeding ten days, Sundays excepted, within which period he may return it to the House wherein it originated, stating his reasons for disapproving it. Now let us suppose that, at a session like the present, which must necessarily terminate on the third of March (and that day falls this year on a Sunday,) the President should keep back until the last hour of an expiring Congress, every bill offered to him for signature during the ten preceding days, (and these are always the greater part of the laws passed at any session of the Legislature) and should then return them, stating his objections, whether good or bad is altogether immaterial. It is true that a vote of two-thirds of each branch may enact a law in despite of Executive opposition; but, in the case I have stated, it would be physically impossible for Congress to exercise its Constitutional power. Indeed, over the bills presented to the President within nine days preceding its dissolution, the Legislature might be deprived of even the shadow of control, since the Executive is not bound to make any return of them whatever. Now, I ask whether such misconduct in the President be an indictable offence? And yet is there a man who hears me who will deny that it would be a flagrant abuse, under pretence of exercise of his Constitutional authority, for which he ought to be impeached, removed, and disqualified? Sir, this doctrine, that impeachable and indictable are convertible terms, is almost too absurd for argument. Nothing but the high authority by which it is urged, and the dignified theatre where it is advanced, could induce me to treat it seriously. Strip it of technical jargon, and what is it but a monstrous pretension that the officers of Government, so long as they steer clear of your penal statutes—so long as they keep without the letter of the law—may, to the whole length of the tether of the Constitution, abuse that power, which they are bound to exercise with a sound discretion, and under a high responsibility for the general good? The counsel who closed the defence (Mr. Harper) felt that this ground trembled beneath his feet; and, fearing to be swallowed up in the yawning ruin, he precipitately abandoned it. He shifts from the position taken by his associates, and lays down this principle, "that an offence, to be impeachable, need not be indictable, yet it must have been committed against some known law." Well, take the question in this point of view, and there is no longer matter of dispute between us; it is reduced to a miserable quibble. For what do we contend?—that the respondent has contravened the known law of the land and of his duty, which required him "to dispense justice, faithfully, and impartially, and without respect to persons." He stands charged with having sinned against this law and against his sacred oath, by acting in his judicial capacity, unfaithfully, partially, and with respect to persons. These are our points. We do charge him with misdemeanor in office. We aver that he hath demeaned himself amiss—partially, unfaithfully, unjustly, corruptly. This is the sum and substance of our accusation, and this we have established by undeniable proof. I will waste no more time in attempting to dislodge our opponents from a position which they have abandoned in the face of day. I will no longer worry the good sense of this honorable Court by combatting the claim set up by the adverse counsel in behalf of the civil officers of this Government, to make their own passions and caprices, personal and political, the rule of that action which should be governed by a sound discretion, and exercised under a high responsibility, to oppress to the last extent of the letter of the law, and set at defiance an abused and insulted people.

The defence on the first article has been so much at variance with itself, the counsel opposed to us have replied so satisfactorily to each other, that the labor of combatting their respective positions is materially lessened. Whilst the honorable Attorney General of Maryland has almost exhausted his ingenuity to prove that the crime charged in the first article was no offence at all; that the judge did not, in that instance, exceed the bounds of his judicial authority; the gentleman who closed the argument on that side has confessed the offence in its full extent; but, in extenuation, avers that it was committed by a man of contrite heart.

Mr. HARPER rose and said, that he did not mean to make that admission. He was proceeding, when the President reminded him that he must not interrupt the honorable Manager; that if he conceived any facts to be misstated, he might make a note of them, and have them corrected after the argument was gone through.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The words to which I refer, I took down at the time they were uttered by the respondent's counsel: "the papers were withdrawn; the prisoner's counsel were entreated to go on, until the cup of humiliation was drained to the very dregs." I took these words down at the moment. They must still ring in the ears of this honorable Court. To it I appeal for the fidelity of my statement. Did not the counsel declare that whilst, on every other point, his client invoked your justice, on this he implored your mercy? But mercy is not among the dispensations of this honorable Court. You will mete unto him that which his defenders tell you he has measured unto others—justice—to use their own language, "sheer" justice—all that he is entitled to at your hands. If the course pursued by the respondent, in delivering a written, prejudiced opinion in the case of Fries, was (as the Attorney General of Maryland has contended) warranted by law, wherefore the recantation on the next day? Was the court ignorant of its own authority? or was it willing to surrender to the bar, laboring, too, under its high displeasure, its undeniable and just privileges? Is there anything in the character of the respondent which will warrant either conclusion? Mr. President through every stage of this transaction you perceive every symptom of guilt—trepidation, remorse, and self-abasement. Look at the consultation at Rawle's, who was followed home by the judges as soon as the court rose. Recollect the conversation which ensued, and the conduct of the court on the following day, when the respondent is said to have atoned for his misbehaviour; although, in the same breath, you are told there was no offence to expiate. Do you recognise in that procedure an honorable and manly acknowledgment of unintentional error, which, from a sense of justice, the respondent was anxious to rectify? Or do you behold the sullen perverseness of guilt, half ashamed to confess its offences, yet trembling at their consequences?—now soothing, now threatening, its adversary—every characteristic of conscious crime? Sir, I blush for the picture which the gentleman has drawn of his client; and I ask you, Mr. President, if such a character is fit to preside in a court of justice?—a man whose violent temper and arbitrary disposition perpetually drives him into acts of tyranny and usurpation, from which, when vigorously opposed, he must disgracefully recede; equally ready to take an untenable position, or meanly to abandon it. To-day, haughty, violent, imperious; to-morrow, humble, penitent, and submissive; prostrating the dignity of his awful function at the feet of an advocate, over whom, but the day before, he had attempted to domineer. Is this a character to dispense law and justice to this nation? No, sir! It demands men of far different stamp—firm, indeed, but temperate; mild, though unyielding; neither a blustering bravo, nor a timid poltroon. I speak not of private character; with it I have nothing to do. It is the official conduct only that concerns me. I have no hesitation in saying that such men are not fit to preside in your judiciary; and that the greatest abilities, when joined to such tempers, serve but still more to disqualify their possessors.

I must here reiterate my regret at losing the argument of the gentleman who opened the defence. I understand him to have said, (speaking of Fries,) "could that man be 'innocent,' who 'had been twice convicted of treason? Could he 'be 'illiterate,' who pretended to expound the 'Constitution? Could he be 'friendless,' who 'had arrayed his numerous followers in opposition to the laws of his country?" Sir, this is a very pretty specimen of antithesis; but, unfortunately for itself, it proves too much, whilst, as to the question before the court, it proves nothing. Does the gentleman believe the London mob, in 1780, to have been among the most influential men in England? or, because their discontents grew out of religion, that they were more deeply read in canon law than any other body of men in that kingdom? They far surpassed the Northampton rioters in depth and intricacy of research. They undertook to expound the Constitution of the Church of England. But, unfortunately for this gentleman, the guilt or innocence of his honorable client is in nowise affected by the guilt or innocence of this poor German and his comrades. The respondent stands charged with a departure from the principles of the Constitution and the established forms of law, in conducting the trial which was to ascertain the guilt or innocence of John Fries. What has this to do with his character? How does that affect the question? Guilty or innocent, he was entitled to a fair and impartial trial, according to the known usage and forms of law; for, be it remembered in such cases, form is substance. It is the denial of this sacred right, which the Constitution equally secures to the most hardened offender as to persecuted virtue—this daring outrage on the free principles of our criminal jurisprudence, that constitutes the respondent's crime. If Fries was innocent, what language can sufficiently reprobate the conduct of the judge? An innocent man, by his procurement, iniquitously consigned to an ignominious death. If guilty, he ought to have expiated his guilt upon a gibbet. But what was the fact? The President of the United States, in consequence of the arbitrary and unprecedented conduct of the court, was, in a manner, compelled to pardon him. The public mind would never have brooked the execution of any man thus tried and condemned. By the misdemeanor of the respondent, then, to rescue the administration of justice from the foulest imputation, to make some atonement for the offended majesty of the Constitution, the Executive was reduced to the necessity of turning loose upon the country, again to sow the seeds of disaffection and revolt, a man represented by the adverse counsel to be every way desperate and daring—a traitor and a rebel. Upon what other principle, sir, can you account for the President's application to the prisoner's counsel, and his subsequent pardon? I repeat, Mr. President, that it is wholly immaterial to the question before you, whether John Fries was or was not a traitor. Either alternative is fatal to the respondent. He is charged with oppression and injustice on the trial, and you have not only the clearest testimony of the fact, but it is in proof before you that such was the President's motive in issuing the pardon. He must have believed that the sentence was in itself unjust, (which serves but to aggravate the respondent's guilt,) or he must have acted (as I am unwilling to concede he appears to have done) on the ground that, however deserving of punishment, the prisoner had been unfairly tried, and his condemnation illegally obtained. Whichsoever of these positions be true, the defence set up on behalf of the respondent is false. What have you seen? A man condemned to death, unheard, by a prejudiced jury and an unrighteous judge, thirsting for his blood; the Executive demanding to hear that defence, to which the court would not listen, and extending the arm of its protection to snatch the victim from the oppressor's grasp. And will you now turn this man loose upon society, armed with the terrors of the law and secure in impunity, to perpetrate similar offences? Let it not be said that the court dealt out justice, and the President dispensed mercy, each in their own province. To extend mercy to the convict, where was the necessity of an application to his counsel for that defence which the court had overruled? It must have been from a conviction that justice had not been done the prisoner by the court, that this application was made. I defy the utmost ingenuity of man to refer it to any other probable or plausible motive. The conduct of the prisoner's counsel merits an abler eulogium than I can pretend to give; it is above my feeble praise; but my gratitude shall never cease to flow for their firm, vigorous, and manly stand against an imperious domineering judge; for their resolute assertion of American rights against a proud and cruel oppressor. The Attorney General of Maryland (whose wit and ingenuity I shall be the last man to deny) has indeed said, that he wishes a lawyer's hand may never be polluted with anything more corrupt than a prejudiced opinion; and I, for my part, most fervently hope that the hand of an advocate may ever thus instinctively shrink from the touch of judicial corruption. "My hand shall never be tainted by receiving a prejudiced opinion in any case, much less in a capital one." The man who uttered those words needs no other monument or epitaph. He gave a lesson, of which the judge might have profited—that, in discharging his professional duty, he was not to be swayed by political antipathies or predilections; he disdained to become a weak and wicked instrument to sanction premeditated, legalized murder; he scorned to assist, in a miserable mummery of law and justice, a man who could invoke the blessing of God at the moment when he was perpetrating a judicial murder. Had the counsel been seduced, or terrified into submission, this enormity (like many others) would have been shrouded under the mantle of form and precedent.

The precedents which are relied upon to justify the respondent in the trials of Fries and Callender, and the law which is adduced by his counsel on the powers and rights of courts and juries, respectively, relate to civil cases, where the law and the fact, being always separate and distinct, the first falls under the dominion of the judge, whilst the last only becomes the province of the jury. But, in a criminal prosecution, the verdict embraces both law and fact, of which being necessarily compounded, so much of the law is combined with the fact upon which they are to pronounce, it belongs to the jury, and to the jury alone, to decide and determine. They are inseparably connected; and, therefore, the powers of a jury, in a common lawsuit between man and man, is no measure of their rights in a criminal prosecution. Thus, in a civil action, the court possesses the power of granting a new trial on the motion of either party; whilst in a criminal case, it can exercise this power only in favor of one of those parties—the prisoner; it cannot grant a new trial to the prosecutor if a verdict is found in favor of the accused. It is a final acquittal. That the scope of action in the court is diminished, whilst in the jury it is enlarged, in a criminal case, is notorious; it is not a subject of argument. But our opponents have not only resorted to the practice in civil cases, which here is totally inapplicable, but they have brought forward English precedents before the Revolution, and decisions of the court of Star Chamber! Precedents drawn from the worst periods of their history, from hard, unconstitutional times—decisions from the most flagitious tribunals, whose very name has passed into a proverb of corrupt, unfeeling tyranny. For an account of this Star Chamber I would refer you to John, Lord Somers, of whom it has been said, not with more elegance than justice, that, "like a chapel in a palace, he alone remained unpolluted, whilst all around was profanation and uproar."

"We had a privy council in England (says 'this great constitutional lawyer') with great and 'mixed powers; we suffered under it long and much. All the rolls of Parliament are full of 'complaints and remedies; but none of them effectual till Charles the First's time. The Star Chamber was but a spawn of our council; and 'was called so only because it sat in the usual 'council chamber. It was set up as a formal court 'in the third year of Henry VIII., in very soft 'words, 'to punish great riots, to restrain offenders too big for ordinary justice; or, in modern 'phrase, to preserve the peace.' But in a little time it made the nation tremble. The privy 'council came at last to make laws by proclamation, and the Star Chamber ruined those that 'would not obey. At last they fell together." (Hatsell's Precedents, vol. 4, page 65, Note.) Is this the court whose adjudications are to justify the decisions of an American tribunal in the nineteenth century? And in a case of treason, too? Is this vile and detestable tribunal (whose decisions, even in England, are scarce suffered to be drawn into precedent) to furnish rules of conduct for the courts of this great confederate Republic? Yes, sir, you have not only been obliged to listen to Star Chamber doctrines, but you have been referred to one most arbitrary magistrate to justify the oppressions of another. I allude to Chief Justice Keelyng. Who he was, may be seen in the same volume of Hatsell, page 113.

"On the 16th of October, 1667, the House being 'informed, 'that there have been some innovations 'of late in trials of men for their lives and deaths; [the very offences charged upon the respondent;] 'and in some particular cases restraints have been 'put upon juries, in the inquiries—this matter is 'referred to a committee. On the 18th of November, this committee are empowered to receive information against the Lord Chief Justice Keelyng, 'for any other misdemeanors besides those concerning juries. And on the 11th of December, 1667, this committee report several resolutions 'against the Lord Chief Justice Keelyng, of illegal 'and arbitrary proceedings in his office." The first of these resolutions is: "That the proceedings of the Lord Chief Justice, in the cases now reported, are innovations in the trial of men for 'their lives and liberties: and that he hath used an arbitrary and illegal power, which is of dangerous consequence to the lives and liberties of the people of England, and tends to the introducing of an arbitrary government.' The respondent's own case. The second resolution is, "that in the place of judicature"—[how does this bear upon the eighth article?] "the Lord Chief Justice hath undervalued, vilified, and contemned Magna Charta, the great preserver of our lives, freedom, and property." And the authority of this infamous judge, the minion of Charles II.,—of judges in the most corrupt period of English history, from the restoration of that King to the revolution, is relied upon by his counsel to absolve the respondent from guilt. Permit me to do their client more justice. I do believe that the man who is held up here as a revolutionary patriot of 1776, although in a moment of human infirmity he hath imitated their crimes, would blush to be justified by their example. For his sake I rejoice in that visitation of God which hath saved him this last degradation: from seeing his defence rested upon the authority of those infamous times, and yet more infamous men, with whom, with all his weakness and all his infirmities upon him, he would yet (I am persuaded) disdain a comparison. Yes, I do feel relieved that he hath been spared the disgraceful spectacle of beholding himself defended by his friends on principles more unjust and iniquitous, if possible, than have ever been imputed to him by his enemies: that he hath not been reduced to see those very decisions, prior to the revolution, cited in his defence, which he himself denied to a fellow creature put in jeopardy of life! The benefit of these decisions (it seems) can be taken only by the powerful oppressor—they offer no shelter to his victim. I thank God, sir, that I have indeed studied at the feet of far different Gamaliels from the honorable Attorney General of Maryland, or those by whom, it would appear, he has been brought up; that I have drawn my notions of justice and constitutional law from a far different source—not from the tribunals of Harry VIII., nor the tools and parasites of the house of Stuart, but from the principles, the history, and the lives of those illustrious patriots and their disciples, who brought the Star Chamber to ruin, and its abettors to the block.

But I cannot consider the able Attorney General of Maryland quite sincere in the doctrine which he has advanced. He shines indeed a luminary in this defence. Mr. President, there is an obliquity in human nature that too often disposes us rather to applaud the brilliant, though pernicious ingenuity that can "make the worse appear the better reason," than the humble but useful efforts of a mind engaged in an honest search after truth. There is something fascinating in such a display of the powers of the human mind. The vanity of the whole species soothes itself with the excellence of an individual. We yield to the illusions of self love—"we lay the flattering unction to our souls"—and are cheated and abused. It is under this perverse bias of our nature that I render to the honorable Attorney General of Maryland the willing tribute of my admiration. But, he will pardon me, I cannot suppose him serious. I will not do him the injustice to believe that to a noble motive, to long habits of political and social intercourse, a friendship of thirty years standing, he has refused what he himself tells you is done, every day, nay in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases in a thousand, by persons of his profession, for a mercenary consideration. What has he said? "That, in defence of their clients, lawyers are in the daily habit of laying down as law what they know not to be law." Mr. President, when I see a man of his unrivalled resources reduced to the miserable shift of Star Chamber doctrines and precedents before the revolution—and, conscious, no doubt, of the actual weakness of his defence, calling to his aid all the force of wit, ingenuity, repartee, pleasantry, and good humor, what inference must I draw? and what must be the conclusion of this honorable Court?

[Here Mr. Randall solicited the indulgence of the court for the very desultory style of his address, not less painful to himself than he felt it to be oppressive and irksome to them. This defect, the result of his incompetency, had been aggravated by the loss of the voluminous notes which he had taken, and which, but for that accident, he would have been able to reduce to something like system and method. It was however the strength of the cause, and not the ability of the advocate—the weight of the bullion, not the fashion of the plate, on which he relied. The court would decide according to the evidence, and that was enough.]

I will now, with the Court's permission, offer some observations on the articles growing out of Callender's case. The second article relates to the overruling of Bassett's objection to serve upon the jury. That Bassett did object to serving on that jury is established by the concurrent testimony of Mr. Hay, Mr. Nicholas, and Mr. Robertson, who took down the proceedings upon the trial in short-hand, and of the juror himself, who has appeared as evidence on behalf of the accused. And yet, sir, the counsel affirm that he offered no objection, but merely expressed "scruples of delicacy" against serving. Delicate distinction this! What is an objection? A man is called upon to do a particular act—on which he states reasons, or doubts, if you will have it so, why he should not do it. This is not a refusal, or a denial, but what is it, if not an objection? And an objection too, which, according to the respondent's own rule, as laid down on that trial, ought to have disqualified the juror. For he has deposed—and if he had not, we have the strongest testimony to the fact—that, from extracts which had appeared in the newspapers, he had formed and delivered an opinion, that "The Prospect Before Us" came within the sedition law. Sir, if he had never delivered such an opinion before; he did then deliver it, at the time and in the place of all others the most injurious to the prisoner and disqualifying of himself—in open court, preceding the trial. As to the wretched subterfuge that he had not delivered any opinion respecting the charges contained in the "indictment," which he had never seen, and which he was not permitted to see, or to hear read, it is a mockery of common sense, that gives the finishing stroke to the tyrannous and insulting conduct of the judge. He had formed and delivered an opinion of the publication, from which the charges contained in the indictment were extracted—and although he could not possibly know the particular sets of words selected by the public prosecutor as libellous, he did not, he could not possess that unbiassed and impartial state of mind requisite to constitute a good juror. The testimony which he has delivered before this honorable Court corroborates every objection which could have been urged to him. He has shown himself too far gone in political gangrene, to have decided fairly any question, in which the feelings of the then party were at all involved. Indeed, he seems to have had some confused perceptions of his own unfitness. But that, which in the estimation of every honorable mind—which even in his opinion constituted an objection to him, was his strongest recommendation to the judge. The objection was overruled—Bassett was declared a good juror—was sworn, and served accordingly. And all this is justified on the authority of the court of Star Chamber, and of Lord Chief Justice Keelyng.

On the subject of Mr. Taylor's testimony, its rejection is attempted to be defended by a solitary precedent, in a civil case, drawn from a reporter, who, I am informed by gentlemen of the first professional character, is far from being considered as very good authority. I mean McNally. In support of this article I might urge as well the admissions of the honorable Attorney General of Maryland, as the universal practice of our courts. What said Mr. Robertson—and what said the Chief Justice of the United States, on whose evidence I specially rely? He never knew such a case occur before. He never heard a similar objection advanced by any court, until that instance. And this is the cautious and guarded language of a man placed in the delicate situation of being compelled to give testimony against a brother judge. What more could you expect from a person thus circumstanced? What does it prove but that the respondent was the first man to raise, to invent such an objection to a witness? Can any one doubt Mr. Marshall's thorough acquaintance with our laws? Can it be pretended that any man is better versed in their theory or practice? And yet in all his extensive reading, in his long and extensive practice, in the many trials of which he has been spectator, and the yet greater number at which he has assisted, he had never witnessed such a case. It was reserved for the respondent to exhibit, for the first, and I trust, for the last time, this fatal novelty, this new and horrible doctrine that threatens at one blow all that is valuable in our criminal jurisprudence.

Against the fourth article the Attorney General of Maryland hath adduced a similar and doubtful authority, in defence of his client. And here again I bottom myself upon the testimony of the same great man, yet more illustrious for his abilities than for the high station that he fills, eminent as it is. He declares that he has never known a similar requisition made by any court; that where the propriety of questions, verbally propounded, has been denied, or for the sake of precision, (where they were intricate,) they have been reduced to writing, at the request or order of the court; but in the first instance, and before they had been stated verbally, never, within the compass of his experience. And what inference can any candid, unprejudiced mind drawn from these repeated and, until then, unprecedented acts of interference by the judge, on behalf of the prosecution, but that, instead of an umpire, he was a partisan?

With regard to his deportment towards the counsel, I shall call the attention of the court not to the statement made by themselves:—Because I question it in the slightest degree? God forbid—I know those able and honorable men too well—but because I would deprive our opponents of their almost sole argument—the personal irritation which they allege those witnesses must have felt. Waiving then any remarks on their testimony, powerful as it is, I again ask you, what said the Chief Justice? And, if I may say so, what did he look? He felt all the delicacy of his situation, and as he could not approve, he declined giving any opinion on the demeanor of his associate. What does Mr. Robertson say? In substance, everything that has been deposed by other witnesses: "That the judge always spoke in the first person singular." And here I will remark, that the short-hand report which this gentleman made of the trial, and which he has given in evidence, was published, in the first instance, as a defence of Mr. Chase against alleged misrepresentations of his conduct on that occasion. It cannot be considered, therefore, as an unfavorable view of the transaction, at least so far as the respondent is concerned. What says Mr. Gooch? That the judge was very 'yearnest' with the counsel: that they were much abashed; that he set them down; that they appeared alternately red and pale; that he exhibited their confusion to the mirth of all the bystanders: and Colonel Taylor tells you, "that the conduct of the judge had the full effect it seemed intended to produce—to abash the counsel for the prisoner, and turn them into ridicule, for that everybody laughed but themselves."

But the ingenious Attorney General of Maryland, whose fruitful invention is never without resource, has endeavored to persuade you, that this conduct was not merely justifiable, but even meritorious. That the design of the counsel was to irritate and inflame the people; and the respondent, dreading a riot, had no object but to keep the audience in a good humor; and that, by a seasonable exertion of his acknowledged wit and pleasantry, he completely succeeded in turning their weapons upon themselves, and totally defeated their purpose. This apology reflects credit on the inventive faculty of him who makes it, and yet what is it but an admission of the charge? Look to the evidence. You will see nothing to support the twist which has been attempted to be given to it—no apprehension of disorder and confusion but what grew out of the insufferable tyranny and insolence of the judge. Where was the respondent at this time? In some obscure corner of the Union—some remote district notorious for disaffection, infamous for its spirit of insurrection, far removed from the protection of State or Federal authority? No sir, he was in the enlightened capital of Virginia, a country never disgraced by rebellion—unless the epithet be applied by some squeamish politician to our glorious revolutionary struggle—a State whose soil has never been stained by insubordination to law. No, sir, he was sitting within a stone's throw of the residence of the Governor of Virginia, a man of whom I shall say nothing. Let the exalted stations he has more than filled, the high public trusts on which he has seemed rather to confer honor than receive it, his unshaken constancy in the worst of times, the dismay and confusion of his enemies, whose vain aspersions have passed him like the idle wind—let the confidence of a united people speak his eulogium. The respondent was sitting within musket-shot of a cantonment of Federal troops. Why were these troops placed there at that time, and why were they kept there for some time afterwards, belongs not to my present purpose. It is enough to say that they were a part of our famous provisional army—"fruges consumere nati"—to ascertain their readiness to protect, in any outrage on the law, or Constitution, (then practised or meditated,) the Government that maintained them in dissolute idleness. Governor Monroe was more interested in the respondent's safety than he himself appears to have been. He trembled lest the indignation of the people should get the better of their good sense, and hurry them into some act of violence, that would cast an odium on the State and afford matter of triumph to her enemies. That the respondent's object was to goad her citizens to some outrage, which might justify the humiliation that was preparing for her, there is too much reason to believe, and that he would have succeeded, but for the intervention and influence of that excellent man, and the persuasions of the counsel themselves, whom the Attorney General of Maryland would represent as endeavoring to excite public commotion, that he may find some shelter for the enormities of his client.

Another attempt at justification of his conduct on this trial is by reference to the law and practice in Maryland. But surely the judge who scouted the idea of being governed by the law of Virginia, whilst exercising jurisdiction there, shall not be permitted to take refuge under the law of another State. For if the law of Virginia was not binding on the respondent, in Virginia, a fortiori, he could not have been governed by the law of Maryland. But you are asked, whether the respondent's conduct as stated by the prosecutors, is too inconsistent with the character universally ascribed to him for discernment, by his enemies as well as by his friends, to be credited? Whether to attain his object (granting it to have been corrupt) he was under any necessity to unmask and wantonly expose himself to future punishment? Without noticing that this is argument against fact, hypothesis opposed to actual experiment, his conduct may easily be reconciled with his character, and with the circumstances attending it. "If his object was oppression, why did he not lie in ambush; (say his counsel) why disclose (nay almost avow) it?" Because caution and circumspection form no part of the charges against him: because (even allowing that he is as conspicuous for these qualities, as he is notorious for the reverse) there is no principle of human nature, or human conduct, more true, more invariable than this: that whatsoever be the general character of a man, he is unable at all times to act up to it. It is the inevitable condition annexed to guilt, that it will betray itself—it is the privilege of truth alone always to be consistent. We find him in the case of Fries not more dictatorial and arbitrary, than wavering and irresolute. On one day arrogant and imperious—on the next alarmed and trying to remove the impression his rashness had made—retracing his steps, sitting (as you are told by his counsel) not on the bench of justice, but on the stool of repentance, "draining the cup of humiliation to the very dregs,"—in a word, a man penitent and of contrite heart. That repentance, although it cannot avail here, will (if sincere) be accepted by another and more dread tribunal. But much I fear that the contrition which is accompanied by a threat will avail but little, although offered at the throne of mercy itself. No, sir, fortunately for us, although the tiger and hyena too often appear in human shape, there is no disguise that can long conceal them—not even though they crouch upon the judgment seat and under the ermine. Thanks to the beneficence of God! this insidious character cannot always be supported. God forbid it should! "No wonder (says the Attorney General of Maryland) that the people of Pennsylvania wish to get rid of the bar," alluding to the case of Fries. Rather let him say no wonder that they are tired of the bench, for it is against the judges, this very judge, in that very case, that they have protested. They have deprecated his jurisdiction over them, and the solemn protest of their representatives against his iniquitous condemnation of Fries, is the groundwork of the present prosecution.

But our doctrine, it is said, goes to prostrate the rights of the accused—where?—at the feet of juries. There may they forever lie, but never at the foot of a judge. The gentleman from South Carolina (I beg his pardon) deprecates the placing of criminal law solely in the power of juries. He would not have the life of a man depend on their decision of a point of law. But it is the glorious attribute of jury trial, that the question of guilty or not guilty, involving both law and fact, that law as well as that fact the jury alone is competent to determine. It is the necessary consequence of the general verdict which they are required to find. The very able and learned Attorney General of Maryland indeed says that this is an incidental power, rather than a right of the jury. But, sir, what is that power which no man may question, but a right? For, whether incidental or direct, the exercise of it is final and complete, if in favor of the accused; and the power of the court to award him a new trial is further protection to the prisoner against abuse. There is no specific power given, in so many words, by the Constitution, to Congress, to punish robberies of the mail; but it is incidental to the right of establishing post offices and post roads, and necessary to carry the specified power into effect. This curious distinction between "right and power, direct and incidental," is an ignis fatuus of the learned gentleman's composition to bewilder and mislead us from our object, that we may be lost and led astray over a wide moor of absurdities. The right of the jury is not the less, whether immediate, or derivative; as Congress possess the power to pass all laws necessary to carry any delegated power into effect, in like manner juries possess every power necessary to the general verdict which they have a right to give. The violation on the part of the judge of the incidental power, as much subjects him to punishment, as if he had invaded the original right over the fact, to which it is appendant. What would he say to a robber of the mail claiming impunity because the power to make the offence penal was incidental, and not specified in the Constitution? But, say gentlemen, we admit the power in the jury, we only deny the right: and in this tissue of self-contradictions they declare, that whilst a jury is bound by the exposition of the law, as laid down by the court, yet they have not the right to determine whether the facts come within the law. Can there be a greater absurdity?

"Whilst the jury have no right to decide the law, they must decide whether the facts come within the law?" If the jury is tied down by the court's construction of the law, is it not plain that they do not decide whether the fact is, or is not, embraced by the law? but that whilst they find naked fact, it is the court that decides whether that fact does, or does not, come within the law? Gracious God! is it come to this? Are the great principles for which our forefathers contended, and many of yourselves have bled, now to be frittered away by technical sophistry? Is the same doctrine to be established here in capital offences—in cases of treason—that Lord Mansfield attempted to impose on the people of England as the law of libel; and which they would not endure? Shall principles of criminal law which they have scouted, even in cases not capital, be established here for the decision of capital offences? that whilst the jury finds the facts, their application to the law shall depend solely on the will of the court? I deny the gentleman's law; and assert that, as an American citizen, I would refuse to be bound by it. A man is charged with having committed certain treasonable acts. The Constitution has defined treason to consist "in levying war against the United States, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." But the court, assuming to themselves a more than Papal infallibility—the exclusive exposition and construction of the Constitution—tell me, as a juror, to surrender into their hands my conscience and my understanding; that, as a levying of war is treason, so is the picking up of a pin a levying of war; that I, an unlearned layman, must not presume to expound the holy scripture of the Constitution, but must leave that to the elect; and, if the fact of his having picked up the pin be proved to my satisfaction, I am bound to find the prisoner guilty of levying war against his country—to convict him of treason. Sir, the parallel runs on all fours; for there is nothing to uphold this monstrous judicial assumption, but that which supported the pretensions of the Roman Pontiff—the willing obedience of ignorant superstition. If the jury is contumacious, if, whilst they confess their entire conviction of the truth of the fact charged in the indictment, they deny the legal doctrine and acquit the prisoner, the court is without redress. They may bully and look big—there is no help. Put the case of murder. A killing with malice aforethought is charged upon the prisoner—there is no dispute about facts—it is admitted that the party arraigned did kill the deceased. Shall I, a juror, contenting myself with deciding a fact that nobody disputes, surrender to the court the question of law, should they attempt to usurp it, (as that killing with a particular weapon is a killing with malice prepense,) and find a man guilty of murder whom I believe to have acted in self-defence?—in defence of life, or, what is dearer than life, of reputation? No, sir; I will not find him guilty, although all the courts in the universe should instruct me to do so. I will look to the great precept, "do as you would be done by," and say, "I would have done so too, and, therefore, I will not say, that man ought not so to have done." And what is there, sir, in the words "levying of war," more unintelligible than in the words, "malice prepense?" The first, being altogether a matter of fact, would appear more exclusively the province of the jury than the last, which rather partakes of a question of opinion. If you leave the law in criminal cases to the jury, (as well as the fact,) you are safe; but if your decision should sanction the opposite doctrine, you set all our liberties, fixed by the decisions of ages, afloat on an ocean of uncertainty and contention. We have no beacon, no compass, no polar star to direct our course. If you suffer the rights of a jury to be thus invaded on a criminal trial—on a trial for life and death—you bind us in conclusions more fatal than those of the Church of Rome. You force us one moment to say whether such a fact amounts to such a crime, and, the next, you will not permit us to know what the crime is. I hope the marshal will never summon me on such a jury. I give him warning; I will never surrender the Constitution, my understanding, and my oath to the "grim gribber" of a court of law. I should consider myself as much entitled to decide the law for the judge in a civil case, as bound by his decision of it in a criminal one. Vain and futile is the attempt of the Constitution to settle and define treason, if that definition is to mean anything or nothing at the option of a corrupt judge. If this doctrine, sir, be denied by any member of this honorable Court, let him, in his legislative capacity, move for a bill "to render juries more obedient to the judges, and especially in criminal cases." Until that is done, I shall refuse obedience to their dictates, and act as a juror upon the principles which I have avowed.

There is an expression, sir, in one of the articles (the fourth) much carped at by the opposite counsel, (Mr. Key,) which, as they have proceeded, every word and tittle, from my pen—and as I believe them correct—I feel called upon to explain: it is the term "intemperance." Intemperance may consist in gluttony, drunkenness, in other sensual and criminal excesses, or in a want of temper—its manifest meaning here; and in that meaning, confessed by the respondent's counsel, who excuse a particular act, or rather series of acts of intemperance, by alleging that it is habitual to their venerable client—that it is of seventy years standing—that it is too invetrate to be corrected—that he and they too sir are sorry for it, but it cannot be helped. Whatever you may think of the ingenuity of this defence I am sure, sir, you must allow it candor.

[Here Mr. Randolph entered into a defence of the testimony of John Heath, contending that there was nothing in the evidence of William Marshall inconsistent with it—that it was rebutted only by the evidence of a single witness, who might be considered as implicated in the charge. He also contended for the position that the law of Virginia was binding on the Court, where the law of Congress was silent, adducing several cases in illustration of his argument.]

I will now proceed to the eighth article of impeachment, in my desultory way, and for it I believe I might plead the precedent set me by the Attorney General of Maryland. The time has been, sir, when the sentiments uttered by the judge in his charge to the grand jury would have been denounced as Jacobinical—certain I am they would have come under the sedition law. In England, where the Church is connected with the State—indeed, forms a part of the Constitution—parsons have been impeached (and justly too) for preaching "sermons tending to introduce arbitrary government, and containing tenets derogatory to the rights and liberties of the subject."

[Here Mr. Randolph cited the cases of Doctor Mainwaring, in 1628—4 Hatsell, 125 to 206—and of the Rev. Richard Thomson in 1680—ibid, 118.]

But, sir, we are not reduced to reason from analogy—here is a case in point: "On the 23d of December, 1680, Sir Richard Corbett reports, from the committee appointed to examine the proceedings of the judges in Westminster Hall, several resolutions"—among them is the following: "That certain expressions in a charge given by Baron Weston were a scandal to the Reformation, in derogation of the rights and privileges of Parliament, and tending to raise discord between His Majesty and his subjects." To which resolution the House agrees, and resolves "That Sir Richard Weston, one of the barons of the Court of Exchequer, be immediately impeached;" and a committee is appointed to prepare the impeachment accordingly.—Hitsell's Precedents, vol. 4, page 17. These, sir, indeed are "cases before the Revolution," but on the eve of it, when the nation was making a stand against the Duke of York, afterwards James II.

In addition, we might cite the respondent's own authority, who, on the trial of Callender, declared that "If he knew himself, the opinion he had delivered and the reasons offered in its support flowed, not from political motives or reasons of State—with which he had no concern, and which he conceived ought never to enter courts of justice—but from deliberate conviction," &c.—Robertson's printed statement, taken in short-hand, p. 71. Try him by his own standard, and you must condemn him. Even-handed justice returns the poisoned chalice to his own lips—let him drain it to the very dregs. The very crimes on which he shows no mercy in others, he himself hath perpetrated. Compare, I beseech you, sir, the ability of this respondent to raise insurrection with that of Fries and Callender; compare his capacity, intelligence, opportunity, and influence, with theirs, and then pronounce who is the greatest criminal. With less bodily strength, indeed, but with gigantic powers of mind, he hath endeavored to alienate the people of Maryland from the General Government, and to excite them to nothing short of commotion against their own.

Mr. President, much as I regret the trespass that I have already committed on your patience, I must (painful as it may be to you, and it is not less so to myself,) attempt something like a review of the conduct of this judge. In May, 1800, you find him in Philadelphia, engaged in propagating and establishing the detestable doctrine of constructive and implied treason, which, in England, has proved the dreadful engine of persecution and murder. From thence you trace him to Annapolis; (not by the blood of John Fries—no thanks, however, to him for that;) you hear his declaration in presence of Mr. Mason. But this, his counsel tell you, was all a joke, nothing but humor, sir; like his conduct at Richmond. If you listen to them, you must become a Pythagorean, and believe that the soul of Yorick himself has transmigrated into the body of this judge. It is true he could not be the king's jester, because, unfortunately, we have no king, we have not yet reached that stage of civilization; but, sir, he is the jester of the sovereign people, a jester at your laws and Constitution, and it is for you to say whether he shall continue to exercise his function. This jocular conversation is likely to prove a bitter and biting jest to the respondent. So serious did that most intelligent and respectable witness deem it to be, that he locked it up in his own bosom, without venturing to mention it to any human being. He did not consider himself authorized to play with the fame of the respondent, however disposed he might be to sport with the feelings and rights of others. This merry fit lasted a long time. He indulges the same humor in the stage with Mr. Triplett, an entire stranger; and here let me observe, in justice to this gentleman, that never did any man deliver a more clear and unimpeachable testimony in a court of justice than this witness. It is conclusive. When the judge made personal declarations against Callender, could he be said to administer justice without respect to persons? But, sir, one of our adversaries (Mr. Harper) protests against this sort of evidence, and deems it highly inadmissible. Why? Because, forsooth, it violates the sanctity of private conversation, and wounds the feelings of gentlemen who may be called on as witnesses. Thank God! sir, we live in a country where the law is open to all, and knows no distinction between gentlemen and simple-men. No man, I trust, has a greater respect for the real gentleman than myself. When Francis I., the accomplished monarch of the most gallant people of Europe, deemed it his first distinction to be ranked as the first gentleman of his kingdom, he did not hold that sacred character in higher reverence than I do. But the respondent himself has told you that a court of justice is a coarse sort of thing, blind to these nice discriminations; that the polished address of a Chesterfield, and the rugged seowl of a Thurlow, in the eye of the law are equal. Suppose a person killed, will not the court hear evidence of a previous declaration by the prisoner, of ill-will to the deceased, as "that he would be the death of him," &c.? or, will they stop to ask whether it was uttered in a tipping-house, or a drawing-room; by a ruffian in rags, or in ermine? and yet we are accused of lying in wait for the respondent, of watching his unguarded and convivial hours, of wounding the nerve of social intercourse to the quick. We are ministers of justice, and as such, we know nothing of these delicate distresses, equally unknown to our forefathers, to the framers of our free and manly institutions. Their composition was of sterner stuff than this modern, flimsy, fashionable ware. To their robust constitutions and strong common-sense these qualmish megrims, these sickly sensibilities of modern refinement were happily unknown.

Follow the respondent, then, with the steady and untired step of justice, from Philadelphia to Annapolis, from Annapolis to Richmond, and back again to Newcastle. You see a succession of crimes each treading on the heel, galling the kibe of the other—so connected in time, and place, and circumstance, and so illustrated by his own confessions, as to leave no shadow of doubt as to his guilt. You are to take the facts, not, as his counsel would have you, isolated and dismembered, but embodied; a series of acts indissolubly linked together, each supporting, each animated by the vital principle of guilt that pervades and gives life to the whole. God hath joined them; no man shall or can put them asunder. Carry your mind back to the state of things in 1800; then advert to the testimony in the case of Fries. Lewis, Dallas, Tilghman, and even Rawle, declaring that they had never witnessed such a proceeding before; pronouncing the conduct of the judge, on that occasion, to be altogether novel in the annals of our criminal jurisprudence. The same spirit pervades his whole career. But you are warned by the counsel (Mr. Harper) not to tarnish the laurels of your political victory by an unmanly triumph over a fallen adversary. He implores the tribute of a sigh for the mournful yew and funeral cypress that bedecks the hearse of his political reputation. Dreading the decision of your judgment, your sympathies are enlisted for his client. An aged patriot, whose head is whitened with the hoar of three score and ten years, is presented to your afflicted imaginations; broken with disease, compelled to employ his few and short intervals from pain and sickness, to spend the last moments of a life devoted to a thankless country's service, in defending himself against a criminal prosecution. Do we thirst for his blood? yet, even there, English authorities would bear us out. Do we seek to lead him to Tower Hill? If his heart will fly in his face, is it we who cast it there? Do we even ask his disfranchisement? No, sir, we only demand the removal of a man, whom the very suspicion of such crimes unfits for the high station which he fills. A man bent with age and infirmity, struggling with misfortune, is a venerable object, entitled to your sympathy, even although he were not a patriot. Mine shall never be denied to such a character. But, sir, mark the difference between Samuel Chase, powerful and protected, and John Fries, feeble and oppressed. Look at the one lodged in a sumptuous hotel, partaking of the best cheer, surrounded and supported by every comfort of life, by a large and respectable circle of friends, indulged with ample time for his defence, assisted by counsel second to none in the land, unrestricted in the conduct of their cause. When I give a man so situated my sympathy, it is not of so jejune a cast as to refuse itself to the victim of his injustice—a hardy yeoman wrestling with indigence and persecution—selling his last bit of property to support a long imprisonment and meet the expenses of this very prosecution; a soldier of the Revolution, with whom the words "stamp act" and "window tax" were synonymous with slavery; who, in a moment of political delirium, perhaps of intoxication, had instinctively raised his hand against what he deemed an oppressive tax—immured in a dungeon, listening only to the clanking of fetters; snatched from the bosom of his family, to whom no doubt he was a kind parent and an affectionate husband—for be it remembered he was popular and beloved among his neighbors—this man, caught in the trap of judicial and constructive treason, at which common sense revolts, laid by the heels, trembling at the charge, ignorant of the extent of the law, without a friend to comfort and console him, no counsel in his defence; such a man, so situated, is as much entitled to my sympathy as any King that ever wore a crown, and he shall have it; he shall have more, he shall have justice from this honorable Court. Yes, sir, to my shame I confess, that my sympathy is not of this exclusive sort. It is not scared by the homely garb of poverty and wretchedness. It can feel for misfortune, even if it be not sumptuously arrayed. But let us suppose the character of John Fries to have been what one of our opponents has represented it; the other, on all sides it is agreed, was every way base and detestable. Yet, sir, this will not render your decision more favorable to the accused. If Fries was a dangerous rebel, new cause of discontent and disaffection should not have been given to his countrymen by condemning him unfairly and unheard. Is this the way to extinguish the spirit of revolt, to reconcile freemen to your Government? Sir, we do not appear at your bar the advocates of Fries and Callender, but of the violated laws of your country. We know it is in the persons of the weak, the worthless, and the wicked, that the liberties of every people are first attacked; and we feel that society is as deeply interested in protecting the most obscure and friendless of her members, as her most illustrious benefactor; and more so, for this last may protect himself. Be the character and condition of the prisoner what they may, we say, "give him a fair trial;" the greater his guilt, the less the occasion of relaxing the principles of law and justice in trying him. If he be a great State prisoner, dangerous to Government from the number and power of his followers, the greater the necessity for a rigid adherence to those principles, that no pretext for future insurrection be found in the injustice of his sentence. Sir, if these men had had fair trials, our lips would have been closed in eternal silence. Look at the case of Logwood. The able and excellent judge, whose worth was never fully known until he was raised to the bench, who presided at that trial, uttered not one syllable that could prejudice the defence of the prisoner. He felt, he knew that the wretch was entitled to fair play, and he gave it him. We heard of no prejudged (written or verbal) opinion in that case; no denial of testimony, no requisition that questions should be reduced to writing and submitted to the inspection of the court, before they were suffered to be propounded to a witness—none of the respondent's new discoveries in criminal law were there brought into play. The Chief Justice knew that, sooner or later, the law was an overmatch for the dishonest, and leaving the cause of the commonwealth to its attorney, he disdained to descend from his great elevation to the low level of a public prosecutor. He let the law take its course. But, sir, the honorable Attorney General of Maryland has said, that these men had fair trials; or what he terms "the essence of an impartial trial"; that they were guilty, and found guilty accordingly; and had the verdict (the essence of the trial) been otherwise, it would have been partial and unjust: that is to say, sir, that the end will justify any means resorted to for its accomplishment; that all the forms of law, invented to protect the innocent, may be dispensed with on the trial of the guilty; that you may deny a man the benefit of testimony or counsel in his behalf, on his trial; and, after he is hanged, bring forward evidence of his guilt to justify the deed. Do you want other proof of the weakness of a cause, when men of sense defend it by arguments like these? If the respondent be indeed innocent, in his name I impeach his defenders; if he is not guilty, they have betrayed his cause.

Had I, Mr. President, been governed in this case by considerations of personal feeling rather than by my duty to the public, I should long since have asked a respite from a task to which I feel myself physically as well as morally incompetent. In a little time and I will dismiss you to the suggestions of your own consciences. My weakness and want of ability prevent me from urging my cause as I could wish, but it is the last day of my sufferings and of yours.
